[8] III. The appellant contends that the court erred in the latter part of the first instruction, in which it undertook to present the doctrine of comparative negligence under the act of 1911, which modifies the doctrine of contributory negligence theretofore existing in this state. We will not pass upon that statute, and the court's instruction under it, for the reason that the undisputed evidence in this record shows that there was no negligence on the part of the appellee causing or contributing to his injury, and therefore the instruction of the court, even if erroneous, could not have prejudiced the rights of appellant. The court, in our opinion, might have very well declared as a matter of law that the appellee, under the uncontroverted evidence, was free from negligence. Therefore the instructions submitting that issue to the jury, even if erroneous, were favorable to appellant, and it could not complain.

[9] The appellee testified that he was not familiar with the switch tracks of the yard where he was injured; that he was called to the service about 9 o'clock that night, and was injured the next morning about 1:50 o'clock; that he did not know the position of the car on the switch track with which the engine collided; that while it might have been his duty to look for cars on the switch track, he could not have seen the car, had he looked, for his eyes were at the time so blinded by the heat and bright glare of the fire, that he had just replenished, that he could not have seen had he looked; that he had no time to look out; that he was very busy firing the engine—had just got up on the seat box and was putting on the injector when the crash came. If appellee, while discharging his duties as fireman, had no time to look out, as this testimony shows, then it was wholly immaterial whether the reflection from the car would have blinded his eyes or not. Appellee's testimony shows he was so busy he could not look for the car when the collision took place. The appellant offered no testimony to the contrary, and the burden was on it to do so. His testimony is reasonable and consistent, and there is no evidence in the record to the contrary. Therefore it was the duty of the jury to consider it, and reasonable minds could have reached no other conclusion than that the appellee himself was diligent in discharging his duties.

The issue of appellant's negligence was correctly submitted to the jury, and there was evidence to support the verdict. There was testimony tending to show that the foreman, who acted as conductor of the switch engine, ignored the rule, introduced in evidence, adopted by the company for the protection of the employes while switching. No brakes were set on this car. It was not coupled to the other cars. The wheels were not blocked. The foreman, having the placing of the cars in charge, only endeavored to see that the lead track was clear by placing his hand out to ascertain if there was space sufficient for cars on the lead track to pass the car on the side track. He said, if it cleared his fingers, holding his hand out straight, it would clear a car or engine, and he had adopted that method and used it for 27 years; that it was the usual method. But the jury would have been warranted in finding that this method itself was negligent, or the jury might not have accepted his testimony; for the fact remained that the box car was too near the lead track. Either the foreman did not take the precaution he says he did, or else the car ran down too close to the lead track after he had held out his hand, showing that it had no brakes or blocks to check it. The rule required these. Had the foreman but observed the requirements of the rule to keep the lead track free and safe from collisions, the unfortunate accident would not have happened. The slightest diligence on his part would have prevented the occurrence of the accident.

[10] IV. The record shows that in the argument to the jury Mr. A. N. De Mers, of counsel for appellee, stated: "Now, gentlemen, I want to be fair about this matter. I will ask you to place yourselves in the place of the Iron Mountain Railroad, and see what you would do under the circumstances in this case; then put yourselves in the place of Mr. Brogan, and see what is fair and just to both of these parties." Mr. W. V. Tompkins, counsel for appellant, in his argument, said to the jury: "Gentlemen, as counsel ask you to put yourselves in the place of the parties, if you are going to do this, then I will ask you to consider how it would appear to you, if you had accidentally injured a man on the 17th of October, and had sent him to a hospital and was caring for him as best you could, and he should sue you on the 6th of November, as Mr. Brogan has done in this case? Mr. T. N. Robertson, counsel for appellee, in his closing argument, said: "Mr. Tompkins has said to you to put yourselves in the place of the railroad company, and seems to criticize plaintiff for suing on the 6th of November, when the injury occurred on the 17th of October. They had all that time to offer a settlement, and none had been offered." Appellant objected to the argument that appellant should have offered a settlement. Counsel for appellee thereupon said: "Well, I will withdraw the argument, since he objects to it." Appellant's counsel then said: "I object to these wrongful statements, and then, when an objection is made, letting counsel say he withdraws them. They have already had their ill effect." The court said to the jury: "Well, gentlemen, it is withdrawn. Do not consider that statement."

Appellant saved its exception to the action of the court in permitting counsel for appellee to make such argument, and in refusing to rebuke him for making such argument. There was no prejudicial error in the ruling of the court. The improper argument of counsel for appellee was not so flagrant in character as to create a prejudice in the minds of the jury against appellant, especially after counsel had withdrawn the remarks and the court had admonished the jury not to consider them. This action of the court and counsel was sufficient, in our opinion, to remove any possible prejudice that the objectionable argument was calculated to produce.

[11] V. Appellant complains of the ruling of the court in giving the instruction on the measure of damages. (See statement of the case.) There is no error in the instruction. It is not open to the criticism which appellant's counsel makes. The instruction is not argumentative, but only mentioned elements of damage proper for the jury to consider in the event that they find, from the evidence, such elements to exist. There was evidence in the record limiting definitely the expense to which appellee had been and would be subjected, by reason of his injured condition, to the sum of $500. The jury, therefore, were not allowed to speculate as to the amount of such expense.

There is no error in the record, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

ST. LOUIS, I. M. & S. RY. CO. v. JACKS.

1. DEATH (§ 99*)—DAMAGES—PECUNIARY LOSS TO BENEFICIARY—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

A bright, healthy, industrious boy, 16 years old, of good habits and affectionate disposition towards his parents, was killed. His father had an expectancy of a little over 14 years, and his mother had an expectancy of a little over 17 years. The boy, at the time of his death, earned $55 per month, and was in line of promotion. He contributed the whole of his earnings to his own and his parents' support. He had stated that he would stand by his parents as long as he lived. Held, that a verdict for the benefit of the parents for $5,000 was not excessive.

2. DEATH (§ 72*)—ACTION FOR DEATH—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In an action for the negligent death of an infant, brought for the benefit of his parents, evidence of the father's deafness and inability to obtain work was admissible only to show why the father was unemployed and needed his son's assistance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. § 91; Dec. Dig. § 72.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§§ 295, 296*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

In an action for the death of a boy 16 years old, employed as clerk to a railroad storekeeper, caused by a collision with cars used as a storeroom, an instruction that, in passing on the questions of contributory negligence and assumed risk, the jury must consider decedent's age, experience, intelligence, and means of knowledge, and if he, on account of his youth or inexperience, did not know or appreciate the danger of doing what he did at the time of the accident and under the circumstances then existing, he was not guilty of contributory negligence and did not assume the risk, unless the danger was obvious to a person of his age, intelligence, and experience, was correct.

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFUSAL TO GIVE INSTRUCTIONS COVERED BY CHARGE GIVEN.

It is not error to refuse a requested instruction fully covered by the instructions given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Though the jury may have found that decedent, at the time of his death, while in cars on a track used as a storeroom, engaged in the performance of his duties, was in a dangerous and unnecessary position, the question whether he assumed the risk was for the jury.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Whether decedent was guilty of contributory negligence held for the jury.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Desha County; Antonio B. Grace, Judge.

Action by J. J. Jacks, administrator of Elkins Jacks, deceased, against the St. Louis, Iron Mountain & Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The following is instruction No. 7 given by the court: "In passing upon the question of contributory negligence on the part of the deceased, and of assumed risk, you must take into consideration his age, experience, intelligence, and means of knowledge; and after considering these matters, if you believe from the evidence that the deceased, on account of his youth or inexperience, did not know or fully realize and appreciate the danger incident to the act or employment in which he was engaged at the time of the injury complained of, then you cannot hold him guilty of contributory negligence, nor can he be held to have assumed the risk, unless the danger of doing whatever he is shown to have done was, at the time and under all the circumstances then existing, obvious and apparent to a person of his age, intelligence, and experience."

The court refused defendant's requested instructions 2 and 3, which merely requested the court to instruct the jury that the burden of proof in this case was upon the plaintiff to establish each and every material allegation of his complaint.

The court also refused defendant's requested instruction 7, as follows: "If you find from the evidence that the injury and death of plaintiff's intestate was due to a dangerous position assumed by him, and which was wholly unnecessary in the discharge of his duties connected with his employment, then plaintiff cannot recover, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

The court also refused defendant's requested instruction 10, as follows: "The court instructs the jury that the law does not presume negligence from the mere happening of the accident."

Elkins Jacks, a boy a little over 16 years of age, was in the employ of the appellant as clerk to its storekeeper at McGehee. The appellant was handling its supplies from two box cars. They were placed on its coach track, at McGehee station. The cars were in bad condition; one of them having the drawbar out, permitting the cars to come within six or eight inches of each other. There were doors in the ends of the two cars, so that one could pass from one car to the other. It was Jacks' duty to go in these cars and get out supplies for the employes who asked for them. It was his duty to go from one car to the other, and to stay around these cars. The appellant had been using these cars as a storeroom for four or five days, while its regular storeroom was being repaired. Jacks had been working there in the store one or two months. There was nothing between these storeroom cars and the end of the track. The way to protect them from being bumped into by other cars on the track was to place a blue flag in the center of the track some distance above them. The rule required that no train should go over the flag. The servant whose duty it was to place the flag did not look to see that morning whether the flag was there. There was no reason to suppose that the cars would be moved. They were placed on the coach track for the special purpose of a storeroom.

While the switch crew was making couplings at McGehee on the morning of September 12, 1910, the switch engine caused a collision to take place with the cars where young Jacks was engaged in the discharge of his duties, which caused his death. After the collision occurred, Jacks was observed with one foot in one car and the other foot in the other car, standing up. He had his head between the two cars. When the engine released the pressure from the cars, he fell forward into the car. There was a bolt projecting out of the end of one of the cars, about as high as a man's head, if he had been between the cars. This bolt was four or five inches from the door, and projected out about one inch. There was blood on the bolt. The base of Jacks' skull was fractured, and both of his ears were bleeding. The blow against his ears on both sides killed him, causing concussion of the brain. He died instantly.

His administrator brought suit against the appellant, alleging that it negligently permitted and caused its engine to go upon the track upon which the cars were standing and collide with the cars while Jacks was at work, without any kind of warning to Jacks of their approach, with such violence that he was thrown about and knocked against the said car, or some object or objects thereon or thereto attached, and thereby injured him in such manner that he soon thereafter died from the effect of such injuries. The suit was brought for the benefit of Jacks' father and mother. Appellee alleged that they were entitled to his earnings until he reached his majority, and that he would have continued to have contributed to their support thereafter. The appellant denied the allegations of the complaint, and pleaded contributory negligence and assumption of risk on the part of Jacks.

A witness was permitted, over the objection of appellant, to state that Jacks' father, on account of deafness, often did not have any employment. The jury returned a verdict in favor of the appellee for $5,000. Judgment was rendered for this sum, and the appellant brings this appeal. Other facts will be stated in the opinion.

J. C. Knox, of Monticello, and Thos. B. Pryor, of Ft. Smith, for appellant. Danaher & Danaher, of Pine Bluff, for appellee.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The appellant contends that the verdict was excessive. Jacks had an expectancy of 44 years, his mother an expectancy of 17.41 years, and his father an expectancy of 14.09 years, as shown by the mortuary tables. Young Jacks was earning at the time of his death a salary of $55 per month, and was in line of promotion. He was industrious and intelligent. He contributed the whole of his earnings to his own and his father's and mother's support. He had stated that he would "stand by them [his father and mother] as long as he lived"—said they "could depend on him." At the time of his death his yearly salary, less his expenses for food and clothing, would have been $540. During the expectancy of his mother this income would have amounted to $9,396. That amount, reduced to its present value, according to the Carlisle Tables, would be $5,865.11.

In Railway v. Robbins, 57 Ark. 377, 21 S. W. 886, this court said: "The amount of the contributions, calculated upon the basis that they would continue without interruption for the term of his expectancy of life, should have been discounted on account of the contingencies to which they were subject." But, while this is true, it is also true that the jury were warranted in taking into consideration the fact that Jacks was in line of promotion, as shown by the evidence, and the reasonable probability that he would have been promoted and his earning power thereby increased. As was said by us in the recent case of Railway Co. v. Brogan, 151 S. W. 699, quoting from Railway Co. v. Sweet, 60 Ark. 550, 31 S. W. 571: "The jury doubtless weighed all the probabilities of loss from sickness and other various contingencies likely to arise during the course of a man's life, and balanced these against the probabilities, also, of an increase of efficiency in money-making power."

There is nothing in the amount of the verdict to indicate that the jury pursued any improper method in arriving at the same, and there is nothing in the record to warrant us in saying that they were actuated by passion, prejudice, or sympathy. Their verdict was responsive to the evidence, and while the verdict, in the absence of pain and suffering, reached the limit, perhaps, of the amount that should have been allowed under the circumstances, yet we are of the opinion that Jacks' father and mother were not more than fully compensated for his death. Jacks was a bright, healthy, industrious boy, of good habits and affectionate disposition towards his parents. The proof makes it reasonably certain that he would have continned to contribute his earnings to their support as long as they lived. With the disposition and ability that he possessed, according to the proof, it is reasonably certain that he would have contributed to them, had he lived, during the course of their lives as much as the jury awarded by their verdict.

[2] Appellant contends that the court erred in admitting evidence of the father's affliction (and inability to obtain work on that account) to go to the jury. We are of the opinion that this evidence was proper. It tended to show that young Jacks' father was dependent. The court was careful to tell the jury that the affliction of the father was not an element of damage in the case, but was only for the purpose of showing why his father was unemployed, and therefore needed his son's assistance. The instruction given on the measure of damages excluded any affliction of the father as an element of damages. Testimony showing the pecuniary circumstances of the next of kin, calling for help from those upon whom they are dependent, is certainly relevant and proper to be considered. It is relevant to the issue as to whether or not, by reason of the injury and death, the next of kin have suffered any pecuniary loss. See Cooper v. Railway Co., 66 Mich. 261, 33 N. W.

306, 11 Am. St. Rep. 482, and cases there cited.

The instructions of the court on the issues of negligence, contributory negligence, and assumed risk covered every phase of the evidence and were exceptionally free from error. The charge was in accord with the doctrine on these subjects often announced by this court, and it is unnecessary to discuss them here.

[3] Of the instructions given appellant only criticises No. 7. (See statement of the case.) This instruction was based upon the evidence and was correct.

[4-6] The court refused several prayers for instructions offered by appellant. (See statement of the case.) Of these 2, 3, and 10 were correct, but they were fully covered by instructions which the court gave. Instruction No. 7 was erroneous. It did not follow as a matter of law that, if Jacks assumed a dangerous and wholly unnecessary position, appellant was not liable; for, although the jury may have found that Jacks at the time of his death was in a dangerous and unnecessary position, it was still a question for them to determine as to whether or not in so doing he assumed the risk or was guilty of contributory negligence.

Finding no error, the judgment is affirmed.

CRUMP v. WALKUP et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 278*)—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—PRESUMPTIONS.

The common law governing husband and wife, giving rise to the presumption that property purchased during coverture, title to which was taken in the name of the wife, was paid for by the husband, has been abolished by Rev. St. 1909, §§ 8304, 8309, empowering a married woman to contract and carry on business in her own name, and providing that all realty and personalty belonging to any woman at the time of her marriage, or which may come to her during coverture by gift or inheritance, or by purchase with her separate money, shall be her separate property, and the presumption is entitled to but little weight in determining whether conveyances made to a wife by third persons are fraudulent as against the husband's creditors.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 121*)—SEPARATE PROPERTY OF WIFE—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Rev. St. 1909, §§ 8304, 8309, empowering a married woman to contract and carry on business in her own name, and providing that all property belonging to her at the time of her marriage, or which may subsequently come to her, shall be her separate property, real and personal estate purchased by a wife, by a donation given her by a third person, and by the fruits of her labor, and by the proceeds of the sales of her personalty, are her separate property, and cannot be taken to satisfy her husband's debts.

3. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 800*)—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit by a creditor of a husband to set aside conveyances by a third person to the wife, evidence held to show that the wife purchased the property by means of her separate estate, so that the conveyances were not in fraud of the husband's creditors.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 300*)—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

That a husband without his wife's knowledge mortgaged her separate chattels is not evidence that he owned the chattels, and that the wife's claim thereto is in fraud of his creditors.

5. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 800*)—TRANSACTIONS BETWEEN HUSBAND AND WIFE—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

That a husband gave to the assessors, for assessment, a list of personalty, claimed by the wife, as his own, is not conclusive evidence that the wife's claim of ownership is in fraud of his creditors; but the question of ownership is for the court on all the evidence, in a suit by a creditor of the husband to subject the chattels to his claims.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 896-903; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Monroe County; D. H. Eby, Judge.

Action by Robert H. Crump against Emma W. Walkup and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit in equity, instituted in the circuit court of Monroe county, by the plaintiff against the defendants, seeking to set aside and for naught hold six certain deeds, executed by various persons, conveying as many tracts of land situate in said county to defendant Emma W. Walkup, wife of defendant John H. Walkup, and to subject said lands to the payment of a certain judgment for $958.20, dated October 29, 1898, based upon two promissory notes, one dated May 22, 1891, for $32, due one day after date, bearing 8 per cent. interest, and the other dated August 9, 1892, for the sum of $700, bearing the same rate of interest in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant John H. Walkup, upon the alleged ground that the purchase price of said lands was owned and paid for by John H. Walkup, the husband, and the title thereto was taken in the name of Emma W. Walkup, his wife, for the purpose of hindering, delaying, and defrauding his creditors. The record in the case is quite voluminous, covering about 250 printed pages. To state even the substance of the testimony of the various witnesses would unnecessarily prolong the statement of the case, and the opinion which is to follow. We will, therefore, do the next best thing which the nature of the case will permit, and that is to briefly state what the evidence tends to prove, and then emphasize the weak and strong points in the case, and point out the evidence which tends to corroborate or disprove the same. In passing, however, we might add, that the evidence in this case, like that in most of its kind, is largely drawn from the lips of the defendants, and consequently there is not much conflict in the testimony; but the deductions to be drawn therefrom, and the rules of equity governing the same, greatly vary, and constitute the real grounds upon which the respective parties to the action stand, and upon which they wage the legal battle.

The following tracts of real estate constitute the land in controversy, and were acquired by defendant and Emma W. Walkup from the following named persons, upon the following dates, and in consideration of the following sums, to wit: Eighty acres from Julia E. Mudd, by deed dated April 10, 1902, in consideration of $350 paid and a pair of old mules valued at $50; 4.7 acres from Edward H. O'Daniel, by deed dated February 8, 1906, in consideration of $47; 40 acres from William M. McCreery et al., by deed dated November 10, 1906, in consideration of $510; 113 acres from John W. Young, by deed dated March 7, 1907, in consideration of $3,390; 40 acres from Samuel M. Locke, by deed dated June 20, 1907, in consideration of $200; and 40 acres from Thomas F. Hurd et al., by deed dated July 1, 1907, in consideration of $275. Emma W. Walkup never inherited any property from her father, nor any one else, nor did she own any property at the time of her marriage to John H. Walkup, nor at the time they moved to the farm of John W. Young, to be presently noted. All of this land, except the 113 acres, was very rough and broken, covered with small timber and brush, and was unfit for cultivation, only valuable for grazing purposes. At the time of the trial the 113 acres were worth $30 per acre, and all the remainder was worth about $10 per acre. Mrs. Walkup borrowed the entire $350 from a Mrs. Glenn, with which she paid for the Mudd tract, and secured the loan by deed of trust on the land. She paid Mrs. Glenn said $350 on November 10, 1906. The entire purchase price of the 113 acres, $3,390, was borrowed by Mrs. Walkup from the Bank of Stoutsville, and she secured the same by a deed of trust on that and all the other land mentioned, which cost her about $1,600. None of the $3,390 so loaned had been paid at the date of the trial.

Prior to July, 1893, John H. Walkup had been engaged in the live stock and livery business in the little town of Florida, Monroe county, at which time he failed and practically all of his property was taken by his creditors and sold to pay his debts, leaving about $3,500 of indebtedness unpaid. In July, 1893, defendants moved to the farm of John W. Young, an uncle of John H. Walkup. At that time his entire possessions consisted of a cow, an old pony, a second-hand wagon, a set of buggy harness, the family household and kitchen furniture, and 18 head of mules, which were mortgaged to said John W. Young for more than they were worth, and afterwards sold for several hundred dollars less than the amount of the mortgage. The cow died shortly after they moved to Young's farm. The household and kitchen furniture was worth about $50, the harness $20, and the pony $15. John W. Young was an old bachelor, and lived alone when defendants moved to his farm. Emma W. Walkup, after moving there, kept house for him, and did his cooking and all other duties pertaining to the household. In other words, all of them lived together as one family; defendants paying no rent and Mr. Young paid no board. When defendants went to live with Mr. Young, he turned over to Mrs. Walkup all the poultry which was then on the farm, and gave her the use of nine good milk cows. The next year Mrs. Walkup added to the poultry some turkeys, geese, and ducks, but just how many is not shown. John H. Walkup had, nothing to do with the poultry except at times, to assist his wife in marketing the same. She used a part of the proceeds of the sales of poultry in supporting the family, and a part of the proceeds were deposited in her name in the Bank of Stoutsville. At one time Mrs. Walkup exchanged some ducks to Lon Hughes for a pig, which, with its increase, was kept on the farm for several years. From those came the stock of hogs which was on the farm at the date of the trial, which at all times belonged to Mrs. Walkup. A few years prior to the date of the trial, John H. Walkup, as the agent of Mrs. Walkup, traded some of the hogs to a man by the name of Green for a small bunch of sheep, and from this start the sheep on the farm at the date of the trial sprang. None of the sheep ever belonged to her husband. About this same time Mrs. Walkup, out of the proceeds of the sales of poultry, eggs, and butter, purchased a small bunch of black heifer calves, the number not stated.

From the time defendants moved upon the farm of Mr. Young, up to April 10, 1902, the date of the purchase of the first piece of land by Mrs. Walkup, John H. Walkup, her husband, was doing general farm work upon the farm. The farm was largely in grass, except a small piece of timber. Neither of the defendants cultivated any of his land, but John H. Walkup rented and cultivated a piece of ground adjoining, and raised small crops thereon for a year or two. Mr. Young permitted John H. Walkup to cut some wood from the piece of timber on his land, which from time to time he hauled to Stoutsville and sold for $1.50 per cord. The proceeds of those sales were expended for living necessities. Some time prior to April 10, 1902, a man by the name of Turnbaugh owed Mrs. Walkup a board bill, and in settlement thereof he gave her a mare "pretty badly crippled." Later she traded the mare to a Mr. Gaston for a mule, and gave him $10 "to boot." The $10 was hers, the proceeds of sales of turkeys and chickens; and later she sold more turkeys and chickens, from which she realized $25, and purchased therewith another mule. In the spring of 1902 Mrs. Walkup purchased the first tract of land, 80 acres, from Mrs. Mudd, and paid for the same with the $350 she borrowed from Mrs. Glenn and the two mules last before mentioned. This land was covered with small timber; the big timber having been cut off years before. Shortly after purchasing it she began to fence and clear the land. She cut therefrom between 800 and 900 cords of wood and sold most of it at $3.50 per cord. John H. Walkup did part of the chopping and hauling of the wood to market, but the greater part thereof was done by hired labor, and the cost thereof was paid from the proceeds of the sale of the wood. This wood was cut and sold between the years 1902 and 1907. Part of the proceeds of the sale of this wood and the sales of poultry, eggs, and butter provided the largest part of the living expenses for the family. Most of the live stock and its increase were kept on the farm, but occasionally a few hogs were sold on the market.

For some time prior to 1902, down to the date of the trial, Mrs. Walkup had an account with the Bank of Stoutsville. All the land purchased by Mrs. Walkup was paid for by checks drawn on her account in said bank, signed by her. She testified that all the money received from the sales of her poultry, eggs, butter, live stock, and wood, except what was paid out for family expenses, etc., was deposited, either by herself or by her husband, to her credit in said bank. This testimony of Mrs. Walkup is contradicted by the books of the bank. They show that there was another account kept in said bank under the name of "J. W. Young by J. H. W." The deposits in this account were rather frequent, and were for considerable amounts, and were made by John H. Walkup, and the checks against this account were usually drawn by him. John H. Walkup frequently, without the knowledge of his wife, deposited money arising from the sale of poultry, stock, and cordwood, belonging to her, in the account of "J. W. Young by J. H. W.," and that, whenever Mrs. Walkup purchased a piece of land, John H. Walkup would, without her knowledge, draw a check against the account standing in the name of "J. W. Young by J. H. W.," and deposit it in said bank to the credit of Mrs. Walkup, and she would draw a check against her account in said bank in favor of the person from whom she had purchased the land, in payment thereof. In other words, John H. Walkup, without the knowledge of his wife, would, when selling her property, collect the proceeds of the sales and deposit them to the account "J. W. Young by J. H. W.," and that whenever she purchased a piece of ground he would draw a check against said account and deposit it in said bank to the credit of his wife, and then she would draw her check against her account in favor of the person from whom she had purchased the land. She had no knowledge of this shifting of accounts made by her husband. There was at no time any money deposited to the account of "J. W. Young by J. H. W." which was not the proceeds of sales of property belonging to Mrs. Walkup. Nor is there any evidence which tends to show that she had any knowledge of the existence of said account, or that her money was being deposited in that or any other account than her own. She understood and believed that the proceeds of the sales of all her property, made by her husband, were being deposited by him in her name; and, so believing, she drew checks against her own account in payment of land purchased by her, or in payment of any other of her indebtedness. J. W. Young had an account of his own in said bank, in which he deposited his own money.

The plaintiff in this case was, for several years prior to the year 1902 and down to the date of the trial, a member of the board of directors of the Bank of Stoutsville, the bank in which all these accounts were kept, and for a year or two just preceding the trial he was the president of said bank. John H. Walkup was shown to have had some horses, mules, and a few head of cattle on the farm of John W. Young, or at least he claimed he owned them; but whether they were the same as those claimed by Mrs. Walkup is not made clear by the evidence. But the evidence is clear that on several occasions he borrowed money and gave chattel mortgages on Mrs. Walkup's live stock to secure the loan, sometimes with her consent, and at other times without her knowledge; that the money thus borrowed was generally used in purchasing other live stock; that from the date of the failure of John H. Walkup to the date of the trial he had paid off and discharged more than $3,000 of his old indebtedness, and that the greater part thereof was paid off with money belonging to his wife, the proceeds of sales of her live stock and from the products of her real estate, the exact amount thereof not appearing, but he testified that it was considerably more than she had used in the purchase of real estate; that respondent John H. Walkup assisted in the care of the real estate, that he attended to and fed the stock, that he assisted in cutting and hauling the cordwood and in clearing and fencing the land, and that he acted as respondent Emma W. Walkup's agent in the transaction of most of the business, buying, selling, and trading stock, marketing the poultry, stock, and cordwood, and collecting the proceeds for her; that respondent John H. Walkup on several occasions gave in to the county assessor for taxation in his own name all the personal property on the premises, including that of respondent Emma W. Walkup, and also sometimes the property of John W. Young. It does not appear from the evidence that Mrs. Walkup knew anything about the property being listed by the assessor in the name of John H. Walkup, or that she in any way consented to it.

It was not shown, and it is not claimed by appellant, that respondent Emma W. Walkup at any time gave her husband, respondent John H. Walkup, authority or assent in writing to sell, incur, or in any manner dispose of any of her personal property. It is not shown, and plaintiff made no effort to show, that respondent John H. Walkup had any means of his own, or that he received money from any source prior to the purchase of the first piece of real estate, which was July 1, 1907, except from the sales of stock or other products of real estate involved in this suit, which Emma W. Walkup claims as her separate property. It appears in evidence that respondent Emma W. Walkup had no knowledge of plain-tiff's judgment against respondent John H. Walkup until the bringing of this action, and that she thought his indebtedness to plaintiff had been paid long before the year 1902.

Upon the evidence introduced the trial court found issues in favor of the defendants, and rendered judgment accordingly for them, and denied the relief asked by the plaintiff. After the motion for a new trial was overruled, the plaintiff duly appealed the cause to this court. Numerous errors are assigned, but we will only consider those bearing upon the merits of the case.

E. T. Fuller and J. P. Boyd, both of Paris, for appellant. Whitecotton & Grimes and F. W. McAllister, all of Paris, for respondents.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). It is not contended by counsel for appellant that their case is made out and supported by the weight of the direct and positive evidence in the case; but, if we correctly understand their position in that respect, they tacitly, at least, concede that the direct and positive testimony in the case is against their theory of the case. But, be that true or false, counsel for appellant plant their case squarely upon a presumption of law, presently to be noted, supported and strengthened, as they contend, by certain undisputed facts in the case, which they state in connection with said presumption.

[1] The contention of counsel for appellant is clearly stated in the following language, viz.: "The fact that the respondents John H. Walkup and Emma W. Walkup were husband and wife at and prior to the date of the obtaining of the original judgment by the appellant herein against the said John H. Walkup, and that the land in controversy was purchased during coverture, being admitted, or, at least, uncontradicted by the evidence in this case, the presumption is that each and every tract of land in controversy was paid for by respondent John H. Walkup, the husband." Counsel for appellant in various ways and in different language restate the foregoing legal proposition, as well as certain well-known rules of evidence, which, if resorted to by the court, would, as they contend, lead to the conclusion above stated. For convenience and brevity, we will consider all of those matters under the one proposition before stated.

Before going directly to the consideration of the presumption above stated, and relied upon by counsel for appellant to make out their case, it may not be out of place in this connection to state that said presumption grew out of and originated under the common law governing domestic relations. Briefly, under that law, the husband and wife were considered one—that is, one person; and the law gave to the husband an estate by curtesy in all of the real estate of which the wife was seised during coverture. It also gave to him all of her personal property, and so much of her choses in action as he reduced to possession during the marital relation (which was generally all of them), and under the common law the wife had no capacity to contract. Consequently, the law having divested her of all property she had at the time of her marriage, and she having no capacity to contract for or purchase other property, and even though she had in any manner acquired other property, real, personal, or mixed, barring uses and trusts, it would under that law have passed to and become the property of the husband in the same manner that her original estate passed to him at the date of the marriage; therefore very naturally the law raised a presumption that, where the wife held the title to real estate or personal property during coverture, the husband paid for the same, and took the title thereto in her name, for the reason that as a rule she had no other way to acquire it. That presumption has been recognized and enforced by the courts of this state and most of the other states of the Union, as well as by the courts of the United States. Lins v. Lenhardt, 127 Mo. 271, 29 S. W. 1025; Sloan v. Torry, 78 Mo. 623; Patton v. Bragg, 113 Mo. 601, 20 S. W. 1059, 35 Am. St. Rep. 730; Seitz v. Mitchell, 94 U. S. 580, 24 L. Ed. 179.

The conditions that existed under the common law and which gave birth to that presumption no longer exist in this or in any of the other states, in so far as my knowledge extends. By section 8304, R. S. 1909, a married woman is empowered to contract, carry on business in her own name, and to sue and be sued, as a feme sole; and by section 8309, R. S. 1909, it is provided that all real estate and personal property, including rights in action, belonging to any woman at the time of her marriage, or which may have come to her during coverture, by gift, bequest, or inheritance, or by purchase with her separate money or means, or be due as the wages of her separate labor, or grow out of any violation of her personal rights, shall, together with all income, increase, and profits thereof, be her separate property and not liable for her husband's debts. The enactment of both of these statutes antedate the matters and things involved in this litigation.

If we adhere to the wise maxim that the reason of the law is the soul of the law, and that when the reason of the law ceases then the law itself ceases, we should attach but little, if any, importance to the presumption before stated, invoked, and relied upon by counsel for appellant, to make out and sustain his case. But give to that veteran presumption, which has served a good and useful purpose in the past, but which has been practically, if not totally, abolished by necessary implication through the enactment of the wise and just statutes governing married women, in this and other states, all the weight it is entitled to, nevertheless we are of the opinion that appellant has wholly failed to make out and support his case, for the reason that this record shows affirmatively that the respondent John H. Walkup was himself totally insolvent, and had no money or means with which he could have purchased and paid for the lands, or any part thereof, involved in this litigation; nor does the evidence show that he earned, accumulated, inherited, or otherwise acquired the money or means with which it was paid for.

[2] But, upon the contrary, the only direct and positive evidence in the case bearing upon that point shows that Emma W. Walkup, the wife of John H., "was the better man of the two," and that by the exercise of good judgment, hard labor, and strict frugality she was enabled to support the family and save and add to the small donation given to her by Mr. Young, when she and her husband went upon his farm to live. Everything she put her hands to turned into gold; and after a few years she had acquired several small pieces of real estate, worth, less the incumbrances thereon, about $1,600. She also accumulated considerable live stock, poultry, and other personal property, about the farm, besides paying off about $3,000 of her husband's old debts, incurred by him while he steered their ship of fortune. Not only that, but the uncontradicted evidence shows that Mrs. Walkup purchased and paid for the Mudd tract of land with her own means, and from that she sold some 800 or 900 cords of wood at $3.50 per cord, which amounted to somewhere between $2,800 and $3,200. This was the only money of any consequence that the evidence shows either of them ever had, and clearly this was the foundation of all their subsequently acquired property. The proceeds of the sales of poultry, eggs, butter, etc., went largely to buy calves, lambs, pigs, and other poultry, and what was not expended in that way was expended for the necessities of life. And I might add that there is not a scintilla of evidence to be found in this record which tends to show that any of said poultry ever at any time belonged to John H. Walkup; but, upon the other hand, the evidence is uncontradicted that John W. Young gave to Mrs. Walkup the first lot of poultry she ever had, and all that which was subsequently found on the premises was the issue of the original stock given to her by Mr. Young. Under the statutes before mentioned, all the real estate and personal property, as well as the issues, rents, and profits thereof, which Mrs. Walkup earned during coverture, belongs to her, and it cannot be taken to satisfy her husband's debts.

[3] Counsel for appellant lay much stress upon the fact that John W. Young had an account of his own in his own name in the Bank of Stoutsville, that John H. Walkup had one in his own name, and one in the name of "John W. Young by J. H. W.," and that Emma Walkup had one in her name, and the fact that John H. Walkup frequently deposited money to the account of "John W. Young by J. H. W.," and would, whenever his wife purchased a piece of land and go to pay for it, draw a check upon the "John W. Young by J. H. W." account, and deposit it to the account of Emma W. Walkup, his wife, and that she would then draw her check on her own account in payment of the purchase price thereof. This juggling of accounts between them it is insisted is evidence of fraud on the part of both Mr. and Mrs. Walkup; that is, that by depositing the money in the account of "John W. Young by J. H. W." they would conceal the fact that either of them had any money in the bank, and that the transfer of the money from the "John W. Young by J. H. W." account to the Emma Walkup account, and the drawing of the check by her on the latter account in favor of the vendor of the land would conceal the fact that John H. Walkup was paying the purchase price, and at the same time make it appear to the outside world that Mrs. Walkup was paying for it with her own money.

This evidence, if standing alone and unexplained, would carry considerable probative force; but, explained as it is, we attach but little importance to it. In the first place, Mrs. Walkup testifies that she never knew or heard that there existed in the bank the "John W. Young by J. H. W." account, or that her husband had ever deposited her money in that account. She testified that she directed him to deposit her money in her own account, that she supposed up to the day of the trial of this cause that he had always done so, and, so believing, whenever she purchased land or wished to pay for anything else, when she did not have the money, she always drew a check on the bank against her own account. This testimony of hers is not contradicted by any of the bank officers, who had charge of the books and accounts of the bank, and who are presumed to know their customers, and to whom the funds deposited in the bank belong.

But, independent of that, it is undisputed that the appellant had been for a number of years a member of the board of directors of this bank, and for a year or two just before the institution of this suit he was the president thereof, and presumably was perfectly familiar with the condition of its accounts; but whether he was actually familiar with them or not is wholly immaterial, for the reason that no person, man or woman, who has any sense whatever, who wanted to perpetrate a fraud upon a person, would go to the bank of that person and open up a series of accounts therein which would expose and lay bare the fraudulent scheme by which the fraud was to be perpetrated. The mere statement of such a proposition condemns its sanity.

[4] Counsel also lay much stress upon the fact that John H. Walkup upon one or two occasions mortgaged some of his wife's live stock. The evidence shows that he did so once or twice without her knowledge, and at other times with her consent. He should not have done so without her knowledge and permission; but the fact that he did so, with or without her knowledge or consent, did not injure appellant. Nor does he so contend, but he insists that the mere fact that he mortgaged them is evidence of the fact that he owned the stock so mortgaged. How can that be? Certainly not, if he got her permission to mortgage them, and equally true, if she had no knowledge of the fact that he had done so. That might be evidence against him, but not against her. That still left the question of ownership of the property open, to be proven or established by competent evidence.

[5] Counsel lastly insist that the fact that John H. Walkup gave to the assessor for assessment a list of the personal property claimed by the wife as his own is evidence of fraud. Concede that said act is an admission of ownership as against him, it is no evidence against her whatever, without it was shown that she had knowledge of the fact, and the record in this case fails to disclose that knowledge. But concede that she had knowledge thereof, and that it was evidence of fraud, nevertheless it was not conclusive evidence of fraud. The question of the ownership of the property in this class of cases is still a question of fact, for the court to determine upon all the evidence in the case, and not one of estoppel. It is not an uncommon thing for a husband, with or without the knowledge of the wife, to give in her property in his own name for taxation. I dare say that it is given in that way more frequently than it is given in in her own name. And it is a well-known fact that in the great majority of cases it is done in that way for convenience or thoughtlessly. The husband, wishing to pay the taxes on his wife's personal property, never thinks of making out a separate list of her property; nor, as a rule, does the question of fraud enter his mind. From a sense of duty and a spirit of generosity toward his wife springs the desire to pay her taxes and other obligations, and for convenience merely he includes her property in his list.

This is common knowledge, and to hold as a matter of law that such conduct is fraudulent in this class of cases would stamp the seal of disapproval upon one of the noblest and most generous spirits that abides in the human heart. I am not saying that such conduct may not be the result of a fraudulent design, or that it may not be evidence of fraud where credit has been extended upon it; but what I do say is this: That it is but one fact or circumstance which tends to show fraud, but standing alone, and uncorroborated by other facts and circumstances indicating a fraudulent intent, is itself insufficient for that purpose. Evidently this was the view the trial court took of the matter, and caused him to find for the respondents. In our opinion that finding was right, and that the evidence in this case was insufficient to sustain the allegations of the petition.

So believing, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered. All concur.

HUNTER et al. v. PEMISCOT LAND & COOPERAGE CO.

Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. QUIETING TITLE (§ 22*)—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF—SUFFICIENCY—COMMON SOURCE.

In an action under Rev. St. 1890, § 650, to quiet title, where there was no assumed or agreed common source of title in the pleadings, but plaintiff undertook to deraign a record title from one P., and defendant relied upon a deed from P. and another, a common source of title in P. was not shown, and plaintiff, claiming only a paper title, was thereby forced to show a good paper title.

2. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 61*)—SWAMP LANDS—CERTIFICATE OF ENTRY—OPERATION.

A mere certificate of entry on swamp lands is insufficient to pass title, although a receiver's receipt, showing that the purchase price has been paid, gives the person making the payment an equitable interest in the land described in the receipt.

3. RECORDS (§ 17*)—SUPPLYING LOST RECORD—ABSTRACTS—EFFECT.

Act March 28, 1901 (Laws 1901, p. 251), making Carleton's Abstract Books, or certified copies of the entries therein, prima facie evidence of the matter and entries therein contained as taken from the records of Pemiscot county prior to their destruction, has no reference to entries in a register's book of locations on public swamp lands, as such register is not a public record required by law to be kept, and hence the entries from such abstract book are not admissible as prima facie evidence of entries in such register.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Records, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 26, 28-35; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pemiscot County; Henry C. Riley, Judge.

Action by Sterling P. Hunter and others against the Pemiscot Land & Cooperage Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Action under old section 650 to quiet title. Petition is short, but in the usual form. By a supplemental abstract, filed by respondent, appears a lengthy answer. This additional and supplemental abstract is not attacked by the appellants, and hence the answer therein set out must be taken as the proper pleading in the case, although it differs from the answer set out in appellants' abstract. By the supplemental abstract, respondent challenged the correctness of appellants' abstract. By this answer, the defendant, now respondent, says: (1) That it is the owner of the lands in dispute and denies that plaintiffs have any title or interest therein; (2) it pleads the 10-year statute of limitations, averring that it and its grantors have been in the open, notorious, and peaceable possession of said lands for more than 10 years; (3) it invokes the 30-year statute of limitations; and (4) the answer then concludes with the invocation of the 10-year statute of limitations from another angle in this language: "And defendant, for its other and further answer and defense herein, avers that under the provisions of section 1 of an act entitled 'An act to enlarge the jurisdiction of courts of record in suits to determine and quiet the title to real estate,' approved March 15, 1897 (Laws 1897, p. 74), plaintiffs were at said last-mentioned date empowered to institute this action; that the time in said act and in section 650 of the Revised Statutes of 1899, under and by virtue of which plaintiffs were empowered to sue, expired on March 15, 1907, and that plaintiff did not commence this action until June 14, 1907, more than 10 years after he was by said statute empowered to do so, and that by reason of said facts and of said statute plaintiff is now barred from prosecuting or maintaining this action; and defendant pleads these facts and the above statute of limitations, and all of them, in bar of this suit. And defendant again prays judgment, and for his costs in this behalf sustained. And defendant, having fully answered, now again prays judgment, and let it go hence with its costs."

After a finding of facts, the judgment entered is in this language: "It is therefore considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the plaintiffs, Sterling C. Hunter and Lella Hunter, nor either of them, have no right, title, or interest in and to the lands in controversy, and that the defendant, so far as plaintiffs are concerned, have the title in and to said land in fee; that plaintiffs take nothing by their suit herein, and that defendant recover of and from plaintiffs its costs expended herein and have execution therefor." From such adverse judgment, the plaintiffs have appealed.

Pierce, Reeves & Brewer, of Caruthersville, for appellants. Faris & Oliver, of Caruthersville, for respondent.

GRAVES, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] From the pleadings it will be observed that there is no assumed or agreed common source of title. Nor does the record, other than the pleadings, show an agreed or assumed common source of title. Neither does the record show a proven common source of title. Going to the evidence, the plaintiffs by a record title showing undertake to deraign title through one Thomas C. Powell. They attempt to show that Thomas C. Powell bought the land from Pemiscot county, and that by sheriff's deed it passed to John E. Powell, and that they succeeded to John E. Powell's title. Defendant relies upon a deed from Thomas C. Powell and John H. Powell, so far as they rely at all upon a record title. This deed, however, was subsequent in date to the alleged sheriff's deed, mentioned supra. Had defendant undertaken to deraign title through Thomas C. Powell alone, and offered in evidence such an instrument, it might be well said that by the proof a common source of title was shown, but such is not this case. There is a vast difference between a deed from Thomas C. Powell alone, and one from Thomas C. Powell and John H. Powell. We had a very similar question up in the case of Nall v. Conover, 223 Mo. loc. cit. 492, 122 S. W. 1039. In that case there was a title bond by Thomas C. Powell and John H. Powell shown, and we held under the facts and pleadings in that case that we could not proceed with the case upon the theory of a common source of title. The reasoning there meets the situation here, and the contention of the plaintiffs, to the effect that there was shown a common source of title in Thomas C. Powell, must be ruled against them on the strength of the Conover Case, supra. With this question to the side, there is but little left to the case. Plaintiffs were thereby forced to show a good paper title, for they claimed title in no other way. Nall v. Conover, supra. If there was a link out of their title, the judgment must be against them.

[2, 3] These lands were swamp lands, and the law relating thereto was fully reviewed in the Nall-Conover Case. We there held that a mere certificate of entry was insufficient to pass any title. We then said, and now say, that if there was a receiver's receipt in evidence, showing that such land had been paid for, it would give the payor an equitable interest in the lands described in such receipt. But this holding cannot avail the plaintiffs in this case. The only thing offered in evidence to show the transfer of the title to Thomas C. Powell from Pemiscot county is Carleton's abstract of a registry entry in Register's Book 1, page 52. This record we held in the Nall-Conover Case was not a public record required by law to be kept, and for that reason Carleton's abstract thereof did not make it evidence under the act of 1901. We further hold that, even if it was properly admitted as evidence, it would show no title in Thos. C. Powell. The whole matter is fully discussed in the Nall-Conover Case, supra, and we shall not go further. Under the ruling made in that case, and in the subsequent case of Whitman v. Giesing, 224 Mo. loc. cit.

615, 123 S. W. 1052, the plaintiffs in this case failed to make out a case.

Other questions urged need not be discussed. The Nall-Conover Case, supra, should be read in connection with this opinion.

The judgment nisi is affirmed. All concur.

STATE ex rel. GRAHAM et al. v. SEEHORN, Judge.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Nov. 26, 1912.
Motion for Rehearing Denied
Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. COURTS (§ 188*)—MUNICIPAL COURTS—EMINENT DOMAIN.

Kansas City Charter, art. 6, conferring jurisdiction on the municipal court in proceedings by the city to condemn private property for street purposes, is valid under Const. art. 9, § 16, authorizing cities of over 100,000 inhabitants to adopt charters for their own government consistent with the Constitution and laws of the state, and article 6, § 1, providing for municipal corporation courts, but not fixing their jurisdiction, since the condemnation of property for public streets is purely a matter of municipal concern.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 437-468; Dec. Dig. § 188.*]

2. COURTS (§ 472*)—EXCLUSIVE OR CONCURRENT JURISDICTION—EMINENT DOMAIN.

Circuit courts have not exclusive original jurisdiction of proceedings to condemn property for street purposes in Kansas City under Const. art. 6, § 22, giving them exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil cases not otherwise provided for, since such cases are otherwise provided for by Kansas City Charter, art. 6, conferring concurrent jurisdiction on the municipal court of that city.

3. PROHIBITION (§ 11*)—GROUNDS FOR RELIEF—EXCEEDING JURISDICTION.

On an appeal in a proceeding by a city to acquire property for street purposes, the validity of the ordinance upon which the proceeding rests or the fact that parties are not regularly before the court in the manner prescribed by the city charter do not affect the court's jurisdiction, and it will not therefore be prevented by prohibition from acting in the matter.

Graves and Woodson, JJ., dissenting.

In Banc. Original prohibition proceeding by the State, on the relation of George S. Graham and others, against Thomas J. Seehorn, Judge of the Circuit Court of Jackson County. On demurrer to the return. Preliminary rule quashed and writ denied.

Douglass & Watson, Ball & Ryland, and E. J. White, all of Kansas City, for relators. A. F. Evans, John G. Schaich, Hunt C. Moore, A. F. Smith, John G. Park, and Jay M. Lee, all of Kansas City, for respondent. C. S. McLane, W. C. Culbertson, and R. W. Crimm, all of Kansas City, amici curiæ.

KENNISH, J. This is an original proceeding by prohibition. The relators are owners of real estate in a proposed benefit district in a certain condemnation proceeding in Kansas City. Respondent is judge of division No. 3 of the circuit court of Jackson county, in which division the said condemnation proceeding is now pending. The purpose of this suit is that respondent, as judge of said court, may be prohibited by the writ of this court from further holding cognizance of said condemnation proceeding. A preliminary rule in prohibition was granted upon the filing of the petition. In due time respondent filed his return thereto, and relators filed a demurrer to the return. Upon the issues of law thus presented the case stands before us for decision.

There is a companion case to the case in hand, entitled State ex rel. Tuller et al. v. Seehorn, 151 S. W. 724, now under submission in this court. It was brought at the same time, arises out of the same litigation nisi, and is against the same respondent; but the relators therein are the owners of the property sought to be taken for public use in said condemnation proceedings, and they ask this court to issue its writ of prohibition against the respondent upon grounds different from and antagonistic to those relied upon by relators in this case.

The facts admitted by the pleadings herein, and as gathered from the petition and return, are substantially as follows:

In June, 1909, ordinance 3,209 was enacted by the common council of Kansas City, for the purpose of widening and improving Sixth street between Broadway and Bluff streets, and to that end providing for the condemnation of the necessary adjacent property; also creating a benefit district and fixing the limits thereof, in which, for benefits received, the property should be subject to the payment of special tax assessments to meet the cost of the proposed improvement. The municipal court, after a plat of the property to be taken had been delivered to the clerk thereof, made an order directed to "all persons whom it may concern," appointing a day and place for impaneling a jury to ascertain the compensation for the property to be taken and to make assessments to pay the same, as required by section 2 of article 6 of the charter of said city. A copy of the order was published in the proper newspaper, and the parties owning real estate proposed to be taken were duly served with a copy of said order. In accordance with the order and notice a jury was impaneled, and, after hearing the evidence and viewing the property, it returned a verdict fixing and allowing the compensation for the property to be taken, assessing against the city the amount of the benefits to the city and to the public, and assessing against the several lots and parcels of property within the benefit district the balance of said compensation, as a special tax and assessment, according to the benefits received. The verdict was confirmed by the common council, judgment rendered thereon by the municipal court, and, no appeal having been taken therefrom, the verdict was sent to the office of the city treasurer for the collection of such special assessments, and more than one-half of the total amount so assessed was paid.

Some of the owners of property in the benefit district refused to pay their assessments and brought an injunction suit against the city to restrain and enjoin the collection of said assessments, upon the ground that the notice of the order for the impaneling of the jury by the municipal court had not been published as required by the provisions of the charter, and upon the further ground that the municipal court was without jurisdiction to proceed under ordinance 3,209, and that the proceedings in said municipal court were null and void. Upon the assumption that the publication of said order was defective and the subsequent proceedings invalid, another ordinance, 6,686, was introduced in the common council for the purpose of repealing ordinance 3,209 and beginning the proceedings for the proposed improvement anew. Thereupon the owners of the property to be taken, and for which compensation had been allowed pursuant to ordinance 3,209, and which was also proposed to be taken under ordinance 6,686, brought an injunction suit against the city to restrain and enjoin the officers thereof from repealing said ordinance 3,209, upon the ground that compensation had been awarded for the property so taken and that, as the verdict and judgment therefor was unappealed from, the same had become a final judgment under which rights had become vested and which could not be set aside or annulled by enactment of the common council. Both injunction suits were heard before respondent at the same time, and the issues were found in favor of the plaintiffs in each case. In the injunction suit brought by the property owners of the benefit district who had refused to pay their assessments (relators herein), the court in its decree, after finding that "said proceedings, verdict, confirmation thereof, and judgment is, as to these plaintiffs and each of them and as to their respective properties, null and void," proceeded as follows: "It is therefore considered, ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said verdict, judgment, and proceedings, in so far as they affect or purport to affect plaintiffs or any of them or any of their said several properties, be and the same are hereby annulled and for naught held; that the several assessments against the respective properties aforesaid of the plaintiffs and each of them be and the same are hereby set aside and annulled; that defendants Kansas City, M. A. Flynn, city clerk, U. S. Weary, clerk of said municipal court, and the officers and agents of said city, be and they are each of them perpetually restrained and enjoined from making out, certifying, or attesting any tax bills against the several properties of the plaintiffs or any of them under and by virtue of said assessments; and that plaintiffs have and recover of and from defendant Kansas City the costs herein expended and have execution therefor." No appeal was taken from the judgment and decree in either of said injunction suits.

Section 23 of article 6 of the charter of Kansas City, under which said condemnation proceedings were being prosecuted, is as follows: "When by reason of any error, defect or omission in any proceedings, or in the verdict or judgment therein that may be instituted under the provisions of this article, a portion of the private property sought to be taken, or some interest therein, cannot be acquired, or an assessment is made against private property which cannot be enforced or collected, or when, by reason of any such defect, private property in the benefit district is omitted, the city may, by ordinance, institute, carry on and maintain supplemental proceedings to acquire the right and title to such property or interest therein intended to be taken by the first proceeding, but which cannot on account of such defect, error or omission, be acquired thereunder, or to properly assess against any piece or parcel of private property against which an assessment was in the first proceeding erroneously made or omitted to be made, the proper amount such private property, exclusive of the improvements thereon, is benefited by the proposed improvement to be determined by the verdict of the jury in such supplemental proceedings; and the original assessment may be revived, corrected, increased or diminished as may be necessary or equitable under the provisions of this article for the original proceedings. Such supplemental proceedings shall be instituted and conducted as to the particular piece or pieces of private property sought to be acquired or assessed in like manner and with like effect as in the original proceedings, and shall be known and described as supplemental proceedings for the purposes specified in the original ordinance; and a supplemental verdict and assessment shall be made, confirmed and copies of the original verdict certified in every particular as in the original proceedings; and the assessments as established and corrected by such supplemental verdict shall be collected by the City Treasurer in the same manner and under like conditions and restrictions, powers and duties as in the case of original proceedings."

In the month of February, 1911, after the injunction against the city had been made perpetual, restraining the enforcement of the special assessments in the benefit district under ordinance 3,209, the common council passed, and the mayor approved, ordinance 7,539, which is as follows:

"An ordinance providing for, authorizing and directing the institution, carrying on and maintaining of supplemental proceedings to properly assess benefits against certain pieces and parcels of land included within the benefit district prescribed by ordinance No. 3,209, approved October 19, 1909.

"Whereas the common council of Kansas City, Missouri, passed an ordinance entitled 'An ordinance to open and widen Sixth street from the east line of Bluff street to the west line of Broadway,' approved July 14, 1909, which said ordinance was numbered 3,209 and was duly approved October 19, 1909, and whereas proceedings were instituted under said ordinance in the municipal court of Kansas City to condemn the land in said ordinance described and a verdict was rendered in said municipal court, and whereas by reason of certain errors, defects and omissions certain assessments were made against land in the benefit district prescribed by said ordinance which cannot be enforced or collected and certain pieces of private property in the benefit district were omitted and not assessed by said verdict, and whereas in order to pay the total amount of damages awarded for land taken and damaged by said condemnation it was and is necessary and required that said certain pieces and parcels of land shall be assessed if they are deemed benefited by the jury: Now therefore be it ordained by the common council of Kansas City:

"Section 1. That the mayor and city counselor are hereby authorized and directed to institute, carry on and maintain supplemental proceedings to properly assess against any piece or parcel of private property within the benefit district prescribed in ordinance No. 3,209, approved October 19, 1909, against which an assessment was in the first proceeding wrongfully made or which was omitted to be made the proper amount such private property, exclusive of the improvements thereon, is benefited by the proposed improvement, such amount to be determined by the verdict of a jury in such supplemental proceedings as provided by article 6 of the Charter of Kansas City.

"Sec. 2. Nothing in this ordinance contained shall be held to limit the scope of such supplemental proceedings but such proceedings shall be deemed to be for all purposes authorized by article 6 of the Charter of Kansas City.

"Sec. 3. Such supplemental proceedings shall be begun in division No. 1 of the municipal court of Kansas City and shall be known and designated as supplemental proceedings for the purposes specified in said ordinance numbered 3,209.

"Sec. 4. All ordinances or parts of ordinances in conflict with this ordinance are in so far as they conflict with this ordinance hereby repealed."

The preliminary steps having been properly taken under said ordinance 7,539, an order was made by the municipal court and due notice published of the time and place fixed "for impaneling a jury to properly assess against any piece or parcel of private property within the benefit district above described, against which an assessment in the original proceedings was wrongfully made or which assessment was omitted to be made, the proper amount such private property, exclusive of the improvements thereon, is benefited by the proposed improvement." On the 31st day of May, 1911, the jury impaneled under said ordinance 7,539, as stated by relators, "returned into said municipal court their verdict purporting to assess the sum of $168,004.57 (being the amount of compensation found by the jury in the aforesaid proceedings under ordinance No. 3,209 to be paid to the owners of property taken or damaged) against the city and the property in said benefit district, including the property of the relators; that there are over 13,000 lots and parcels of land within the benefit district prescribed by said ordinance No. 3,209; that the jury's verdict in said so-called supplemental proceedings was in all respects precisely the same as to the amount of benefits as the verdict returned in the original proceedings." The verdict thus returned was duly confirmed by ordinance and judgment rendered thereon by the municipal court, as in the former proceedings. An appeal was then taken to the circuit court of Jackson county, by the owners of the property in the benefit district whose property had been assessed with benefits in the supplemental proceedings and who had not paid the assessments theretofore made pursuant to the provisions of ordinance 3,209. In the circuit court the cause was assigned to division No. 3, over which division respondent presides. When the trial was about to be commenced in said division, respondent announced it as his opinion that the case should be tried de novo, "as though it were a trial of proceedings under ordinance No. 3,209, and that there should be ascertained before him, independent of previous proceedings, the amount of damages to be allowed for property taken or damaged, and the amount of assessments to be levied against property in the benefit district as benefits from the opening and widening of said street." Thereupon relators gave notice of an application to this court for a writ of prohibition, and further proceedings before respondent were suspended.

Upon the foregoing facts, relators contend: "(a) That they have the right of appeal from the municipal court after the conclusion of the so-called supplemental proceedings. (b) That the municipal court never had any jujurisdiction of the original proceedings under ordinance No. 3,209, or of the supplemental proceedings under ordinance No. 7,539; that the municipal court never had any power or authority to hear and determine said cause in either proceeding, or to impanel a jury for that purpose, or to render any judgment at any time in said cause; that all of the proceedings in said municipal court were null and void and without jurisdiction, and consequently the circuit court on appeal is without jurisdiction; and that said proceedings should be dismissed by the respondent."

It should be stated in explanation of relators' proposition "a," which seemingly has no place in a proceeding challenging the jurisdiction of respondent in the case sought to be prohibited, that relators, in the companion case heretofore referred to, make the contention that no appeal is authorized by the charter of Kansas City from supplemental proceedings under said section 23 of article 6. But whether that contention be well founded or not, it is obvious that the successful affirmance of the proposition that an appeal was authorized from the municipal court to the circuit court in the supplemental proceedings under ordinance 7,539 would not tend to show want of jurisdiction or excess of jurisdiction in respondent to hear the condemnation proceedings on appeal, and therefore affords no ground for relief by prohibition.

Relators have set forth in their brief eight separate points or propositions which they learnedly argue in support of their right to the relief prayed for. In the view we take of the case, we think their contentions may be disposed of under two heads, as follows: First. "The charter of Kansas City could not confer original civil jurisdiction on the municipal court, and so much of sections 1 and 2 of article 6, and section 10 of article 4, of the charter of 1908, as purports to do so, is violative of sections 1, 22, 34, 36, and 37, article 6, of the Constitution of Missouri, and section 15 of the Schedule of the Constitution, conferring jurisdiction exclusively on circuit courts, except as otherwise provided, and of section 16 of article 9 of said Constitution, authorizing Kansas City to frame and adopt a charter, and is inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the state." Second. That the proceedings and judgments of the municipal court under ordinance 3,209 and also under ordinance 7,539 are void for noncompliance with the charter.

[1] I. The first proposition demanding consideration is that of the jurisdiction of the municipal court in condemnation proceedings, as provided for by article 6 of the charter. If that court was without jurisdiction, it follows that the circuit court acquired none on appeal, and relators in such case are entitled to relief.

Article 6 of the charter of Kansas City purports to confer jurisdiction upon the municipal court, in proceedings to condemn private property "for straightening, opening, widening, extending or altering, for public use, any street, avenue, alley," etc., and also jurisdiction in supplemental proceedings for the same purposes in case of an error or defect in original proceedings. The same article provides for an appeal in condemnation proceedings from the municipal court to the circuit court of Jackson county, where the cause shall be tried de novo. By section 10 of article 4 of the charter the municipal court is created and its jurisdiction and powers prescribed. It is there provided that: "The municipal court and each division thereof shall have jurisdiction of all cases arising under any provision of this charter or any ordinance of the city and shall likewise exercise such jurisdiction as may be delegated to it by the general law of the state of Missouri." Section 1 of article 6 of the Constitution of this state is as follows: "The judicial power of the state, as to matters of law and equity, except as in this Constitution otherwise provided, shall be vested in a Supreme Court, the St. Louis Court of Appeals, circuit courts, criminal courts, probate courts, county courts and municipal corporation courts." Section 16 of article 9 of the same instrument vests in cities of over 100,000 inhabitants power to adopt a charter for its own government "consistent with the Constitution and laws of this state." In the exercise of that power, the qualified voters of Kansas City, in the year 1908, adopted the present charter, which created the municipal court and clothed it with apparent jurisdiction in condemnation proceedings in the taking of property for public use and providing for the payment of compensation therefor.

Upon the foregoing provisions of the Constitution and the charter respondent rests his jurisdiction in the case pending before him. It cannot be doubted that the framers of the charter intended to confer upon the municipal court the jurisdiction challenged in this proceeding. The charter provisions upon that subject are clear and explicit. The sole question is as to the power of the people of Kansas City to lodge such judicial authority in a municipal court. Relators do not deny that municipal courts form a part of the judicial system of this state. The Constitution expressly makes them such, but the Constitution does not prescribe the bounds of their jurisdiction; neither does it prescribe the authority under which such courts shall be established and their jurisdiction fixed, and therein lies the root of the relators' contention. Doubtless, if the inhabitants of Kansas City had not availed themselves of the right to adopt a charter, the General Assembly of the state, as the repository of general legislative power, would have had full constitutional warrant to provide a charter for the city, to create a mu-municipal court, and to define its jurisdiction, even over such subjects as the relators dispute in the present proceeding. Indeed, that was the recognized source of the authority of this municipality in such matters prior to the adoption of the Constitution of 1875 and long thereafter.

Respondent maintains that the condemnation of property for public streets is purely a matter of municipal concern, and that as the Constitution, by section 18 of article 9, conferred upon the qualified voters of the city full power and control over such matters, by the adoption of a charter and making provisions therefor, the voters may thus speak with authority equal to that of the General Assembly in the absence of such charter. It will be observed that the power thus vested in the voters of the city is not conditioned upon any action to be taken by the General Assembly, but is absolute and direct from the source of all governmental power, subject only to the condition that such charter shall be consistent with the Constitution and laws of the state.

That the jurisdiction thus conferred upon the municipal court is not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of this state is further affirmed upon the fact that the Enabling Act, enacted by the General Assembly in the year 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 42), and made applicable to Kansas City, provided that the charter adopted by the city should "constitute the entire organic law of the city and should supersede all laws then in force not otherwise governing or appertaining to cities having one hundred thousand inhabitants or more," and that by a further provision of said act the city is expressly given "exclusive control over its public highways, streets," etc.

On the other hand, it is urged by relators that as the Constitution does not define the jurisdiction of "municipal corporation courts," and that as section 22 of article 6 thereof confers upon circuit courts "exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil cases not otherwise provided for," the circuit court alone has jurisdiction over such civil proceedings as the condemnation of real estate for public use. We are not favorably impressed with this argument. Under repeated decisions of this court it is settled beyond question that the condemnation of property in municipalities, for use as public streets, is a matter pertaining to local municipal government as contradistinguished from such as belong to the domain of general state control; and, further, that the procedure prescribed by the charter in such condemnation cases, "not inimical to the general scope of the policy of our Constitution and laws," will prevail as against provisions of the general law upon the same subject. The language last quoted was used by Lamm, J., in the case of Brunn v. Kansas City, 216 Mo., loc. cit. 117, 115 S. W. 449, and, discussing the procedure prescribed by the charter in the exercise of the right of eminent domain, it is further said: "Such special provisions may be likened to exceptions read into and grafted on the general law." These propositions are fully supported by the following authorities: Brunn v. Kansas City, 216 Mo. 103, 115 S. W. 446; State ex rel. v. Telephone Co., 189 Mo. 83, 88 S. W. 41; Kansas City v. Bacon, 147 Mo. 259, 48 S. W. 860; State ex rel. v. Field, 90 Mo. 352, 12 S. W. 802; Kansas City v. Oil Co., 140 Mo. 458, 41 S. W. 943; Kansas City v. Ward, 134 Mo. 172, 35 S. W. 600; Kansas City ex rel. v. Scarritt, 127 Mo. 642, 29 S. W. 845, 30 S. W. 111.

From the foregoing it follows that, as the proceedings sought to be prohibited involved a subject of purely local concern,* it was within the power of the city to confer jurisdiction thereof upon the municipal court, as provided in its charter. That jurisdiction rests upon the same well-recognized basis as the jurisdiction of municipal or police courts in prosecutions for violations of city ordinances, enacted for the good order and health of the people. Proceedings under ordinances of the class last mentioned have always been held by this court to be civil cases, and therefore any argument based upon the exclusive jurisdiction of the circuit court in civil cases is equally as valid against the exercise of jurisdiction by a municipal court for the violation of any city ordinance, as in case of a proceeding to condemn real estate for a public street.

[2] By the adoption of the charter creating the municipal court and conferring jurisdiction thereon in condemnation proceedings, and by authority of the Enabling Act, if such were necessary, we are of the opinion that the circuit court was deprived of exclusive original jurisdiction in such civil cases, for the reason that jurisdiction was otherwise provided for within the meaning of said section 22 of article 6 of the Constitution.

[3] II. The question remains as to the invalidity of ordinances 3,209 and 7,539 and the judgments and proceedings of the municipal court thereunder, for noncompliance with the provisions of the charter.

We have held that the municipal court had jurisdiction of condemnation proceedings, and also that respondent, as judge of the circuit court, had jurisdiction on appeal from the municipal court. That jurisdiction over the persons of the relators was obtained in the cause sought to be prohibited is shown by the facts alleged in the return and admitted by the demurrer. These propositions being conceded, it follows that the circuit court, being possessed of the cause on appeal from the municipal court, was clothed with judicial power to determine the validity of the ordinance or ordinances upon which the condemnation proceedings rested; to determine the question whether the parties in interest were legally before the court in the manner prescribed by the charter, as well as any other question arising in the course of the trial. Such questions did not strike at the jurisdiction of the court, but at the regularity and validity of the proceedings up to that stage, and when the respondent decided, or was about to decide, adversely to the contention of the relators, he was acting neither without jurisdiction nor in excess of jurisdiction, but deciding such issues as arose in a cause rightfully before him and which that court alone was clothed with authority to decide. It is well-settled law that, so long as a court is proceeding within the sphere of its judicial authority, it is not amenable to the writ of prohibition. Delaney v. Police Court, 167 Mo. 667, 67 S. W. 589, and authorities cited; State ex rel. v. Tracy, 237 Mo. 109, 140 S. W. 888, 37 L. R. A. (N. S.) 448, and authorities cited; State ex rel. v. Shannon, 130 Mo. App. 90, 108 S. W. 1097.

In the Delaney Case, supra (167 Mo., loc. cit. 679, 67 S. W. 592), this court said: "The jurisdiction of the police court to try cases for violation of municipal police regulations, leveled at disorderly conduct and drunkenness on the streets, is exclusive. Its procedure in the exercise of its jurisdiction may or may not be erroneous, but so long as it has jurisdiction, and acts within its jurisdiction, its rulings and proceedings cannot be reviewed or corrected by means of a writ of prohibition, no matter how erroneous such rulings and proceedings may be. Mere error or irregularity or mistake, be it ever so manifest, which does not amount to an excess of jurisdiction, will not be ground for a prohibition. Lloyd on Prohibition, p. 48; Shortt on Mand. & Prohib. marg. p. 436; 19 Am. & Eng. Ency. Law (1st Ed.) p. 263. A writ of prohibition 'cannot be made to perform the functions of an appeal, a writ of error or a certiorari, its purpose being, not to correct errors, but to prevent a usurpation of jurisdiction.'"

And in the Tracy Case, supra (237 Mo., loc. cit. 125, 140 S. W. 893, 37 L. R. A. [N. S.] 448), this court said: "There is no fact alleged tending to show the exercise or threatened exercise of jurisdiction in excess of his judicial power and authority, or that he has assumed or is about to assume any power other than that conferred upon him by the charter of the city and required of him by his oath of office. While so acting in the line of his duty and within the scope of his judicial power as prescribed by the charter, it cannot be maintained, in the light of the authorities heretofore cited, that he should be restrained and prohibited by the extraordinary writ of prohibition which issues only to prevent the usurpation of judicial power."

Under the law governing the issuance of writs of prohibition, we are of the opinion that the respondent, in the matters complained of, was not guilty of usurpation of judicial authority, and that therefore the preliminary rule should be quashed and the writ denied. It is so ordered.

LAMM and BROWN, JJ., concur. VALLIANT, C. J., and FERRISS, J., concur in separate opinion by VALLIANT, C. J. GRAVES and WOODSON, JJ., dissent in opinion filed by GRAVES, J.

VALLIANT, C. J. If the question of jurisdiction in the municipal court of cases of this kind were one of first impression, I would concur in the dissenting opinion filed by my Brother GRAVES. But on looking back over the cases that have been decided by this court I have come to the conclusion that, whilst the question has not been directly decided by this court, yet cases have been here in which the question might have been raised but was not, and the subject was passed over in silence, the jurisdiction apparently acquiesced in by the parties and not questioned by the court. In its first charter adopted in 1889 by Kansas City, under section 16, art. 9, there was created a mayor's court, upon which was conferred jurisdiction in cases of this kind, and which the charter of 1909 now confers on the municipal court. Thus for more than 20 years the city has acted on the assumption that it had authority to create such a court and confer on it such jurisdiction. In that period, doubtless, property rights have been acquired to a great extent, and I believe it would now be unwise to declare that rights which have arisen out of the exercise of such jurisdiction by such courts cannot be upheld.

For this reason I concur in the opinion of Brother KENNISH in this case.

FERRISS, J., concurs in these views.

GRAVES, J. I dissent from the majority opinion in this case. I shall not take the time to block out my views in my own language, because they have been elegantly expressed by our Chief Justice, in a dissenting opinion, which he prepared, and which at one time was indorsed by a majority of this bench. Owing to imagined disastrous results, some of my Brothers have concurred in a modified way in the present majority opinion. For myself, I prefer to stand upon the law and the state Constitution, irrespective of results. It is for the people to rewrite the Constitution and not for the courts. For the court to rewrite it in this instance only furnishes a precedent to further discard the organic law.

As expressive of my views of this case, I therefore adopt the dissenting opinion prepared by our Chief Justice VALLIANT, as follows:

"I cannot concur in the judgment denying the writ of prohibition because in my opinion the municipal court of Kansas City had no jurisdiction of this cause or of suits of this kind, although the city charter essays to confer such jurisdiction.

"Section 16, art. 9, of our state Constitution says: 'Any city having a population of more than one hundred thousand inhabitants may frame a charter for its own government, consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state.' That clause of the Constitution was designed to give the city power to make a charter for itself which would be beyond the power of the General Assembly to repeal or amend. But the charter so authorized is restricted by the term of the grant to be for the city's 'own government,' and it must be 'consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state.' It is for city government, not state government, that the Constitution confers this power on the city. The words 'consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state' show an express purpose to withhold from the city the power to include in its charter governmental subjects that belong to the state as distinguished from subjects of mere municipal government. A charter adopted by the city in compliance with the terms of that clause of the Constitution can be amended only by a vote of the people in the city, not by the General Assembly. There have been numerous decisions by this court construing this clause of the Constitution as well as a somewhat similar clause relating to the city of St. Louis. I will not lengthen this opinion by reviewing those cases, they will be found in the annotations in the Revised Statutes 1909 at pages 113-115. What I have above said is, in my opinion, in conformity with those decisions.

"Kansas City, under authority of section 16, art. 9, has adopted a charter, and in the charter it has created a court called the municipal court of Kansas City, and has attempted to confer on that court, besides the jurisdiction that usually belongs to a city police court, jurisdiction in suits to collect taxes, suits for the enforcement of special tax bills, proceedings for taking and damaging private property, for ascertaining damages caused by change of grade or other exercise of the power of eminent domain. Those are subjects which in my opinion belong to the jurisdiction of the state courts, not to the city courts.

"The municipal court of Kansas City is merely a city court. The charter (section 10, art. 4) says: 'There is hereby created a court not of record to be known as the municipal court of Kansas City.' It is a court 'not of record.' It has no origin except the city charter. The charter provides that the judge shall be elected by the people of the city, but it could as well, without changing the character of the court, have provided that he be appointed by the mayor. It does provide that, if a vacancy occurs in the office, it is to be filled by election by the common council, and until the common council elects, the mayor may appoint to fill the vacancy. The charter also declares that the judge of the municipal court shall be ex officio a justice of the peace and exercise the jurisdiction and powers conferred by law on justices of the peace.

"The right of eminent domain is a sovereign right. It can be exercised only by the state or by permission or grant of authority from the state. The state has granted to Kansas City the power of eminent domain in the matter of opening, widening, and grading its streets, the taking and damaging of private property for public use; but it has not granted to the city the right to create its own court for that purpose, and nowhere in the state except Kansas City is that right claimed. The right to exercise the power of eminent domain is one thing, it is a right essential to the city government therefore properly covered in the charter adopted by the city under section 16, art. 9, 'for its own government'; but the court in which that right is to be enforced or litigated is quite another thing. The grant of the right does not carry with it the power to create the court, nor is such power to be implied ex necessitate because the state has already established its courts to try such cases. Section 22, art. 6, of the Constitution confers on the circuit court 'exclusive original jurisdiction in all civil cases not otherwise provided for.' This is a law not local in its character, but applicable to the whole state, and the term 'not otherwise provided for' means not otherwise provided for by a state law; until a state law otherwise provides, the charter must be 'consistent with and subject to that law.' In every county in the state, Jackson county not excepted, there was at the time this charter was adopted, and still is, a circuit court having jurisdiction to try causes involving rights claimed by the city under the power of eminent domain as also suits to collect taxes, and suits on special tax bills, and therefore, when the city undertook by its charter to confer jurisdiction in such matters on its municipal court, it did not conform 'to the constitutional laws of this state,' but it undertook in effect to repeal the state law as to the exclusiveness of the jurisdiction of the state court.

"It is true the charter says that the municipal court shall exercise jurisdiction in such cases concurrent with the circuit court, but that does not alter the case. The question is not whether the charter could confer on the municipal court exclusive jurisdiction, but whether it could confer such jurisdiction at all. The jurisdiction attempted to be conferred is full and complete, though not exclusive. If the court is given jurisdiction to try such cases, its jurisdiction in any such case that is brought before it would not be impaired by the suggestion that the suit might have been brought in another court which has concurrent jurisdiction. In the very section of the charter (section 10, art. 4) which attempts to confer jurisdiction in such cases on the municipal court, the jurisdiction of the circuit court also is recognized. The charter seems to proceed on the idea that because it does not repeal the state law which gives the circuit court jurisdiction, but only creates a city court giving it concurrent jurisdiction, it is 'consistent with and subject to the Constitution and laws of this state.' The charter does not in so many words attempt to repeal the state law which gives the circuit court jurisdiction, but it does attempt in effect to repeal so much of the state law as gives that court exclusive jurisdiction.

"The charter undertakes to make the judge of the municipal court ex officio a justice of the peace and to confer on him all the powers and jurisdiction of a justice of the peace. The framers of the charter might just as well have said that the judge of the municipal court should be ex officio a circuit judge. A justice of the peace is as much a state officer as a circuit judge, he is an officer created by the Constitution, and his election is a matter regulated by state law.

"I have before me a volume entitled 'Charter and Revised Ordinances of Kansas City 1910,' which purports to be 'Printed and Published by authority of Kansas City.' It bears on its title page the names of a number of distinguished members of the bar of Kansas City who have prefaced the work with an 'Introductory Note' very learned in its character, and it is so apt to the subject under discussion that I am tempted to quote from it: 'But it is not every power that may be essayed to be conferred on the city by such a charter that is of the same force and effect as if it were conferred by an act of the General Assembly, because the Constitution does not confer on the city the right, in framing its charter, to assume all the powers incident to its municipality, yet the Legislature may, if it should see fit, confer on the city powers not necessary or incident to the city government. There are governmental powers the exercise of which is essential to the happiness and well-being of the people of a particular city, yet which are not of a character essentially appertaining to the city government. Such powers the state may reserve to be exercised by itself, or it may delegate them to the city, but until so delegated they are reserved. Nor does the Constitution confer unlimited power on the city to regulate, by its charter, all matters that are strictly local, for there are many matters local to the city, requiring governmental regulations, which are foreign to the scope of municipal government.'

"The point is made that under an act of the General Assembly called the Enabling Act approved March 10, 1887 (Laws 1887, p. 42), the purpose of which act was to provide the means by which a city entitled to frame its own charter under section 16, art. 9, could do so, it is declared that such a charter, when so adopted, 'shall be and constitute the entire organic law of such city, and shall supersede all laws of this state then in force in terms governing or appertaining to cities having one thousand inhabitants or more.'

"At the time of the passage of that act there was existing a general statute providing a charter for all cities having a population of more than 100,000, and the purpose of the clause in the Enabling Act just quoted was to declare that the charter adopted by the city under the terms of that act was to take the place of the charter prescribed for cities of 100,000 inhabitants by the general statute. The clause in the Enabling Act does not say that the charter so adopted 'shall supersede all laws of this state then in force,' but the language is it 'shall supersede all laws of the state then in force in terms governing or appertaining to cities having one hundred thousand inhabitants or more.' It is only laws of the general statutes expressly designed for the government of cities of 100,000 inhabitants that the charter is to supersede.

"I refer again to the language of the 'Introductory Note' from which I have already quoted: 'There are governmental powers the just exercise of which is essential to the happiness and well-being of the people of a particular city, yet which are not of a character essentially appertaining to the city government. Such powers the state may reserve to be exercised by itself, or it may delegate them to the city; but until so delegated they are reserved.' And again, it is said: 'Nor does the Constitution confer unlimited power on the city to regulate, by its charter, all matters that are strictly local, for there are many matters local to the city, requiring governmental regulations which are foreign to the scope of municipal government.'

"The creating and furnishing courts to try important lawsuits is a right of the state; it is a conspicuous feature of state sovereignty; it does not naturally belong to a city. We have statutes conferring on police courts, mayor's courts, etc., of certain cities, jurisdiction of the character attempted to be conferred by the Kansas City charter on its municipal court; but those statutes are acts of the state, not of the city. Such jurisdiction was conferred on the mayor's court of Kansas City under the charter granted by the General Assembly in 1888, but the mayor's court under the charter of 1888 is not the municipal we are now considering.

"A charter framed strictly within the authority of this clause of the Constitution cannot be repealed or amended by an act of the General Assembly, yet powers not naturally appertaining to a city government, but appropriate thereto, may be conferred on the city by an act of the General Assembly, but such an act would not be an amendment of the city charter; it would be an act delegating state powers which the city otherwise did not possess. Suppose, in framing the charter, now under discussion, there had been no attempt to confer such jurisdiction on the city court, and the Legislature had thereafter passed an act conferring such jurisdiction on such court. If the conferring of such jurisdiction was within the scope of the authority given the city under section 16, art. 9, then the act of the General Assembly would be an intrusion into that authority, an amendment of the charter adding something to the charter which the city might have added but chose not to add. But the General Assembly cannot amend a charter framed within that constitutional scope. Therefore the act would be void. If such an act could be deemed valid, it could be so only on the ground that it was a power belonging to the state not within the scope of the constitutional authority conferred on the city.

"I am therefore of the opinion that the writ of prohibition should issue."

WOODSON, J., concurs with me in these views.

STATE ex rel. TULLER et al. v. SEEHORN, Judge.

1. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 256*)—PROCEEDINGS—RIGHT TO APPEAL.

Under Kansas City Charter, art. 6, § 6, providing that, in proceedings to acquire property for street purposes, any person interested in the property taken or assessed for benefits may appeal from the municipal court to the circuit court, and section 23, authorizing supplemental proceedings to assess property against which an assessment was erroneously made or omitted in the original proceedings, and providing that the supplemental proceeding shall be instituted and conducted as to the piece or pieces of property sought to be acquired or assessed in like manner and with like effect as in the original proceedings, a person interested has a right of appeal in a supplemental proceeding the same as in the original proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. § 667; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 181*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION OF LEGISLATURE.

The primary rule in construing statutes is to ascertain and give effect to the intent.

3. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 495*)—PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS—JURISDICTION.

Under Kansas City Charter, art. 6, § 23, authorizing supplemental proceedings to assess property benefited by a public improvement against which an assessment was erroneously made or omitted in the original proceeding, and section 6, authorizing an appeal to the circuit court where the cause shall be tried de novo, neither the municipal court nor the circuit court in the supplemental proceeding has any jurisdiction over benefits or damages to property, properly included in the verdict in the original proceeding, when that verdict and the judgment thereon had not been appealed from, in view of the provision of the charter that the common council may repeal the ordinance for an improvement at any time before any of the parties assessed with benefits have paid the amount assessed, which excludes the right to repeal the ordinance after such payment, article 6, § 4, providing that no assessment shall be affected or interfered with because any other assessments are invalid in whole or in part, and also providing for a reduction of the assessments where they exceed the compensation allowed, section 8, authorizing the board of public works to pay the damages awarded and take possession of the property before collecting the assessments for benefits, section 5, providing that, if the property to be taken is owned by a corporation, it may file a petition for a jury trial, in which event the case must be transferred to the circuit court, and section 13, providing for payment out of the city treasury of any deficiency through a failure to collect assessments, especially as those whose property is properly included in the first verdict are not required to be notified to appear in the supplemental proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1166; Dec. Dig. § 495.*]

4. EMINENT DOMAIN (§ 177*)—NECESSARY PARTIES.

The owners of property benefited by a proposed public improvement are not necessary parties to a proceeding by the city to acquire the property necessary for such improvement; the only necessary parties being the city and the owner of the property taken.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Eminent Domain, Cent. Dig. §§ 478, 480, 481, 483, 485; Dec. Dig. § 177.*]

5. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—GROUNDS—JURISDICTION.

Prohibition will lie to prevent the exercise of judicial power by a court having no jurisdiction to exercise any authority or where the court is exceeding its jurisdiction in a case rightfully before it.

6. PROHIBITION (§ 10*)—GROUNDS—JURISDICTION.

Where the circuit court, on appeal in a supplemental proceeding to assess property benefited by a public improvement, was about to assume jurisdiction over the assessment on property properly included in the verdict in the original proceeding, the owner of which appeared specially for the purpose of challenging its jurisdiction, the judge of that court would be restrained by prohibition from exercising jurisdiction thereafter.

In Banc. Original prohibition proceeding by the State, on the relation of Bert H. Tuller and others, against Thomas J. Seehorn, Judge of the Circuit Court of Jackson County. On demurrer to the return. Preliminary rule made absolute.

C. S. McLane, W. C. Culbertson, and R. W. Crimm, all of Kansas City, for relators. A. F. Evans, John G. Park, Hunt C. Moore, John G. Schaich, Jay M. Lee, and A. F. Smith, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

KENNISH, J. Relators filed their petition in this court praying the issuance of a writ of prohibition against the respondent as judge of division No. 3 of the circuit court of Jackson county. The cause sought to be prohibited is a condemnation proceeding now pending in said division No. 3, in which the property of relators is proposed to be taken for public use in widening Sixth street, between Broadway and Bluff streets, in Kansas City. A preliminary writ was issued upon the filing of the petition, and in due time respondent filed his return. Relators filed a demurrer to the return, and upon the issues of law thus raised the case was argued and submitted for decision.

The case of State ex rel. Graham et al. v. Seehorn, Respondent, 151 S. W. 716, decided at the present term of this court, but not yet officially published, is a companion case and almost identical in its facts with the facts pleaded and admitted in this case. A full statement of the facts will be found in the Graham Case, and it is not deemed necessary to repeat them at length herein.

Briefly, the important facts necessary to an understanding of this case are the following: A condemnation proceeding was instituted by ordinance 3,209, passed by the common council of Kansas City, in which the property of the relators was proposed to be taken for the widening of a public street, and a benefit district created for the purpose of providing the necessary compensation to be paid for the property so taken, by making the several tracts and parcels of property therein subject to tax assessments for special benefits received by reason of the proposed improvement. The proceedings regularly progressed until, under the provisions of the charter, an order was required to be made by the municipal court, giving notice of the pendency of the proceedings, and of the impaneling of a jury, at the time and place named, to fix the compensation for the property to be taken and to assess benefits against the property within the benefit district. The order was duly made and published in the proper newspaper and a copy thereof served upon each of the owners of the property to be taken. Personal service of the order was not required upon the owners of the property within the benefit district.

In compliance with the order and the provisions of the charter, the jury returned their verdict, in which compensation for the property condemned was awarded in the total sum of over $168,000. The city was assessed with its proportional part of the benefits received, and each tract of property in the benefit district was also assessed its proportional part, according to the benefits received. The verdict was confirmed by the council and judgment thereon rendered by the municipal court. No appeal having been taken within the time allowed, a copy of the verdict was delivered to the city treasurer, and more than half of the benefits assessed were paid before any question was raised as to the validity of the proceedings. It was then discovered that the order of the municipal court for the impaneling of the jury was not published as required by the charter, and that by reason of such defect the collection of the unpaid assessments could not be enforced. An injunction suit, brought by the property owners who refused to pay their assessments, was tried, and with the result that the municipal officers were enjoined from enforcing the collection of such assessments. Thereupon an ordinance was introduced in the common council for the purpose of repealing the original ordinance under which the proceedings had thus far been conducted, with a view of beginning new proceedings for the proposed improvement. Relators herein, owners of the property proposed to be taken, brought an injunction suit to enjoin the passage of said ordinance, upon the ground that a final judgment had been rendered, fixing the damages for the property to be taken, which judgment was unappealed from and under which rights had become vested. This suit was tried, and the injunction was granted as prayed for.

Section 23 of article 6 of the charter of said city provides that the city may carry on and maintain supplemental proceedings to properly assess any property in the benefit district "against which an assessment was in the first proceeding erroneously made or omitted to be made," and that "such supplemental proceedings shall be instituted and conducted as to the particular piece or pieces of private property sought to be included or assessed, in like manner and with like effect as in the original proceedings, and shall be known and described as supplemental proceedings for the purposes specified in the original ordinance." Pursuant to the provisions of said section 23, ordinance 7,539 was introduced in the common council for the purpose of levying assessments of benefits against property within the benefit district, as fixed by the original ordinance, and "against which an assessment was in the first proceeding erroneously made or which was omitted to be made." Due notice was given, a jury impaneled, and a verdict returned to the municipal court. This verdict purported to assess the total amount of compensation as found by the jury in the original proceedings to be paid to the owners of the property to be taken or damaged, and also assessed benefits against all of the tracts or parcels of land in the benefit district, including as well the tracts and parcels, the assessments upon which, under the original proceedings, had been paid to the city treasurer, as the tracts and parcels upon which payment of the assessments had been refused. The verdict was confirmed by the council and judgment rendered thereon by the municipal court. Within the time allowed an appeal was taken to the circuit court of Jackson county and the cause regularly assigned to division No. 3, presided over by respondent. In the circuit court the relators filed a plea to the jurisdiction, challenging the jurisdiction of the court to proceed against relators, upon a number of grounds therein stated. The plea to the jurisdiction was overruled and the cause called for hearing. Respondent gave it as his opinion that the cause would then be tried de novo, both as to compensation for property taken and as to the assessment of benefits upon all of the property within the benefit district, as though the appeal was from the proceedings under the original ordinance. Upon the foregoing intimation of the court, relators gave notice that a writ of prohibition against respondent would be applied for in this court, and thereupon further proceedings were suspended.

Relators base their right to a writ of prohibition against respondent upon the three grounds following: "(1) The charter of Kansas City does not provide for an appeal in a supplemental proceeding begun in the municipal court of Kansas City from that court to the circuit court, and the respondent has no jurisdiction over the supplemental proceeding over which he has assumed jurisdiction. (2) The respondent has no jurisdiction to award damages for land taken for a street because the ordinance under which he is assuming to act does not ask to have such damages awarded. (3) Prohibition will lie if the supplemental proceeding cannot be taken to the circuit court by appeal, and will also lie if there is a right of appeal, to prevent the respondent from exercising any jurisdiction over matters not brought before the court by supplemental ordinance."

[1] I. The first proposition urged by relators is that no appeal is allowed by the charter from the verdict and judgment in a supplemental proceeding in the municipal court to the circuit court, and that, as the case against which prohibition is asked is such an alleged appeal, respondent is without jurisdiction to proceed therein.

The general provision of the charter, section 6 of article 6, as to the right to an appeal, is: "In case the city, or any person affected by the proceedings, either as the owner thereof or interested in any of the property taken or damaged, or as the owner of, or interested in any of the property assessed, shall feel aggrieved by the verdict of the jury, such party so aggrieved may, within twenty days from the time the verdict of the jury is confirmed, appeal to the circuit court of Jackson county, Missouri, at Kansas City." Section 23 of article 6, authorizing supplemental proceedings, provides that: "Such supplemental proceedings shall be instituted and conducted as to the particular piece or pieces of private property sought to be acquired or assessed, in like manner and with like effect as in the original proceedings, and shall be known and described as supplemental proceedings for the purposes specified in the original ordinance." The language thus used as to the procedure in supplemental proceedings, when considered in the light of the large number of tracts of real estate and of owners thereof to be affected, and the correspondingly increased liability to mistake, leaves little doubt that the intention of the framers of the charter was to provide a remedy by which such mistakes could be corrected, while permitting the original proceedings, so far as regular, to remain in force and effect, and that in supplemental proceedings brought for that purpose the property owners should be entitled to all the rights accorded to those whose property was assessed or taken in the original proceedings. Any other construction is unreasonable and would render such provision of the charter invalid, upon the ground that it would deny to some owners of property rights conferred upon others of the same class.

[2] In construing a statute the rule is: "The intent is the vital part, the essence of the law, and the primary rule of construction is to ascertain and give effect to the intent." 2 Lewis' Sutherland on Statutory Construction (2d Ed.) 363. Applying this rule to the clause of the charter that supplemental proceedings shall be "instituted and conducted * * * in like manner and with like effect as in the original proceedings," we are of the opinion that the same course of procedure should be followed in both cases, so far as practicable, and that the right of appeal was intended to be open to any party in interest in a supplemental proceeding.

[3] II. Relators' second contention is as follows: "The respondent has no jurisdiction to award damages for land taken for a street, because the ordinance under which he is assuming to act does not ask to have such damages awarded." The foregoing too narrowly states respondent's position as to the effect of the appeal from the verdict in the municipal court. That position, as set forth in the return, is: "That said appeal so taken operates to carry the entire proceedings to the circuit court for rehearing and trial de novo; that when said cause has reached the circuit court of Jackson county, Mo., in said manner and method, it was there as though it had been appealed (by a party interested) from the first proceeding had in the municipal court under ordinance 3,209, and there should be ascertained de novo the amount of damages to be allowed for the property taken and the amount of assessments to be levied against property in the benefit district as benefits from the opening and widening of said street."

Relators maintain that, although the publication of the order of the municipal court under ordinance 3,209 was defective, yet the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of all property owners, both of the benefit district and of the property to be condemned, who appeared and participated in the proceedings; that as to them, when the verdict and judgment in the municipal court was unappealed from, was delivered to the city treasurer for collection, and a large amount of the assessments paid, it became res adjudicata, the subject-matter of which respondent had no power to readjudicate in a supplemental proceeding brought to assess other property omitted by mistake in the first. Both relators and respondent stand committed to the theory that the original proceeding was regular and binding upon the parties appearing thereto, up to some point in the progress thereof in the municipal court; otherwise there would be no basis for a supplemental proceeding, nor for the injunction against the city when it sought to begin the proceedings anew.

In elucidation of respondent's contention upon this point, we quote from his brief as follows: "It is undoubtedly true that if an error had been committed in the proceedings in the municipal court, and that error had been discovered in the proceedings in that court, a supplemental proceeding in that court would have been necessary to cure the defect thus discovered, and the judgment of the municipal court would be affected only in so far as it was necessary to correct the same in curing the defect. Thus, for example, if proceedings had been regular in the municipal court with reference to ascertainment of damages for property taken, and irregular with reference to the assessments of benefits against property in the benefit district, the supplemental proceeding would have been directed solely to the correction of the error in the assessing of benefits. And the judgment in the original proceeding would be cured by the correction of that judgment in the supplemental proceeding. The original judgment in such a case would, in a sense, be an interlocutory judgment, to be perfected and ripened into a final judgment, upon the conclusion of the supplemental proceeding. If there had been no appeal, either from the judgment in the original proceeding or from the judgment in the supplemental proceeding, in the mayor's court, the corrected judgment in that court would be final and would be one entire judgment. A condemnation proceeding under the Kansas City charter is 'one proceeding, not many; one judgment and not several.'"

The position of the respondent, as shown by the above excerpt, is that if an appeal had not been taken in the supplemental proceedings, then the verdict in the original proceedings should be corrected by the verdict in the supplemental proceedings, so as to include all property affected, and then, as corrected, to be delivered to the city treasurer, or, in case of an appeal, to be transferred to the circuit court, where the entire case would be reopened for trial de novo. This view is not in accord with the course pursued by the city in the municipal court, for, as shown by the record, the jury in the supplemental proceedings assessed all of the property in the benefit district and also allowed compensation for all of the property to be taken, and this, notwithstanding the fact that the ordinance and the order of the municipal court purported to be for the sole purpose of making assessments as to property "against which an assessment was in the original proceeding wrongfully made or which was omitted to be made." It seems obvious that the jury in the supplemental proceeding would have no authority to include in their verdict the estimate of damages and benefits as found by the former jury, in regard to property not included in the supplemental proceedings, for, as only those whose property was omitted in the original proceedings were notified to appear in the supplemental proceedings, the scope of the verdict could not extend beyond such persons and their property. We are satisfied that the jury in the supplemental proceedings were without authority to include in their verdict assessments of benefits and damages upon property properly included in the first verdict.

If the verdict in the original proceedings was valid as to those who appeared and who accepted it, why should it become "interlocutory" merely because supplemental proceedings were necessary as to other property, and be entirely vacated because an appeal was taken in such supplemental proceedings? We are of the opinion that the original proceedings, when unappealed from, became res adjudicata and not subject to trial de novo in the supplemental proceedings, and for the following reasons:

(a) The charter makes no provision for vacating the original proceedings or treating them as interlocutory in case of supplemental proceedings. On the contrary, it is expressly provided that the common council may repeal the ordinance for the proposed improvement "at any time before any of the parties assessed with benefits shall have paid the amount so assessed, * * * and in such event the judgment for compensation and benefits shall be void." Under a well-recognized principle of construction, the right of the city to avoid the proceedings and judgment before the payment of any benefits excludes such a right after benefits have been paid.

(b) It is provided by section 4 of article 6 of the charter that "no assessment shall be affected or interfered with for the reason that any other assessment or assessments made in the same proceeding may be invalid in whole or in part." This provision would preclude, as a valid defense to the enforcement of the assessment, the fact that other property benefited was not also legally assessed. If the city can enforce the collection of assessments in such cases, it must be for the reason that the judgment is final and not merely interlocutory, and, if final as to the city, it is also final as to the property owner. The reason underlying this provision of the charter is apparent, namely, that as the city is given power to subject property, omitted by mistake, to its proportional part of the cost of the improvement, by a supplemental proceeding, there is no reason why the assessment of other property should not be paid if, as to it, the assessment was regular.

(c) By section 8 of article 6 it is provided that, when recommended by the board of public works, the city may pay the damages awarded for the property taken and have possession thereof before the assessments for benefits are collected. In such case the assessments, when collected, are credited to a fund to reimburse the city. If, after the city had thus acquired the property, a defect should be discovered in the proceedings as to some of the property assessed with benefits, and there was a refusal to pay for that reason, as was done in this case, would a supplemental proceeding to remedy such defect, and an appeal therefrom to the circuit court, take up the entire case for trial de novo, including the ascertainment of compensation for the property taken? Clearly it would not, for the owners would have received the amount awarded as damages, either in the municipal court or on appeal in the circuit court, and would have no further interest in the proceedings; and, besides, the city conducting the condemnation proceedings would itself own and be possessed of the property taken.

(d) By section 5 of article 6 of the charter it is provided that, if the property to be taken is owned by an incorporated company, such company may file in the municipal court a petition demanding a trial by a common-law jury. This petition must be filed before the jury is impaneled, and the entire case, without further action in the municipal court, must then be transferred to the circuit court. If supplemental proceedings should be made necessary because of a defect in the taking of property belonging to such a company and a petition as above should be filed in the municipal court, where, in such case, would the supplemental proceeding, as stated by respondent, begin to "ride with the original proceeding and accompany it through its course"? If at the stage in which the petition is so filed, then it would be before the municipal court acquired jurisdiction of those property owners who were not legally served but voluntarily appeared.

Many other illustrations could doubtless be given from the several provisions of the charter, to show the unsoundness of the construction that an appeal to the circuit court in a supplemental proceeding necessitates a retrial of the entire case intended to be included in the original proceeding.

We shall now consider the main objections urged by respondent in opposition to the construction of the charter as herein adopted.

It is contended that a condemnation proceeding is an entirety; that there is the compensation to be allowed on the one hand and the assessments of benefits on the other, the benefits to correspond exactly in amount with the compensation; and that such result could not be secured if the compensation and benefits were not determined by the same jury. There are two sufficient answers to that contention: First. As only the property not legally assessed in the original proceeding, and the owners thereof, are included within the provisions of the ordinance authorizing the supplemental proceeding, and such owners only are notified of the impaneling of the jury in the municipal court, it cannot be maintained that the jury so impaneled in the supplemental proceeding is clothed with authority to balance damages and benefits, when in so doing it would necessarily require an exercise of authority over persons and property not in court. Second. The charter recognizes that conditions may arise in which the assessments may exceed or may not equal the compensation allowed, by providing for a reduction of assessments in the one case (section 4, art. 6) and for paying out of the city treasury the deficiency, by reason of a failure to collect assessments, in the other (section 13, art. 6).

[4] It is also urged that the charter contemplates "that the property owners in the benefit district shall have their day in court on the question of the amount of the allowance to be made for the property taken and damaged." It is plausibly argued in support of the foregoing that, as the property owners of the benefit district and the city must pay the damages awarded for property taken, they should have their day in court as to the amount of damages for which their property shall become charged.

In the exercise of the right of eminent domain in the taking of private property, as in the case in hand, the necessary parties are the city as the plaintiff, on the one side, and the property owner as the defendant, on the other. And while it would be entirely proper as a matter of grace to permit the owner of property in the proposed benefit district to aid the city in preventing an unduly high valuation of the property condemned, yet such owner would have no standing in court as a necessary party. St. Louis v. Ranken, 96 Mo. 497, 9 S. W. 910; St. Louis v. Brinckwirth, 204 Mo. 280, 102 S. W. 1091; St. Louis v. Calhoun, 222 Mo. 44, 120 S. W. 1152; Pleadwell et al. v. Glass Co., 151 Mo. App. 51, 131 S. W. 941; Kansas City v. Smart, 128 Mo. 272, 30 S. W. 773; 1 Page & Jones on Taxation by Assessment, 213; Goodrich v. Detroit, 184 U. S. 432, 22 Sup. Ct. 397, 46 L. Ed. 627. In the case of Kansas City v. Smart, supra, a proceeding under charter provisions similar to those involved in this case, in answer to questions raised by owners of property in the benefit district as to a denial of the rights of owners of property to be taken, this court (128 Mo. loc. cit. 292, 30 S. W. 778) said: "No person is interested in the compensation to be awarded these incorporated companies, except the city and the companies." The same subject is discussed in the case of Goodrich v. Detroit, supra. The contention of the owners of the property to be assessed, and the answer thereto, are stated by the court (184 U. S. loc. cit. 437, 22 Sup. Ct. 399, 46 L. Ed. 627), as follows: "The argument of the plaintiffs is that the owners of the property liable to be assessed for the benefits are just as much interested in the question as to the necessity of making the improvement and the amount of compensation as are the owners of land to be taken for such improvement, and the same reasons for notice apply in the one case as in the other. The law in this court is too well settled to be now disturbed that the interest of neighboring property owners, who may possibly thereafter be assessed for the benefit to their property accruing from opening a street, is too remote and indeterminate to require notice to them of the taking of lands for such improvement in which they have no direct interest. The position of plaintiffs in this particular would require a readjustment of the entire proceedings, and a determination of the property incidentally benefited, before any proceedings are taken for the condemnation of the land directly taken or damaged by such improvement. It might be argued upon the same lines that, whenever the city contemplated a public improvement of any description, personal notice should be given to the taxpayers, since all such are interested in such improvements and are liable to have their taxes increased thereby. It might easily happen that a whole district or ward of a particular city would be incidentally benefited by a proposed improvement, as, for instance, a public school, yet to require personal notice to be given to all the taxpayers of such ward would be an intolerable burden. Hence it has been held by this court that it is only those whose property is proposed to be taken for a public improvement that due process of law requires shall have prior notice."

The foregoing authorities fully answer respondent's complaint as to the right of the property owners in the benefit district to a hearing on the question of the compensation to be allowed for property taken, and make further discussion unnecessary.

III. The question remains: Are relators entitled to relief by prohibition?

[8] It is the recognized law of prohibition that the writ will lie to prevent the exercise of judicial power in a case where there is a want of jurisdiction in the court to exercise any judicial authority, or where the court is acting in excess of its jurisdiction in a case rightfully before it. State ex rel. v. Tracy, 237 Mo. 109, 140 S. W. 888, and authorities cited; State ex rel. v. Fort, 210 Mo. 512, 109 S. W. 737, and authorities cited; State ex rel. v. Bradley, 193 Mo. 33, 91 S. W. 483; State ex rel. v. Sale, 188 Mo. 493, 87 S. W. 967; State ex rel. v. Fort, 178 Mo. 518, 77 S. W. 741. In State ex rel. v. Fort, 210 Mo., loc. cit. 525, 109 S. W. 739, this court stated the law as follows: "It cannot be doubted that (subject to a judicial discretion to be exercised in issuing all discretionary writs) the writ of prohibition may go to confine a court within the limits of its jurisdiction whether such court has no jurisdiction at all or is exercising powers in excess of its rightful jurisdiction. So much is elementary. The writ may go whenever judicial functions are assumed, not rightfully belonging to the person or court assuming them. Generally speaking, it is available to keep a court within the limits of its powers in any particular matter as well as to prevent the exercise of jurisdiction in a cause not given to it by law. State ex rel. v. Foster, Judge, 187 Mo. 590 [86 S. W. 245]; State ex rel. v. Elkin et al., County Judges, 130 Mo. 90 [30 S. W. 333, 31 S. W. 1037]; State ex rel. v. Eby, Judge, 170 Mo. 497 [71 S. W. 52]; State ex rel. v. Bradley, Judge, 193 Mo. 33 [91 S. W. 483]; State ex rel. v. Fort, Judge, 178 Mo. 518 [77 S. W. 741]."

[8] We have held that neither the municipal court in the supplemental proceedings, nor the circuit court on appeal, had jurisdiction over relators' property. As relators limited their appearance in the circuit court specially for the purpose of challenging the court's jurisdiction, there was a want of jurisdiction both as to the subject-matter and the persons, and, as respondent as judge of said court was about to exercise judicial power in a matter in which the court was without jurisdiction, relators have shown themselves entitled to the relief prayed for.

It follows that the preliminary rule should be made absolute. It is so ordered.

1. STATUTES (§ 114*)—EXPRESSION OF SUBJECT IN TITLE.

The title of the local option law (Laws 1887, p. 179) is "An act to provide for the preventing of the evils of intemperance by local option in any county in this state, and in cities, * * * by submitting the question of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to the qualified electors of such county or city; to provide penalties for its violation, and for other purposes." The act provides for a petition for an election, signed by one-tenth of the qualified voters of the county or city, and addressed to the city council; that the city shall order, conduct, record the result, and pay the expense, of such election. It also provides for the taking of a census of a city and a method for the giving of notice. Held, that all such provisions are not only germane to the title, but are of its very essence; and the statute does not violate Const. art. 4, § 28, providing for a singleness of subject-matter and its expression in the title.

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 29*)—LOCAL OPTION—ELECTIONS—STATUTORY PROVISION—TIME OF HOLDING—"GENERAL ELECTION."

Local Option Law (Laws 1887, p. 179) § 1, provides for the submission of the question whether intoxicating liquors shall be sold to the qualified voters residing outside of certain cities and towns, provided that no such election shall take place on "any general election day or within 60 days of any general election." Section 2 provides for the submission of the same question in such cities and towns, but not "within 60 days of any municipal or state election." The statutory rule of construction (Rev. St. 1889, § 6570) that the term "general election" refers to the ordinary biennial November election has existed since before the passage of the local option law, and is made controlling, unless plainly repugnant to the intent of the Legislature or of the context. The original law dealing with primaries (Rev. St. 1889, §§ 4795-4798) was merely extended for the protection of political parties who might choose such method of selecting candidates; and the primary feature was made a part of the election system by Laws 1907, p. 263, in which the word "election" is used but once, and in an amendment to a section of the act. The primary authorized thereby is simply a part of the machinery provided for the holding of general state elections. Held, that such primary is not a "general election," within the meaning of the local option law; and the holding of a local option election within 60 days thereof is not prohibited.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Audrain County; J. D. Barnett, Judge.

Mandamus by the State, on the relation of John W. Millon, against E. D. Graham and others, the Mayor and Members of the City Council of the City of Mexico, to compel the calling of a meeting of the council and the ordering of an election under the local option law. From a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

BROWN, C. This is an appeal from the judgment of the Audrain circuit court awarding a peremptory writ of mandamus against the mayor and members of the city council of the city of Mexico, a city of the third class having more than 2,500 inhabitants, commanding them to call a meeting of the council and order an election under the local option law (chapter 22, art. 3, R. S. 1899), upon a sufficient petition presented May 11, 1908. The council had denied the petition, on the ground that an election ordered in pursuance of the terms of that law must necessarily be held within the 60 days next preceding the August primary to be held on the 4th day of the succeeding August. Whether this is a state election, within the meaning of that term as it is used in section 3028 of the Revised Statutes of 1899, is the principal question in the case. It was also insisted in the return of the applicants to the alternative writ that the local option statute conflicts with section 28 of article 4 of the state Constitution, because it contains various subjects vitally necessary to sustain any proceeding under its authority, which are not expressed in its title.

[1] 1. The constitutional provision, in as far as it relates to the questions raised in this case, is as follows: "No bill . . . shall contain more than one subject, which shall be clearly expressed in its title." The title of the local option law (Laws 1887, p. 179) is as follows: "An act to provide for the preventing of the evils of intemperance by local option in any county in this state, and in cities of twenty-five hundred inhabitants or more, by submitting the question of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to the qualified voters of such county or city; to provide penalties for its violation, and for other purposes." In support to their position the appellants, in their brief, make the following points: "Lying outside of the purview of the title, the act provides for the petition to be signed by one-tenth of the qualified voters of the county or city; second, such petition shall be addressed to the city council of the city; third, such city shall order such election; fourth, the city shall conduct such election; fifth, it shall record such election and the result thereof; sixth, it shall pay the expenses of such election; seventh, it shall take the census of such city. In another section it provides for the giving of notice of such elections, etc. All of these things lie outside of the submission of the question of prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors to the qualified voters of any city or county."

The provisions are not only germane to the title, but are all of its very essence. The subject is the submission of the question to the qualified voters of the county or city. This implies the permission to elect by vote what course they will pursue in the matter, and includes every detail which, in the legislative discretion, is proper to take a fair vote and to ascertain and express the result. There is nothing in this act not designed for this purpose and clearly expressed in its title.

[2] 2. Section 1 of the act, the title to which we have already quoted, and the interpretation of which presents the real question raised in this appeal, provides for the submission to the qualified voters of any county, who shall reside outside the corporate limits of any city or town having a population of 2,500 inhabitants or more, the question whether or not spirituous and intoxicating liquors, including wine and beer, shall be sold in such county outside such city or town. This section contains the following proviso: "Provided, that no such election, held under the provisions of this act, shall take place on any general election day, or within sixty days of any general election held under the Constitution and laws of this state, so that elections as are held under this act shall be special elections and shall be separate and distinct from any other election whatever." At the time these words were used, there existed in this state, as there has been ever since, a statutory rule of construction (R. S. 1889, § 6570), as follows: "The term 'general election' refers to the election required to be held on the Tuesday succeeding the first Monday of November, biennially," which should control, unless such construction be plainly repugnant to the intent of the Legislature, or of the context of the same statute. This name had been conferred by the Constitution of the state upon the regular biennial election for officers of the state and its political subdivisions, had been accepted and used by the Legislature in many enactments, and was expressly defined in the statute last quoted, and there is nothing in its use in this act repugnant to the definition so established; and we have no doubt it was used deliberately for the purpose of expressing that meaning. It made it impossible to submit the question of local option during the period of political excitement preceding and succeeding the important event that determines the political complexion of the state and country at large; and it used the words which follow to impress more strongly upon the act that, in addition to the exclusion of this considerable portion of the year from the period during which it might be held, the election is to be a special one, devoted to the submission of that proposition separate and distinct from all others.

The second section of the act provides for the submission of the same question in cities and towns having 2,500 inhabitants or more. It provides that such election shall not be held "within sixty days of any municipal or state election held in such city." This clause was evidently intended to add to the description used in the proviso of the first section the municipal election, and for no other purpose. The general election is the one in which the officers of the state and its political subdivisions are chosen—the state election; the municipal election is the one in which municipal officers are elected. Although the word has many meanings, in the connection in which it is here used, it implies a vote for the choice of public officers.

The idea of a "primary" or primary election was not in the mind of the Legislature, because at the time of the passage of the act there was no such thing authorized by the laws of the state. In 1889 (R. S. 1889, c. 60, art. 4) the arm of the state was extended for the protection of political parties who might choose this method of selecting persons to be presented as the candidates of such parties for the suffrages of the qualified voters, or for delegates to their nominating conventions. This statute simply provided for the prevention and punishment of fraud, as the public laws frequently provide for the protection of purely private property and private rights and contracts. The primary was only made a feature of the public election system by the act of March 18, 1907, which is the law now invoked by the appellant for the purpose of avoiding this election. Its title (Laws 1907, p. 263) is "An act to provide for party nominations by direct vote." One is struck by the care with which the word "election" is excluded from this act and its title as a designation of the plan or method of nomination for which it provides. It gets in, however, by an amendment to section 31, to which it is attached as "section 31a," and its incongruity seems to emphasize the general plan of exclusion which pervades the act. It does not apply to special elections to fill vacancies, nor to county superintendents of schools, to city officers not elected at a general state election, nor to town, village, or school district officers. Instead of being an election, within the ordinary political meaning of that term, it is a part of the machinery provided by the Legislature for holding the general state election; its office being the qualification of the candidates from which officers are to be selected in that final function.

It follows that the August primary of 1908 was not a state election, within the meaning of section 2 of the local option act of 1887, and that the judgment of the circuit court should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

HILGEDICK v. GRUEBBEL

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. BOUNDARIES (§ 46*)—AGREEMENT TO PARTIES—VALIDITY.

A boundary may be established by agreement of parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 212-226, 249-251; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 35*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—AGREEMENTS.

In ejectment where it was in issue whether previous owners of the respective tracts had agreed upon a boundary line, cross-examination of a witness for plaintiff to show that a survey establishing such boundary line, upon which a rail fence was constructed, was incorrect and did not locate the true line was admissible, in view of the fact that such witness was the only person who had ever heard of such agreement, and the only witness testifying that such agreement was ever made, that plaintiff had never heard of such agreement, and that the uncontradicted evidence practically showed that the fence was not straight, but ran along in an irregular line.

3. WITNESSES (§ 406*)—CREDIBILITY—CONTRADICTION.

Upon such facts, the testimony of such witness on cross-examination tending to show that a boundary line claimed to have been agreed upon by previous owners and on which a fence had been built was not the true line was admissible in contradiction of the witness.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1276-1279; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 37*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—AGREED BOUNDARY.

Evidence held to show that the prior owners of the respective tracts had not agreed upon a boundary line.

5. BOUNDARIES (§ 41*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

Instructions given for plaintiff in ejectment, involving a disputed boundary, held to present the issue as favorably for plaintiff as he was entitled to.

6. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO ISSUES.

In ejectment involving a boundary line, where there was evidence of a fence built by the prior owners of the respective tracts, but no evidence or issue as to the purpose for which it was erected, other than for the use and convenience of the parties in inclosing the premises, an instruction that, if such prior owners had a line surveyed to erect a fence between the tracts "for their convenience," which was so erected, such line would not be considered as establishing an agreed boundary unless such owners agreed that the line should thereafter be the boundary between their lands was not objectionable on the ground that there was no evidence to show that such owners had erected the fence "for their convenience."

Appeal from Circuit Court, Warren County; James D. Barnett, Judge.

Ejection by William R. Hilgedick against Gustave A. Gruebel. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

This is a suit in ejectment instituted in the circuit court of Warren county by the plaintiff against the defendant to recover the possession of two small V-shaped tracts of land in United States survey numbered 758, situate in township 45, range 1, Warren county, Mo., particularly described in the petition. Said tracts of land are situate along the boundary line, separating the lands of plaintiff and defendant. The petition is in conventional form, and the answer is a general denial. A trial was had before the court and jury, which resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff duly appealed to this court. The respondent is not represented here, and the record presented to this court is so poorly gotten up and so indefinite that it is almost impossible for us to find heads or tails of the case. The appellant does not claim that he has the paper title to the land in controversy, but bases his right to a recovery, first, upon an agreed boundary line established by the grantors of both appellant and respondent in the year 1879; and, second, adverse possession under color of title. The respondent interposed three defenses: First, that he had the paper title to the land in controversy; second, a denial of adverse possession; and, third, a denial of the agreed boundary line.

In order to establish the appellant's case, he offered as a witness J. A. Ulfers, who testified, in substance, that he was 68 years of age; that he was reared in Warren county, and lived on land of appellant with his father, from 1847 to 1884, Hyronimus Ulfers, who died about the year 1895; that he was familiar with the tract of land immediately east of appellant's; that ever since 1870 Rudolph Dennert, Sr., owned and occupied the latter tract, which now belongs to the appellant; that Rudolph Dennert, Sr., died about the year 1886; that in the year 1878 or 1879 Hyronimus Ulfers, the father of the witness and Rudolph Dennert, Sr., wishing to build a fence between their farms, and not knowing the exact boundary line, agreed to have a survey made thereof and agreed upon James Biglow, a surveyor of St. Charles county, to make the survey, and agreed to build the fence on the line to be established by the Biglow survey; that the witness was present and assisted in making the survey, carried the flag, and Dennert's son carried one end of the chain; that the survey was made, and the stakes driven and corners set as the surveyor went along, and that, when he had gone around the tracts, the survey was satisfactory to both parties; that they then built a fence along the line established by the survey; that the witness built the fence, and Dennert, Sr., furnished part of the material, and his father furnished the remainder; that Dennert and his son were present when the survey was made; that the land on each side of the line was cultivated by Ulfers and Dennert, respectively, until 1884, when the witness left the place; that the fence remained there all the time while he lived there; that, after leaving the house of his father, he visited him off and on until 1893 or 1894, when his father moved from there. That during all the time while he lived there, and during all his visits, he never noticed any change in the line or the fence built thereon. That, after his father left the place, the appellant moved on it, and has occupied it ever since. That he saw the premises just previous to the trial in April, 1909, and he noticed that most of the old fence had been torn down, and that a new wire fence had been placed there, some 10 feet over on the land formerly occupied by his father. That the north end of the old fence was still standing. That the old fence was a straight worm fence built of rails, and the corners of the fence were placed on his father's land by agreement between him and Dennert. That when he was last there he saw the marks of the old fence on the ground, and new stakes put there by a surveyor in the line of the old fence. That he did not know who called Biglow to make the survey, whether it was his father or Dennert. That Biglow had some deeds there while making the survey. That the survey he made began on the north end at the northeast corner of his father's land and ran down to a rock in the creek. He then went back and surveyed this fraction where the corner is supposed to be. Biglow, in surveying the property, ran around the fraction and surveyed the line in dispute; that is, the fraction of three acres and something, sold out of original Ulfer's place. He also testified that his father and Dennert agreed that the line surveyed by Biglow should be their dividing line. The agreement was not in writing. That there was an old fence there prior to and at the time when this agreement was made; "it was there when we moved on the place." There was a number of other witnesses introduced by appellant, whose testimony corroborated much of the testimony of J. A. Ulfers.

The respondent, in order to sustain the defense, testified in his own behalf substantially as follows: That he purchased the Rudolph Dennert place in the year 1903 and received a warranty deed, and went into possession of it on July 1, 1903. That at the time he moved there he found an old rail fence on the western boundary of the land. That about a month afterwards he met the appellant, and the latter said to him, "I understand you want your land surveyed." "Why," I says, "I haven't thought about it yet." I says, "I don't know; ain't the line all right, the corners? Do you know the lines or the corners?" He said, "No, sir; I don't know no corners on my land." I told him, "I don't know the lines because I ain't acquainted. I just bought it, and I am sort of new in this country, and if you don't know the line and I don't know the line, I think it would be right well to survey it." He said, "I wish you would survey it, because I would like to find out where the true line is." "Well," I says, "if that is your intention, I am satisfied with that." Proceeding, he testified further that they dropped the subject there, and that about two weeks later they met again and appellant asked the witness if he had engaged Wehmeyer to survey his land. The answer was "No." He then said, "I wish you would have the land surveyed so that we can find the true line between your land and mine." Witness replied that he would get Mr. Wehmeyer and let him survey the land and run the line between them. That Wehmeyer is the county surveyor. That he requested all the parties who were interested in the lands to bring their deeds so the surveyor would know how to survey the lands. That he wrote to Wehmeyer some time in October, 1903, to come up and make the survey; that he promised to come in November, but did not do so until March, 1904. That, when the surveyor came, they went to the home of appellant and requested him to come over the next day to make the survey; that they got their chainmen, and the next morning appellant and the other landowners further up the line appeared. That Wehmeyer surveyed the land of both the witness and that of the appellant, also that of Peters and Meyer. That he surveyed all of those places, ran entirely around them. That he had appellant's deed there and used it in making his survey. That he saw the lines run and staked off; that he placed his new wire fence on the line established by the surveyor between his land and that of appellant. That, after the surveys were completed, he and appellant agreed to build a new fence along the line established between them; that the witness was to pay for sawing the lumber and making the posts for the entire fence, and appellant was to haul the lumber and posts and build the entire fence. That, in pursuance to that agreement, appellant hauled the logs to the sawmill of Mr. Mutert, and witness hired Fritz Garde to split the posts; that Garde split 150 posts on his land, and he paid him for his work; that he paid Mr. Mutert for sawing the lumber and had the receipts from both him and Garde. That appellant tore down the north end of the old fence. That there were two small tracts of land in controversy. The north one was about 120 feet long and 6 or 8 feet wide at one end and runs to a point at the other, while the south tract was about 300 feet long and 12 feet wide at one end and ran to a point at the other end. That the old rail fence which was there when he purchased the place was crooked—that is, it did not run on a straight line, it had bends, and was very crooked. That this old fence disappeared in the latter part of March, 1905, and that he did not know who moved it. That this was almost two years after appellant agreed to build the new fence. That appellant seemed to be pleased with the surveys when first made, but when he saw where the fence was to be built he seemed to get out of humor and would say but little. Appellant never built the fence he agreed to. That they had several conversations about it, and appellant suggested additional propositions looking to a settlement of the matter, but witness would not agree to that without the agreement should be reduced to writing, and that each party should execute a bond in the sum of $1,000, conditioned that each should abide by the agreement. That on May 17, 1906, in the presence of Mr. Peters and Mr. Knipker, he said to appellant that he would agree to abide by the survey made by "any competent surveyor of St. Charles, Montgomery, or Franklin counties." "Yes, sir; county surveyor or government surveyor, if there was one, it would suit me better, and I had to be satisfied with the surveyor, and that it had to be in writing and a $1,000 bond on top of it." That the appellant refused this proposition, and the negotiations there stopped. That the posts he hired Garde to split disappeared also, and that he does not know what became of them. That, after appellant refused to build the fence as per agreement, he (the witness) had the wire fence, mentioned in the evidence, built along the line established by the Wehmeyer survey, which consisted of two smooth galvanized wires stretched along on posts set right on the line; that this fence of his has been cut to pieces about a dozen times. That the new wire fence was on the line established by the Wehmeyer survey and was perfectly straight, but the old rail fence was not; it was very crooked and varied from the line of the wire fence. At the north end the wire fence runs right into the middle of the old rail fence, and, as you go south, it leaves the old fence and the space between widens most all the way down to the south end where they are 10 or 12 feet apart. However, at one point near the center of the wire fence, the old rail fence almost touches the wire fence. That he built the wire fence on July 2 and 3, 1906. Appellant came over after his cows which he had put up and saw him building the wire fence and asked if he was putting it on the line, and, when informed that he was, the appellant said that was all that he wanted, and turned away and drove his cows home. That he had only one survey made, and that was on March 3 and 4, 1904, by Mr. Wehmeyer. That he did not have another agreement with the appellant to build the fence in the year 1906, but offered to enter into another agreement in that regard about that time, but appellant declined to enter into it. That at the time Wehmeyer made the surveys for them, they were on the best of terms; both he and Wehmeyer dined, and they stayed with appellant while the survey was being made, at the request of the latter. That appellant set some of the posts in pursuance of agreement to build the party fence, but subsequently he or some one else removed them; that appellant never completed the fence, so in 1906 the witness built the wire fence before mentioned. That at this time the feeling between him and appellant was not friendly; that he did not know what offended the latter, without he became so when he saw where the new fence would run.

On direct examination witness testified that the original agreement was that he was to furnish the material for the party fence, and appellant was to furnish the labor necessary to construct it on the line of the Wehmeyer survey, and that there was never any modification of that agreement made by them. That he simply waited for appellant to build the fence, and, when he saw appellant was not going to do so, he built the wire fence on the line where appellant had agreed to build it, and that appellant then instituted this suit. That he did not use the posts made by Garde in building the wire fence, because he did not want to haul them. Later they disappeared, but he did not know what became of them.

On recross-examination witness testified that appellant came to him three or four different times and requested him to have the surveys made, and maybe oftener, before he wrote to Mr. Wehmeyer to come and make them.

John Mutert, the sawmill man, Fritz Garde, the man who split the posts, William Peters and Frank Meyer, two of the adjoining land-owners, William Riske, John D. Waller, farmers, Dr. A. O. Bentnick, A. H. Wehmeyer, county surveyor, and many others, testified on behalf of respondent, who fully corroborated respondent's testimony in almost every particular. Both appellant and respondent introduced many deeds, plats, and other exhibits in evidence. The plats are poorly drawn and incomplete, and some of them give no corners or directions whatever. For those reasons we have been compelled to largely put aside the plats and gather the facts of the case as best we can from the oral testimony of the witnesses and the deeds introduced in evidence. The deeds show that the legal paper title to the land in controversy is in the respondent; in fact, that is not disputed by counsel for appellant.

Kurt Von Reppert and Henry Higginbotham, both of St. Louis, for appellant.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). Counsel for appellant at some length state at the outset of their brief, and cite in support thereof, many authorities, certain academic propositions of law, which we need not here stop to consider. Counsel for appellant first assign as error the action of the trial court in admitting in evidence, on cross-examination, certain parts of the testimony of J. A. Ulfers, one of the witnesses offered by appellant. That testimony was elicited for the purpose of showing that the survey made by Biglow, establishing the boundary line as contended for by counsel for appellant, upon which the old rail fence between Hyronimus Ulfer's and Rudolph Dennert's land was constructed, was incorrect, and did not properly establish or accurately locate that true line between them.

son that, if Ulfers and Dennert agreed upon the line upon which the old fence was constructed as the true line, then it was wholly immaterial whether that line was correctly located by Biglow or not. Many authorities are cited in support of that contention, and, because of its soundness, we presume it is not controverted by counsel for respondent. However, counsel for him insist, that said testimony of Ulfers was admissible in this case notwithstanding the soundness of the legal proposition previously stated.

[2-4] Their position is that, if it be conceded that Ulfers and Dennert agreed upon a fixed boundary line between them, then appellant's contention would be sound; but, contending, as counsel for respondent do, that no such agreement was ever entered into, a question of fact is thereby presented to the jury for determination, and that any evidence which tends to show that no such agreement was ever made, or which contradicts the testimony of J. A. Ulfers upon that question, is admissible in evidence. That being true, clearly the testimony complained of was admissible for both of said purposes, especially in the light of the facts disclosed by this record, namely: (a) That he (J. A. Ulfers) was the only human being on earth who ever heard of that agreement, and was the only witness who testified that any such an agreement was ever entered into between them, notwithstanding the fact that young Dennert was living and assisted in making the Biglow survey, and presumably would know as much about the agreement as young Ulfers did. (b) That the appellant himself, the purchaser of the land from Hyronymous Ulfers, never heard of said agreement. His words and whole conduct for years regarding the Wehmeyer survey, and the agreement between him and the respondent to build a party fence upon the lines established by that survey, shows conclusively that he never heard of any such agreement. Common prudence would have suggested to appellant, before or at the time he purchased the land from Ulfers, that he should have made inquiry of the latter as to the location of the boundary lines thereof, and common knowledge and experience teach us that such inquiry is usually, if not universally, made, by all purchasers of land, when present, as the appellant was in this case. Presumably for this reason, if for none other, he was more likely than any one else to have heard of the agreement, if in fact it was ever entered into, and, having never heard of it, is evidence that it never existed. (c) Practically the uncontradicted evidence shows that the old rail fence which witness Ulfers said was located upon the Biglow survey was not straight, but was crooked, meandering in and out, and at one point near the middle thereof the fence came almost to the line established by the Wehmeyer survey, which all the evidence shows was a straight line, and from there meandered along an irregular line north and south, varying in places, in and out, from a straight line many feet, which, if we correctly understand the record and plats introduced in evidence, caused the narrow strips of land involved in this controversy to be located upon the appellant's side of the old rail fence.

This evidence tends strangely to show that the old rail fence was not put upon the line of the Biglow survey or upon any other survey, for that matter, for the reason that the witness Ulfers himself testified that the Biglow survey was a straight line, which presumably is true, for a surveyor generally runs a straight line and not a crooked one like a snake, even though it should vary from the true course. Therefore, if the Biglow survey located a straight line, as Ulfers testified that it did, then his testimony to the effect that the old rail fence was built upon that line is unquestionably untrue—that is, provided the testimony of many of the other witnesses who testified that the fence was crooked is true—but, be that as it may, that was a question for the jury to determine, and the evidence complained of was admissible for the purpose of showing that fact and to contradict said witness. It necessarily follows that, if the Biglow survey located a straight line between the farms of Hyronymous Ulfers and Rudolph Dennert, and that the old rail fence mentioned was crooked, meandering in and out many feet in places, and not straight, then the testimony of J. A. Ulfers to the effect that they agreed upon the Biglow survey as the true line between them, and that, in pursuance of said agreement, they built said fence upon that line, is untrue. At any rate, that evidence was admissible in evidence, tending to prove that no such agreement was ever entered into. It also follows from the foregoing facts, if the jury found them to be facts, that there was no agreement made and entered into by and between said Ulfers and Dennert fixing a boundary line between them, or that they built a fence upon that line for the purposes claimed by appellant.

[5] On behalf of and at the request of counsel for appellant, the court instructed the jury as follows: "(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence that Rudolph Dennert, which owner of the land east of the line in controversy, about the year 1878 agreed with Hyronymous Ulfers on the line run by Biglow mentioned in the evidence as the division line between their respective tracts of land, and that afterwards the said Dennert and the said Ulfers built their division fence on such division line so agreed upon, and that the fence so built is the old fence mentioned in evidence, and if the jury further believe and find from the evidence that plaintiff and said Ulfers, under whom said plaintiff claims, have ever since occupied the land on their side of such division line and up to the same to the time of the entry, if any, of the defendant on the west side of said division line and said fence, then it is wholly immaterial where the survey would put the line; and the said Rudolph Dennert and all persons deriving title to the land east of said division line and fence under him (said Dennert), including the defendant Gruebbel, are bound by said agreed division line and fence, and are not entitled to any land west of said division land and old fence. And if the jury further believe and find from the evidence that the defendant at the time of the institution of this suit, September —, 1908, was and is now in possession of said land sued for, their verdict must be for the plaintiff for the possession of the land sued for and described in the evidence. (2) If the jury believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff Wm. R. Hilgedick and those under whom he claims, who in this case is Hyronimous Ulfers, have been in the open, notorious, peaceable, continuous, uninterrupted, exclusive, and adverse possession of the strips of land in controversy, and up to the old fence mentioned in the evidence for a period of 10 years preceding the entry, if any, of the defendant on said land, and that the defendant at the time of the institution of this suit was and is not in possession of said land, their verdict must be for the plaintiff for the possession of said land. (3) The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff is not bound to prove both an agreed division line and adverse possession for 10 years, as defined by the other instructions herein, in order to entitle plaintiff to recover herein. But the plaintiff may recover on proof of either such agreed division line or such adverse possession. (4) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff or the plaintiff and his grantor, Hyronimous Ulfers, for a period of 10 years preceding and up to the time when the defendant entered into the possession of the land sued for, have been continuously in the actual possession of said land up to the old fence mentioned in the evidence, claiming the land up to said old fence as their own, then such possession is adverse possession within the meaning of these instructions, unless the jury further believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff or his grantor Ulfers did not claim the land up to said old fence unconditionally as the true division line. In the event you find from the evidence that the plaintiff or his grantor Ulfers did claim the land up to the said old fence unconditionally as the true division line as hereinbefore explained, it makes no difference that the plaintiff or said Ulfers was mistaken as to the location of the true division line, nor that said old fence line may not have been the true division line, nor that plaintiff or the said Ulfers may not have intended to take any of the land east of the true division line. (5) The court instructs the jury that, if they believe and find from the evidence that Rudolph Dennert, while owner of the land east of the line in controversy, and Hyronimous Ulfers, while owner of the land west of the line in controversy, did establish an agreed division line between their respective tracts of land, and that afterwards the said Ulfers and the said Dennert built their division fence on such division line so agreed upon, and if the jury further believe and find from the evidence that said Ulfers thereafter occupied the land on his side of such agreed division line and up to the fence so built for the period of 10 years, and that said fence is the old fence mentioned in the evidence, and that said Ulfers claimed to own said land up to such division line, then the said Ulfers owned the land on the west of and up to said division line and old fence as fully as if his deed called for and described the said line and old fence as the western boundary line of his said land, and in such case the deed to Gruebbel, the defendant, could not and did not convey to said Gruebbel any of the land west of such agreed division line and old fence." These instructions presented the law of the case to the jury in as favorable a light as the appellant was entitled to have it, and of course they do not complain of the action of the court in giving them.

The converse of the legal propositions stated in the foregoing instructions were submitted to the jury, in instructions asked by counsel for respondent. The principal objection urged against respondent's instructions is that there was no evidence upon which to predicate them. This objection is not well grounded as previously shown.

We have set out at some length the substance of the testimony for the purpose of showing that there was evidence tending to show that there was no agreement made and entered into by and between Ulfers and Dennert fixing the boundary line between their tracts of land, etc., and also tending to show that Dennert nor the appellant claimed adversely to Ulfers and the respondent. We therefore rule this point against the appellant.

[6] In addition to giving the instructions for respondent before mentioned, negating the propositions submitted to the jury by instructions on behalf of appellant, counsel requested, and the court gave, the following instruction for respondent, viz.: "The court instructs the jury that, if they believe and find from the evidence that one Ulfers and one Dennert were the adjoining owners of the lands in dispute in this case about the year 1878 or 1879, and that they about that time procured one Surveyor Biglow to run a line between said adjoining tracts of land for the purpose of erecting a fence for their convenience between their said tracts of land, and that on said Biglow line a rail fence was erected, then the line marked by the rail fence will not be regarded by the jury as establishing an agreed boundary line between their said tracts of land, unless you further find from the evidence that said Ulfers and Dennert agreed that said line marked by said rail fence should be thereafter the boundary line between their land, and that each of them thereafter claimed to own to the said line marked by the said rail fence and no farther." Counsel for appellant complain of this instruction for the reason stated that there was no evidence introduced to show that Ulfers and Dennert erected the old rail "fence for their convenience."

It is true there was no evidence introduced for the purpose of showing that the fence was erected for the convenience of the parties, nor for any other purpose for that matter, but the supposition is that it, as well as all other fences, are erected for the use and convenience of the parties who build them. Nor was there any evidence tending to show that the fence was erected for the purpose of establishing the boundary line between Ulfers and Dennert. But the evidence for the appellant tended to show the line was established by the Biglow survey, and that Ulfers and Dennert agreed upon that line as the true dividing line, and in pursuance to that agreement the fence was erected thereupon, not for the purpose of establishing the line (for that had already been done by the survey, and the stakes and corners had been previously set by the surveyor), but for the uses and purposes that all farm fences are erected, namely, to inclose the premises, and excluding therefrom man and beast, and clearly this is the sense in which the word "convenience" in the instruction was used. No other meaning could have been drawn from the word, nor could it have misled the jury or injured the appellant in the least, for the simple reason that the purpose for which the fence was erected was not an issue in the case in any sense of the word. There are other minor questions presented and briefed by counsel, and, after a careful consideration of them, we are of the opinion that none of them cut so deep into the merits of the case as to change the result before indicated. We will not, therefore, prolong this opinion by discussing them.

There was sufficient evidence introduced to justify the court's action in submitting the case to the jury upon the theory of the respective parties, and the jury under proper instructions having found the issues for the respondent, we are of the opinion that the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered. All concur.

COUSINS v. WHITE et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri. Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 84*)—KNOWLEDGE OF RECORD TITLE—EFFECT.

Where for more than 10 years prior to the filing of suit defendant held the open and exclusive possession of the land in dispute, claiming title, her possession had ripened into title, although she may have known the record title was in another.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 116*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In a suit for the recovery of land, where title by limitation was set up, and there was evidence that defendant, who was in possession, found it included in the tract which she purchased more than 10 years before, that she was assured that her grantor had perfect title thereto, and that she had held the exclusive possession dispossessing one who claimed adversely to her, it was sufficient evidence of holding under color of title to authorize an instruction that 10 years adverse possession under claim of ownership ripens into title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. § 66; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 386*)—TRIAL TO COURT—DECLARATIONS OF LAW.

In a case tried before the court without a jury, the rules of law governing the giving and refusing of instructions are not changed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 901, 902; Dec. Dig. § 386.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 987*)—REVIEW—LOCAL CASES.

While the appellate court may, in an equity case, review and weigh the evidence, it has no such power to review on appeals in actions at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3893-3896; Dec. Dig. § 987.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Oregon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Action by Lee Cousins against B. F. White and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

This suit was instituted in the circuit court of Oregon county by the plaintiff against the defendant to quiet the title to the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 21, township 22, range 5, under old section 650, R. S. 1899. The defendant answered, denying any claim to said quarter section, except to about five acres lying in the southwest corner thereof, described as follows: "Beginning at the southwest corner of section 21, running thence north to a point where the public road intersects the section line between sections 20 and 21, the same being a distance of 554 feet; thence in a southeasterly direction along said public road to and intersecting the section line between sections 21 and 28; thence west a distance of six hundred feet to the point of beginning."

Said answer was as follows: "Now come defendants in the above-entitled cause, and for their answer to the petition of plaintiff deny each and every allegation in said petition contained. Defendants, further answering, say that they are in possession of and have within their inclosure a portion of the land described in plaintiff's petition; that they and their grantors have for twenty-six (26) years last past maintained an inclosure around said portion of land, have been in the open, continued, exclusive, and adverse possession of the same for the whole of said period of 26 years, claiming title thereto and have made valuable improvements thereon; that the portion of said land so held by defendants and their grantors more particularly described is as follows: [Then follows the description as above set forth.] Defendants further say by reason of the open, notorious, exclusive, and adverse possession of the above-described land under claim of ownership by them and their grantors for a period of more than 10 years as aforesaid they are vested with the full title to said land, both legal and equitable. Wherefore, defendants pray that the court may by its judgment and decree adjudge that the defendants are the owners of the above described land; that defendants be vested with full title thereto, both legal and equitable, by the judgment and decree of the court; and that plaintiff be divested of any title or interest he may hold to the same, and that the same may be vested in these defendants, and for such other orders and judgments as to the court may appear meet and proper."

At the trial all defenses, except the statutes of limitations, were abandoned.

The following facts are undisputed: The record title to the land is in the plaintiff, he having acquired it from one O'Neal, who through mesne conveyances acquired it from William H. Taylor, about the year 1880. The defendant, Margaret White, purchased lands adjoining that in controversy from Amos Huffstедler in the year 1894. She testified that at the time she purchased said lands she purchased all the lands which were within the Huffstедler inclosure, which it is conceded included this five acres. She testified that she had Huffstедler point out the lines to her, which included the land sued for; that he told her that all the lands in that country were sold as farms, and that this farm included all the lands inclosed by the fences which he pointed out to her; that he told her that he had been in the possession of this five acres for thirteen years, and had cultivated it all that time; that she took possession of said five acres along with the other land which was inclosed by the same fence, and had the actual, exclusive, adverse, and notorious possession of it from that time down to July, 1909, about 16 years, when this suit was instituted, cultivating it each and every year, and receiving all the rents, issues, and profits thereof during all that time, and that during all that time she claimed title thereto, which was not questioned nor was her possession ever disturbed, except upon one occasion, about a year after she purchased the land, namely, in the year 1894, and that was by William H. Taylor, who at that time claimed to have had the record title thereto; that upon that occasion Taylor made claim to the five acres, and took possession thereof, and set some posts near the present controverted line; that she so vigorously protested against his claim of title and wrongful possession that he pulled up and left the place, and never again claimed title thereto or disturbed her possession thereafter, which was about 12 or 14 years prior to the institution of this suit.

Amos Huffstедler testified for plaintiff, but did not contradict the testimony of Mrs. White, except in this manner: He testified that at the time he made the contract of sale with Mrs. White he stated to Mr. Tribble, the attorney who drew the deed, in the presence of Mrs. White, that there was some agricultural land that cornered down in the field (this five acres) he was not selling to defendant.

Mrs. White testified that she never heard Huffstедler make that statement to Tribble, but that after she had contracted for the land, and "had made the payment" thereon, Huffstедler for the first time said to her that there was some agriculture land that cornered down in the field, and that he assured her that she would never be bothered about it, that he had held it for 13 years, had cultivated it all those years, and had never been bothered about it, and that he deemed the title to the same to be safe for her. (The record is not clear upon this point, but from this remark I suppose the land was purchased upon the installment plan, and that the payment referred to was the first payment made under the contract of purchase.)

Huffstедler also testified that he held the actual, exclusive, and notorious possession of said five acres of land for 13 years prior to making the deed to Mrs. White, and cultivated it all that time, and received all the issues, rents, and profits thereof, but that he never claimed the land adversely. The record is silent as to the reason and as to the conditions that existed under which he took possession of said five acres, or why it was inclosed with his lands.

Mrs. White was recalled, and testified that she took possession of all the land in question, under the deed, believing that she had a good title to all of it as Huffstедler had told her she had.

The only evidence introduced tending to contradict the evidence of Mrs. White to the effect that she claimed the five acres of land adversely under order of title was that of the plaintiff and his attorney, S. M. Meeks, regarding a conversation which took place in the latter's office a few days prior to the institution of this suit.

Plaintiff testified as follows: "I had a conversation with Mrs. White about this piece of land in Mr. Meek's office, after I bought it from Michael. She came in, and said she would buy it from me, if I would sell it, and I told her I would, and she asked me how much I wanted, and I said $75 an acre; she, 'That is too much.' She asked me how much I gave, and I said $9.25 per acre, and she said she would give me twice as much as it cost me. She said there was something like five acres, and she would give me $100 for it." Cross-Examination: "Don't know that she said who was the owner of that land. Nothing was said about the ownership of it. The best I remember she came in and asked me if I would sell that piece of land. I didn't talk with her much."

The following was Mr. Meek's testimony: "I heard the conversation between Mr. Cousins and Mrs. White. I couldn't tell all of it. Mrs. White came in. I think Mrs. White and I came in together, and went in and sat down, and Mr. Cousins came in directly from another room. They were talking about this land, and he told her that he would draw a line from that section corner to Mr. Shaver's fence and set a price and give or take, if I remember right, and she told him she wouldn't do it; she had none to sell. She asked him what he gave for it, and he said $9.25, and she told him she would give him twice that for what was in the field and considered that a reasonable offer, or something to that effect. She said, 'You say there is five acres,' and she would give him $20 or $100 for what was there. That was a few days before this suit was filed." Cross-Examination: "Mrs. White came down to my office to see me about this land. She understood that Cousins was making a claim to it. She came and talked to me about it when Bill Payne was making some claim to it, about a dozen years ago. I don't remember whether I advised her she could hold that land. I think Mr. Kenner was mixed up in it, and Mr. Payne and Mrs. White. It was three-cornered controversy. I heard that Mr. Payne had got it and set some posts. I might have advised her she could take those posts out. I don't remember whether I advised her to that effect, or whether I told her that the land belonged to her by right of possession." Redirect examination: "I had no knowledge of the facts, and, if I gave her any advice, it was upon her own statements."

William Miller testified for defendants as follows: "I have known the land in controversy for 29 years I would say. I remember Bill Payne claiming it. I don't recollect how long it has been, probably a dozen years ago. I heard him making some claims to that corner down in Mrs. White's field there. I heard him say something about it in the court here to Judge Evans, something about wanting possession of it. I don't know what steps were taken, but I understood Judge Evans to state they would hold it by statute of limitations. I had put his poles in there to build a fence, and then he didn't build it. I don't know what year that was. Q. You never knew or heard of him making any further claims to that land? A. That is the last I heard said about it." Cross-examination: "I don't know what he claimed. I don't know what kind of matter or proceeding it was I heard in court. I don't know exactly—I heard Payne name something about wanting possession of this land, or something of the kind, to Judge Evans. It was after Payne was out of office here, 10 or 12 years ago. I couldn't tell how long it has been. I don't know what the general knowledge and understanding was out in this neighborhood, as to whether this corner out of that quarter section run down into the field. I don't know what the general knowledge, but I knew it. I don't know how the general opinion is about it being part of that White farm, but I would consider it a part of the farm. It belonged to the field."

Joseph Rizenour, being introduced on the part of defendant, testified, in substance, as follows: "I am the tenant cultivating the Wahit farm, and rented it from Mr. White, through my son. It included the piece of land in controversy here. I have known this place about 29 years. This land in dispute has been held under the inclosure of the White farm ever since I knew the farm. The fence has been set back a little this year, a new fence put in there this year. It may have been set out a little, but it follows the road. For the last five years I have known Mr. White to have control of it. As far as I know, Mrs. White's renters have occupied it from the time she bought it on down. The new fence was set up against the old fence in places, and out six feet north of it in places."

Mrs. White upon recall further testified that: "Mr. Huffstедler told me when we were trying to make the deal that all the land was sold in farms. That is the way he told it. He didn't tell me anything about this piece until he told me about the lines; that about telling me before Mr. Tribble. I wasn't there, and don't know anything about that. He said I could hold the land all right, that he had held it 18 years, and never been bothered. Mr. Nettleton bought it in 1882. Q. About this conversation that took place in Mr. Meek's office—state why you went. A. The reason I went there I heard Lee Cousins bought it, and I heard that he was going to take forcible possession of it, and when I went up to Mr. Meek's office and asked him what I should do, and he said he wouldn't do that. Before that the surveyor came to the house and I thought it was the county surveyor, and, instead of that, it was Mr. Haskell. And then I came down and Lee came while I was there, and he said he was going to survey, and I said I didn't want any trouble. I said, 'How much did you pay for the land?' And I offered him $100 for his claim, and he said he would have to have $75 per acre, and was going to law to get. I made that offer to get the matter settled without a suit. Q. About how long after you bought this land was it that Mr. Payne made this claim? A. When he put them holes in was about three years. I owned it I guess eight or nine months when they had it surveyed. Mr. Huffstедler told me there was nothing to it. I claimed up to the fence. When he went to show me the line fence and the corner, he said that was a piece of this land got from another corner in there. This was known as railroad land. Nettleton bought it in 1882." Cross-examination: "Mr. Meeks didn't tell me he was Cousins' attorney the day I was in there. He said he wouldn't represent either of us on account of being a friend of both of us. I didn't tell Mr. Meeks in that conversation that Huffstедler told me he wasn't selling this land because he didn't tell me so."

Plaintiff admitted that the land in dispute had been in cultivation for about 29 years. Whereupon defendants rest. Thereupon plaintiff recalled S. M. Meeks, and inquired whether Mrs. White said that Amos Huffstедler told her he was selling the land in controversy when he made the deed. Witness said: "She stated he told her there was a corner of this other section run down in to it. * * * She didn't state when he told her that."

Defendant asked the following instructions, numbered 1 and 2.

"No. 1. If the defendant Margaret White understood and believed at the time she purchased the farm adjoining the land in question that said land went with said farm and was a part of the same, that she went into possession of the disputed land, maintained an inclosure around the same, and continued in the open, adverse, and exclusive possession of the same for a period of 10 years, claiming title thereto, then the finding should be for defendants, although defendant may have afterwards learned that the title to said lands was in dispute.

"No. 2. If the defendant Margaret White had the land in dispute within her inclosure for a period of more than 10 years consecutively prior to the filing of this suit and during all that time held the open, exclusive, and adverse possession of the same, claiming title thereto, then such possession has ripened into a title in the defendants, although she may have known that the record title to such land was in other persons, and that her title to said land was in dispute."

The court gave the first instruction, but refused the second, to which action of the court the defendant duly excepted. The plaintiff asked no instruction.

The court sitting without the assistance of a jury found the issues for the plaintiff; and the defendants, after moving unsuccessfully for a new trial, appealed the cause to this court.

J. N. Burroughs, of Westplains, for appellants. S. M. Meeks and G. M. Miley, both of Thayer, for respondent.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] 1. There are but two errors assigned: First, that the court erred in refusing to give instruction numbered 2, requested by defendants; and, second, that upon the whole record the findings and judgment were erroneous, and should have been for the defendants, and not for the plaintiff. We will dispose of those questions in the order stated.

As to the first, if this case had been tried as an action at law, which unquestionably it was, as the only defense was the statute of limitations (Lee v. Conran, 213 Mo. 404, 111 S. W. 1151), instruction numbered 2 should have been given, for the reason that it correctly announces the principle of law governing the statute of limitations pleaded in the answer.

[2] The only excuse offered by counsel for appellant for the action of the court in refusing said instruction is that there was no evidence introduced tending to show that the defendants were claiming adversely under color of title. Counsel for respondent have either overlooked some of the evidence or have misconceived its import. Mrs. White, one of the defendants, testified that she purchased the land from Amos Huffstедler, and that he pointed out the lines to her which inclosed this five-acre tract; also, that after she had entered into the contract of purchase, and had paid the first payment, he for the first time mentioned this five acres, and then only remarked that he had been in the uninterrupted possession thereof for thirteen years, and had never been disturbed therein, and that he was satisfied that she had a perfect title thereto. And Huffstедler does not contradict her in that regard except what he says he told Tribble in her presence regarding this five acres; and it should be observed that he did not state that she heard, or had the opportunity of hearing, what he said upon that occasion. She testified that, if he made any such statement to Tribble, she never heard it. But, be that true or false, it cannot be said she was not in the actual, exclusive, notorious, and adverse possession of this land for some 12 or 14 years before the institution of this suit, nor do I think it can seriously be contended but what she was claiming under color of title when we consider her testimony in connection with that of Meeks, respondent's attorney, Huffstедler, a witness for respondent, and that of William Miller and Joseph Rizeman, witnesses for appellants. In fact, their evidence shows conclusively that she was claiming title thereto, and actually dispossessed Payne, the real owner, a year or so after she purchased the land from Huffstедler. Moreover, the uncontradicted evidence shows that she was claiming title to the land all this time, not only by dispossessing Payne, but there was some kind of a proceeding had in court touching this land, in which it was shown that she was then claiming the title thereto, and that the remarks of Judge Evans made during the trial of that case shows that he not only knew she was claiming the title, but also that he thought her claim was well founded. She also consulted Mr. Meeks, the attorney for respondent, about this claim, and, while he is not clear just what his advice was, nevertheless it shows she was claiming title thereto. So, under this evidence, we are satisfied that there was an abundance of evidence tending to show that defendants were, during all the years they were in possession of the land, claiming adversely under color of title.

For the reasons stated, we are of the opinion that the instruction should have been given.

[3] And the fact that the case was tried before the court without a jury does not change the rules of law governing the giving and refusing instructions in actions at law. Crossett v. Ferrill, 209 Mo. 704, loc. cit. 707, 108 S. W. 52. We are therefore of the opinion that the court erred in refusing to give instruction numbered 2.

[4] 2. This brings us to the consideration of the second error assigned by counsel for defendants, namely, that upon all the evidence the findings and judgment of the court should have been for the appellants. If this had been a case in equity, there might have been much force in this contention, for the reason that then we would have had the right to review and weigh the evidence, and render such judgment or decree here as justice and equity might demand. Gibbs v. Haughwout, 207 Mo. 384, 105 S. W. 1067. But, this being an action at law, we have no such authority. The facts in such a case are triable before a jury, who are the sole judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given to their testimony.

Because of the error before mentioned, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded to be proceeded with in conformity to the views herein expressed. All concur.

HUNTER v. GARANFLO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 376*)—PURCHASE OF CORPORATE STOCK—POWER OF CORPORATION.

In view of Const. art. 12, §§ 7, 8, respectively providing that no corporation shall issue stock except for money, labor done, or property actually received, and that it shall engage in no business other than that expressly authorized, and Rev. St. 1909, §§ 3339, 3354, providing that at least one-half of the funds represented by the capital stock of a business corporation shall consist of lawful money and that it can only be diminished by certain formalities, a business corporation whose capital was $20,000 is without authority to purchase one-half of its shares at a premium, and hence a deed of trust given for that purpose is void.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1530; Dec. Dig. § 376.*]

2. CORPORATIONS (§ 484*)—POWERS OF CORPORATIONS—ACTING AS SURETY.

As business corporations are expressly forbidden by Const. art. 12, § 7, to engage in business other than that authorized by their charters, such a corporation has no power to act as surety of its stockholder and pledge its credit for his purchase of its stock, and therefore a deed of trust executed by it in pursuance of such a plan is void and unenforceable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1815; Dec. Dig. § 484.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ste. Genevieve County; Chas. A. Killian, Judge.

Action by Lee Hunter against W. H. Garanflo, as assignee. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Hope, of St. Louis, for appellant.
W. H. Miller, of Cape Girardeau, for respondent.

BROWN, C. This is a suit by appellant against the respondent as assignee under the insolvent laws of the state of Missouri of the Mathewson Mercantile Company, a Missouri business corporation, engaged in the business indicated by its name. Its object is to enforce the lien of a mortgage executed by the corporation February 17, 1902, in which A. G. Mathewson, Lizzie Mathewson, and Mabel Mathewson join, conveying the real estate of the corporation to secure the payment to the plaintiff of three notes aggregating $11,700, of the same date and signed by the same parties, and also other notes of the same parties to the People's Bank, aggregating $5,947.28. This bank was a private bank owned by plaintiff and one Albert Hunter. This suit involves the three Hunter notes only.

[1] The Mercantile Company was incorporated in 1901 with a capital stock of $20,000, $10,000 of which was subscribed by the plaintiff, $9,000 by A. G. Mathewson, and $1,000 by his wife, who is one of the makers of the notes and mortgage in question. The grantors in the mortgage, other than the corporation, are described as "all the stockholders of the said corporation." The Hunter notes were given in payment for the $10,000 of stock subscribed and owned by Hunter, and which were in this transaction transferred to A. G. Mathewson. Although other questions of interest were raised upon the trial, the case is submitted here upon the sole question as to whether or not the mortgage constitutes a valid lien upon the real estate of the corporation for the security of the Hunter notes, so that, if that question can be answered in the affirmative, this judgment should be reversed, and such judgment entered here as should have been entered in the trial court, or the cause remanded for further proceedings. If it be answered in the negative, the judgment should be affirmed.

The object and effect of the Constitution and laws of this state with reference to corporations seem to be to permit and encourage the investment of the money of the people in business enterprises under corporate management, without the incurring of any personal liability beyond the full payment for the stock subscribed or otherwise owned by the members of the association. That this plan has been of great benefit to the state, permitting as it does the free employment of the private means of all, including the helpless classes, in active business operations without the danger of other loss than of the capital invested, will be disputed by none. That the state should carefully safeguard such investments made with its encouragement, so that the fund which it permits to be substituted for personal liability, will be carefully preserved and scrupulously devoted to that purpose is equally evident. To this end, it is provided by the Constitution that "no corporation shall issue stock or bonds, except for money, labor done or property actually received" (article 12, § 8), and that "no corporation shall engage in business other than that expressly authorized in its charter or the law under which it may have been or hereafter may be organized" (Id. § 7). It is futile to say that these provisions are for the benefit of stockholders exclusively. They are both directed against the stockholders and are primarily intended for the benefit of the public by securing, as far as possible, the integrity of the fund for the protection of those who may deal with it, as well as those who may become the purchasers of its stock upon the faith of the representations made in the act of its incorporation. The withdrawal of this fund, or any part of it, by the stockholders, otherwise than under the sanction of the law in conformity with which it is created, or its application to other uses than those authorized by the laws under which the corporation exists, is a clear violation of the policy of the state as expressed in its Constitution. In this case the plaintiff is asking the aid of the court to enable him to appropriate to himself more than half the entire property of an insolvent mercantile corporation under a mortgage given by it to secure its note for $11,700, given him in consideration of the purchase of half its own capital stock of the par value of $10,000. This note and the mortgage securing it are signed by the stockholders owning the other half, and the evidence seems to indicate that one of them is the real purchaser.

The laws enacted in pursuance of the constitutional provisions we have quoted require that the fund represented by the capital stock of the business corporation shall have been provided at the time of its incorporation, and that at least one-half of it shall consist of lawful money of the United States in the custody of the persons constituting its first board of directors. Revised Statutes 1909, § 3339. This may only be diminished in the manner prescribed (Id. § 3354), which describes definitely the precautions which shall be taken to preserve the integrity and sufficiency of the remaining capital, and the publicity to attend the change. The condition of its capital at the time of such change must be spread upon the public records as fully as in the original organization and incorporation. If the corporation was the purchaser in this case, the effect of the transaction will be not only to reduce the capital stock of the company by one half, but to withdraw from it property greater in value than one-half its original capital, if the plaintiff's lien should be enforced. This would be in violation of both the letter and the spirit of the provisions of the Constitution and statutes to which we have referred, and is contrary to the sound public policy clearly indicated by these laws. An executory contract of such a character ought not to find favor in our courts. The question is not now before us as to whether a corporation may not, under some circumstances, lawfully become the owner of shares of its own capital stock, but no such circumstance enters into this case. This general question has been frequently presented to the courts for adjudication, both in this country and in England, and its decision has most frequently turned upon the force and effect of controlling statutory provisions in the several jurisdictions. Much learning has been collected upon the subject in a note to the Alabama case of Hall v. Henderson, 126 Ala. 449, 28 South. 531, 61 L. R. A. 621, 85 Am. St. Rep. 53, as well as in the briefs of the several counsel in the principal case, which the writer has read with much interest and profit, and the general tendency of which is in accordance with the conclusion to which we have arrived; but we are controlled alone by the terms of our own Constitution and statutes which it is our peculiar duty to enforce.

[2] The plaintiff is in no better situation if, as indicated by some of the evidence, Mr. A. G. Mathewson, its president, was the purchaser of the stock for which the corporation is called upon to pay. It was forbidden by the Constitution to engage in any business not expressly authorized by the law under which it was organized, and the purchase of its own stock under the circumstances of this case was not expressly authorized by the law of its existence, but was expressly forbidden; so that the contracts in controvery would constitute an attempt to pledge the assets of the corporation in a transaction entirely beyond its corporate powers. If it be said that the power of the corporation in such a case does not depend upon its power to do the thing which is the ultimate object of the transaction, but upon its power to become a surety for its stockholder, regardless of the nature of the transaction which is the subject of the suretyship, we find it equally well settled that it has no authority to so use its credit for the benefit of others. 2 Beach on Private Corporations, § 391.

The mortgage which constitutes the foundation of this proceeding being ultra vires the corporation and void, it results that the judgment of the New Madrid circuit court should be affirmed, and it is so adjudged.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

Proceedings for the disbarment of Ellroy V. Selleck, an attorney. Judgment of disbarment.

Walter H. Saunders, Thomas B. Harvey, and McDonald & Taylor, all of St. Louis, for relator. John Talty, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is an original proceeding for disbarment of the respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, Esq., instituted in this court at the instance of the St. Louis Bar Association, acting through its committee on grievances. Upon the respondent's appearing at the bar in person and by counsel, after notice and citation were duly served upon him, the court appointed Charles W. Bates, Esq., and George E. Smith, Esq., members of the St. Louis bar in good standing, as special commissioners to sit together, hear the testimony, and make report of their findings of fact and conclusions of law thereon with respect to the several charges preferred. The commissioners were duly sworn and qualified to act in that behalf, and in due time proceeded upon the discharge of the duties as such.

It appears that all parties interested appeared before the special commissioners in person and by counsel and introduced volumes of evidence, both oral and documentary. The special commissioners sat 18 days hearing testimony, and there were examined before them in all 85 witnesses. The record accompanying their report to this court consists of 4 volumes, containing in all 1,843 pages, besides an additional volume of documentary evidence alone in the form of exhibits introduced at the hearing. Together with this voluminous record the special commissioners filed here the following report, setting forth their findings of fact and conclusions of law:

"State of Missouri, City of St. Louis—as:

"In the St. Louis Court of Appeals, March Term, 1912.

"In the Matter of Ellroy V. Selleck.
No. 13,209.

"Special Commissioners' Report.

"George E. Smith and Charles W. Bates, special commissioners appointed by this honorable court on November 20, 1911, to jointly take the testimony offered by the parties, relator and respondent, and to report the same, together with findings of fact and conclusions of law, as more fully appears by the copy of the order of appointment hereto attached and made a part hereof, after duly taking the oath of office on said day, which oath is hereto attached and made a part hereof, did by consent of parties, Messrs. Thomas B. Harvey and Walter N. Saunders appearing for relators, and Mr. John A. Talty appearing for respondent Selleck, after due notice and by consent of parties, begin the hearing of said cause on the 27th day of December, 1911, and continued to hear the same from time to time and from adjournment to adjournment as by consent of all parties until the 5th day of July, 1912, when both parties concluded the testimony desired to be heard by them, respectively. That your commissioners held sixteen (16) sessions of entire days and two (2) sessions of half days, and heard the testimony of eighty-five (85) witnesses.

"Your commissioners further report that they file herewith and make a part hereof transcript of the proceedings had before them, the testimony appearing in eighteen hundred and forty-three (1,843) pages, and the written documents in evidence as exhibits appearing in a large separate volume. After hearing counsel, Messrs. Harvey and Saunders on behalf of relators, and Mr. Talty on behalf of respondent, your commissioners report as follows:

"The charges against respondent Ellroy V. Selleck are presented by the Bar Association of the city of St. Louis, seeking the disbarment of said Selleck. These charges are five in number, as appears from the charges filed in this court on the 30th day of September, 1911.

"Charge First.

"Your commissioners find the issues in favor of respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, upon this charge.

"Charge Second.

"Your commissioners find the issues in favor of respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, upon this charge.

"Charge Third.

"Your commissioners find the issues in favor of respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, on this charge.

"Charge Fourth.

"Your commissioners find the issues against Ellroy V. Selleck on this charge, and find him guilty as charged. Further upon this charge your commissioners find: That said Ellroy V. Selleck was in the year 1908 duly admitted to practice law and licensed to practice law in the courts of the state of Missouri by the Supreme Court of Missouri, and from that time continuously up to the present time he has been engaged in the practice of law as an attorney and counsellor. That in the months of November and December, 1908, one Charles Mathew Kotzaurek was conducting two hat stores in the city of St. Louis, one at 603 Pine street and one at 907 Pine street, and that the said Kotzaurek was indebted to various persons for rent of the said stores and for hats purchased and contracted for. That in his employ at that time was one Bertha Henkel. That at that time and prior thereto the said Ellroy V. Selleck was and had been the attorney and counsel for said Bertha Henkel. That some time in the month of November or December, 1908, said Bertha Henkel introduced the said Kotzaurek to her attorney, the said Ellroy V. Selleck. That, under the advice and direction of said Selleck, he conspiring with the said Kotzaurek and the said Henkel, a scheme was devised by said Selleck for this purpose, and said Kotzaurek and said Henkel directed by the said Selleck in his capacity as their counsellor and attorney to execute falsely bills of sale and promissory notes, and to authorize the said Selleck to execute certain checks to apparently consummate a sale of the stock of hats by said Kotzaurek to said Henkel. That said papers were executed and delivered, although in truth and in fact no such transaction took place as purported to be set forth by said papers. That litigation ensued, involving those transactions, and as a part of the conspiracy and plan devised by said Selleck to carry out said fraudulent scheme he, the said Selleck, directed and instructed the said Henkel to give false and perjured testimony, in pursuance of which plan and scheme said Henkel did knowingly, willfully, and intentionally in the trial of said litigation give false and perjured testimony under the direction and at the suggestion of said Selleck, and the said Selleck, in said litigation, did knowingly, willfully, and intentionally give false and perjured testimony.

"Charge Fifth.

"Your commissioners find against the respondent Ellroy V. Selleck on this charge, and find that the allegations in said charge are true: Further, your commissioners find: That said Selleck, being a licensed attorney as heretofore stated, and practicing his profession in the city of St. Louis, was for some months prior to July 20, 1910, employed by one John Link as attorney and legal advisor. That said John Link died on the 20th day of July, 1910, and that letters testamentary were issued by the probate court of the city of St. Louis to his widow, Minna Link, on July 23, 1910. That during his lifetime the said John Link was the owner, among other things, of the following notes, secured by deeds of trust, to wit: One principal promissory note, dated April 1, 1906, executed by one John Schmittlel for the sum of $3,500, which note, prior to the times hereinafter referred to, had been reduced by payments to $2,750, said note was payable to B. C. Stephens of Clayton, Mo., three years after its date, and by him indorsed without recourse. Said note had been purchased by said John Link, and time had been extended on said note and new interest notes for $150 each given therefor. Said notes were secured by deed of trust on lot No. 2 of Human place, being a subdivision of the W. ½ of the W. ¼ of the N. W. ¼ of section eight (8), township forty-five (45) N., range six (6) E., in St. Louis county, Mo. Also a principal promissory note for $4,500, executed by one Ellen A. Manion, dated April 1, 1910, payable three years after date to August J. Kuhs, Jr., and by him indorsed; also six (6) interest notes accompanying the same, each for the sum of $123.75, all secured by deed of trust on lot eighty-two (82) of Tower Grove Heights amended subdivision, in block 4114 of the city of St. Louis, Mo. That after the death of John Link said Ellroy V. Selleck was employed by Mrs. Minna Link as her attorney to represent her and the estate of John Link, upon which she was administering. That shortly after the death of John Link, and before letters testamentary were issued on John Link's estate, the said Ellroy V. Selleck, either by impersonating John Link or otherwise, unlawfully obtained access to the safety deposit box of the said John Link in the Mercantile Trust Company, where the said Link kept his papers, among others the said notes and deeds of trust. That the said Ellroy V. Selleck obtained possession of said notes and deeds of trust, and unlawfully, wilfully, and knowingly, with the intention of depriving the true owners thereof of their property, converted the same to his own use. That he has refused to account for same or their value to the said estate of John Link, deceased, or to the executrix of said estate or to the attorneys employed by the executrix after she discharged from employment the said Selleck. That the said Selleck falsely pretended that John Link in his lifetime had entered into a written contract with him as attorney for said John Link and one McGregor, whereby the said Schmittel notes and deed of trust were transferred to said Selleck, and falsely pretended that said contract was stolen from him (the said Selleck's) desk, whereas your commissioners find the fact to be that no such contract was ever executed, nor was any such contract ever stolen from said Selleck's desk or otherwise.

"Your commissioners find as a matter of law, upon the facts so found as above, that said Ellroy V. Selleck is not a fit or proper person to practice law in the state of Missouri, and that his license so to practice should be revoked.

"Respectfully submitted,

"Charles W. Bates,

"George E. Smith.

"Special Commissioners."

From the report of the special commissioners above copied it appears that the finding was for respondent on the first, second, and third charges laid against him, but against him on the fourth and fifth charges therein set forth and described. To this report the respondent filed exceptions, and those exceptions have been extensively argued by counsel at the bar, and the case duly submitted for determination. The two sitting members of the court have devoted more than a week's time in reading and comparing the mass of testimony and numerous documents contained in the record and considering the arguments in support of the respondent's exceptions. Having given the case most thoughtful and careful consideration, upon reviewing all of the evidence, we incline to the view expressed in the special commissioners' report above set forth. It is true that there is considerable testimony in the record tending to prove the innocence of defendant on both of the charges which the special commissioners found against him, but upon comparing this testimony with that of other witnesses and irrefutable dates and documents introduced, and the revelations made in some of the cross-examinations, we are fully persuaded that the special commissioners ascertained the truth with respect to the whole matter.

[1] Furthermore, when the evidence is conflicting, as it is here, it is proper for the court to defer to the finding of the special commissioners who have the witnesses before them face to face, and are thus afforded an opportunity through observing their demeanor on the stand to form a more accurate conclusion touching the matter of credibility and as to what testimony is and what is not true than is the reviewing court which sees only the cold record in print. See State of Mo. ex rel. Gay v. Jones, 158 Mo. App. 170, 138 S. W. 81.

[2] The evidence abundantly supports the findings of fact above set forth in the report of the special commissioners, and if the facts are properly found, as they appear to be, no one can doubt the soundness of the conclusions of law announced by the special commissioners thereon in their report. In this view the respondent's exceptions filed to the report should be overruled and the report of the special commissioners adopted in toto. It is so ordered. It is therefore the judgment of the court that the respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, Esq., who, as appears from the records of this court, is an enrolled member of its bar, be and he is hereby debarred from the further practice of the profession of an attorney and counselor at law under the laws of this state in any of the courts thereof and especially from the bar of this court; that his license to practice law and as a member of the bar of this state be and the same is hereby canceled and annulled, and to be henceforth held as naught. Furthermore, that the relators have and recover the cost of this proceeding to be taxed by the clerk according to law of and from the respondent, Ellroy V. Selleck, and that execution issue. It is so ordered and adjudged.

1. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO EVIDENCE.

Where the evidence showed that defendants knew that corn purchased from plaintiffs was wet and had been trampled on by cattle, and that there was nothing to prevent them from ascertaining the extent of the damage, although they claimed that it was so piled by plaintiffs as to conceal its extent, and they also saw its condition when delivered, and before shipment to market, an instruction that they could not recover on their counterclaim for the damages caused by being compelled to sell it at a reduced price, if they knew of its damaged condition, was not erroneous, on the ground that there was no evidence that they knew of such condition.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1083*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—ERROR FAVORABLE TO APPELLANT.

Where the evidence did not show that a person suing for the purchase price of hay guaranteed it, an instruction that he did not guarantee that it was of any particular marketable grade, but only that it was of some value in some grade, was not prejudicial to defendant.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mercer County; Geo. W. Wanamaker, Judge.

Action by George T. Mullinax and others against W. H. Lowry and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Wm. C. Forsee, of Kansas City, and J. C. Wilson, of Bethany, for appellants. A. G. Knight, of Trenton, and Orton & Orton, of Princeton, for respondents.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiffs' action is for the price of hay sold to defendants. They recovered judgment in the circuit court for $27.79.

This is the second appeal. 140 Mo. App. 42, 124 S. W. 572. It is alleged in the petition that plaintiffs sold to defendants three-fifths of a certain crop of hay at $9 per ton, baled and delivered on railway cars; that they delivered 50 tons and 419 pounds, on which defendants paid $226.21, leaving a balance of $227.79 due on such delivery. It is then charged that there remained of the whole lot sold 51 tons and 245 pounds, which defendants refused to receive; that at the date of refusal the hay (having fallen in price) was worth only $5.80 per ton, by reason of which plaintiffs were damaged in the sum of $170.75. The prayer was for judgment in the sum of $398.54.

The answer, in the first count, alleges that they bought the hay, as well as 2,500 bushels of corn, of plaintiffs as agents of one Fox, and that plaintiffs knew it, and therefore they did not incur any individual liability to plaintiffs. The further answer was in the nature of a counterclaim, and alleges that at the time of the purchase of the hay they also bought the corn at 50 cents per bushel, to be delivered by plaintiffs; that Fox, their principal, became a bankrupt, and that they entered into a new contract individually, whereby they purchased the corn for the reduced price of 45 cents per bushel, on account of it having been piled on the ground and become wet and trampled on by cattle. But, as we understand the pleading, it is charged that plaintiffs so piled the corn as to greatly conceal the extent and nature of the damage, and that after the purchase, and before the delivery by plaintiffs, the latter allowed it to remain on the ground and become further injured; that when plaintiffs delivered it on the cars it was mixed with dirt and rubbish, but that defendants, relying upon it being in the same condition as when they bought, shipped to the market, and were compelled to sell at a greatly reduced price, whereby they were damaged in the sum of $400.

[1] We do not see how the verdict, in view of defendants' testimony in their own behalf, could have been different. We will consider it as determining all matters of fact, and look only to the action of the court at the trial. The first instruction was that if defendants knew of the damaged condition of the corn by the cattle, etc., when they purchased they should not be allowed damages on that account. The objection is that there is no evidence of such knowledge. An examination of the evidence of one of the defendants shows they did know it—that is, they saw it was in a damaged condition—and nothing hindered them from ascertaining the exact extent of the damage. In addition, they further saw its condition before it was sent to market, and yet they shipped it. So the same may be said of objection to instruction No. 7. The testimony of defendant Lowry himself is enough to authorize the jury to believe that his present claim is not just.

Instruction No. 4 was to the effect that there could be no assignment of the $200 paid to plaintiffs by Fox, and we see no objection to it.

[2] Instruction No. 5 was objected to on the ground that it states it was "admitted" by defendants that they received hay at $9 per ton, amounting to $227.29. It would have been better not to have stated that defendants had admitted it. But we do not see, in view of the patent fact, how any harm could have resulted.

[3] Instructions 8 and 9 were to the effect that plaintiffs did not guarantee that the hay was of any particular marketable grade, and they were not bound further than that it was of some value in some grade. Whatever bearing these instructions may have had was against plaintiffs, since, under the circumstances disclosed in evidence, we do not see how plaintiffs were to be held to have guaranteed anything.

There is a lengthy criticism of instruction No. 10, whereby the attempt is made to show where, as a whole, and in separate parts, it was prejudicial to defendants. We do not think it was. Other objections, untenable we think, are made to other instructions.

But when all, in connection with those given for defendants, are considered as a series, we think the jury could not have been misled. The only hurtful tendency we have discovered is their extreme length. Combined, they cover 19 printed pages; defendants having the greater part. We cannot discover a criticism to be made upon those for plaintiffs which could not be offset by a like offense committed by defendants. No error was made in the ruling upon the evidence. Considering the contest is over a verdict for $27.79, great effort has been displayed—zeal worthy of a better cause. There is no reason for further protracting the case.

No error has been shown us which we can say substantially affected the merits of the cause; and hence we affirm the judgment. All concur.

TRACY v. BUCHANAN.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 78*)—PRESUMPTIONS—SUPPRESSION AND SPOILIATION OF DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE.

In an action for breach of a contract to sell corporate stock, defendant claimed that he merely acted as plaintiff's agent to procure the stock from other persons. It appeared that plaintiff executed a check for the down payment and notes for the deferred payments, together with a chattel mortgage, and delivered them to a third person, to be delivered to defendant upon receipt of the stock; and it was claimed by plaintiff that a bill of sale of the stock by defendant was also delivered to such third person. Defendant obtained possession of the papers from the third person, and destroyed the chattel mortgage. Held, every presumption being against the despoiler of documentary evidence, that it would be presumed that a bill of sale was delivered as claimed by plaintiff, and that if the papers had not been destroyed they would have shown a contract of sale by defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 98, 100; Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

2. DAMAGES (§ 9*)—NOMINAL DAMAGES—AWARD IRRESPECTIVE OF ACTUAL DAMAGE.

The breach of a contract is an actionable injury, giving an absolute right to at least nominal damages; and hence an instruction that, unless defendant's breach caused plaintiff substantial damage, the jury should find for defendant was erroneous.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Moniteau County; R. A. Breuer, Special Judge.

Action by W. W. Tracy against Thomas J. Buchanan. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. Embry, of California, Mo., for appellant. Moore & Williams, Harry J. Libby, and E. T. Hockaday, of Shelbyna, Mo., for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages for the breach by defendant of a contract for the sale and delivery of shares of stock in a telephone corporation. The answer is a general denial. A trial resulted in a verdict for defendant, but, on motion of plaintiff, the court set aside the verdict and granted a new trial, on the ground, stated in the order, of error in giving instructions B and C, asked by defendant. Dissatisfied with this action of the court, defendant brought the case here by appeal.

Defendant was the president and manager of the California Telephone Company, a corporation owning and operating a telephone exchange in the city of California. The capital stock of the company was $9,000, divided into 90 shares of the par value of $100 each. Defendant owned 20 shares, and the remaining stock was held by various persons residing in California. Plaintiff lived in Shelbyna, and was engaged in the business of buying and selling telephone exchanges. In July, 1910, the parties began negotiations for the purchase by plaintiff of a controlling interest in the stock of the company. The negotiations were conducted chiefly by correspondence, and the letters written by plaintiff were not preserved by defendant, and, as no copies of them were kept by plaintiff, their contents were the subject of a sharp dispute at the trial. Plaintiff testified that the proposals he made in them were for the purchase of the stock from defendant; while defendant testified that in the purchase of the stock it was understood he was acting as the agent of plaintiff as to all the shares except those owned by him, which were to be included in the sale.

It is conceded plaintiff did not offer to pay the full purchase price of the stock at the time of delivery. At first he offered to make a down payment of $2,000, and to give defendant his notes for the remainder, secured by a chattel mortgage on all of the stock to be purchased. Later he found it would be inconvenient for him to pay more than $1,500 on the purchase price, and he wrote defendant to that effect, and further objected to going into debt so deeply. Under date of July 16, 1910, defendant wrote plaintiff as follows: "Yours of the 15th inst. recd. Contents noted. You say you do not want to go in debt so much. Now if you want the exchange I will make you a proposition that you cannot afford to pass up for any trade. I will retain $2,000.00 instead of $1,000.00. You will have $9,000.00 only invested. As to terms you can pay $1,500 down and balance as you want to. Now if you want the chance of your life come at once as I am going to make a deal in a few days. In regard to your farm you can trade it for real estate here I think without any trouble. Let me hear at once."

On August 11, 1910, plaintiff, according to his testimony, mailed an offer to defendant to purchase 70 shares for $8,500, to pay down $1,500, and to discharge the remainder of the purchase price in deferred payments. Defendant replied by letter, but his reply is not in the record, and we do not know its contents. Evidently it was favorable to the continuance of the negotiations, and evoked a response from plaintiff to the effect that he would go to California to close the deal in person. The record relating to the correspondence preceding plaintiff's visit to California, which occurred August 22, 1910, is very unsatisfactory, but we are able to say with certainty that the letters do not evidence a binding contract between the parties. Plaintiff himself testified that there were some "variations" between the terms of sale agreed upon in the letters and those in the contract finally made by the parties at the end of their personal negotiations. One of the conceded changes was an increase of the purchase price of the 70 shares from $8,500 to $8,554. The contract that was finally entered into was made at California, and the terms of that contract are a matter of controversy.

[1] We shall not go into the details of the evidence bearing on this subject. The evidence of plaintiff, to the effect that defendant undertook the sale and delivery on the first day of the following month of 70 shares of stock at the agreed price, is not only substantial, but, as we shall show, must be treated as conclusive. The day after the contract had been made, and after plaintiff had returned home, defendant telephoned him that the contract could not be carried out, and also wrote him a letter, in which defendant said: "Complications have arisen which cannot be adjusted. I am returning you papers as per agreement." The papers referred to were plaintiff's check of $1,500 for the down payment and notes he had executed for the deferred payments. These papers, together with a chattel mortgage executed by plaintiff to secure the deferred payments, and which covered the stock to be transferred, had been placed by the parties in the hands of a banker at California, with the understanding that the check, notes, and mortgage were to be delivered to defendant on delivery by him to the banker for plaintiff of the 70 shares of stock. These deliveries were to be made on the first day of the following month, and the papers were to remain in the banker's hands until that time. But, finding that he could not procure the stock necessary to consummate the sale, defendant obtained the papers from the banker, destroyed the chattel mortgage, and sent the other papers to plaintiff. Plaintiff states that a bill of sale executed by defendant, conveying to him the 70 shares of stock, was placed in the hands of the banker with the other papers; but this statement is denied by defendant. The excuses offered by defendant for procuring these papers from their custodian and destroying at least one of them are too flimsy to merit serious consideration. His conduct was high-handed and inexcusable; and, as it resulted in the destruction of important documentary evidence, we shall accept as proved the statement of plaintiff that there was a bill of sale among the papers deposited with the banker which, in form and substance, bound defendant, as vendor, to deliver the shares of stock to the banker for plaintiff's benefit. Every presumption is against the despoiler of documentary evidence. "His conduct is attributed to his supposed knowledge that the truth would have operated against him." 1 Greenleaf on Ev. § 37. It is said by our own Supreme Court, in Pomeroy v. Benton, 77 Mo. loc. cit. 87: "Numerous instances are given in the books of the like application of the rule, where it is held that spoliation of documentary evidence being proved against a defendant that thereby he is held to admit the truth of the plaintiff's allegations; and this upon the ground that the law, in consequence of the fraud practiced, in consequence of the spoliation, will presume that the evidence destroyed would establish the plaintiff's demand to be just."

To permit the despoiler to dispute his adversary's statement of the contents of the destroyed document would be to permit him to profit by his own wrong—to gain the very advantage his lawless act was designed to secure. Applying this rule, we must hold that, inasmuch as defendant admits the destruction of certain papers having an important bearing on the relation existing between him and plaintiff, we should assume, as a matter of law, that the papers deposited with the banker evidenced a contract of sale in which defendant was the vendor and plaintiff the vendee, and disproved the assertion of defendant that he was merely the agent of plaintiff.

With the case in such posture, i. e., with the contract of sale admitted, and with the breach of defendant indubitably established, there was only one issue of fact to go to the jury, viz., the quantum of plaintiff's damages. We find in the instructions given at the request of defendant that he was allowed the benefit of the defense of agency. This was prejudicial error for which a new trial should have been granted.

[2] The instructions of defendant which the court concluded were erroneous related to the measure of damages, and directed a verdict for defendant, unless the jury should find that plaintiff had suffered substantial damages from the breach. Regardless of whether or not he sustained actual damages, plaintiff was entitled to maintain an action for the wrong inflicted upon him. A breach of contract is a wrong, an injury, and the rule is fundamental that for every actionable injury there is an absolute right to damages.

If no actual damages are proved, the legal implication of damages remains, and nominal damages should be allowed. Fulkerson v. Eads, 19 Mo. App. loc. cit. 623; Lampert v. Drug Co., 119 Mo. App. loc. cit. 693, 100 S. W. 659. The instructions were erroneous, and the error was sufficient to warrant the order allowing a new trial.

The point, made by plaintiff, of error in the ruling of the court that the wife of defendant was disqualified from giving testimony relating to certain issues in the case is not well taken. See Fishback v. Harrison, 137 Mo. App. 664, 119 S. W. 465, in which will be found an answer to the argument of counsel for plaintiff on this point.

We find no other error in the record. The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

DODGE v. CHILDERS.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri.
Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. PARTNERSHIP (§ 5*)—EXISTENCE OF RELATION.

Where defendant, who had employed his brother, a lawyer, as agent, to procure a purchaser of his farm, employed plaintiff to advertise the property for a commission if a purchaser was procured, but the agency of the brother was not revoked, and it was agreed that plaintiff should turn over to him the answers received to the advertisements, and that the brother should thereafter conduct the negotiations with prospective purchasers, for which services he should receive a commission from defendant equal to that of plaintiff in the event their combined efforts produced a purchaser, plaintiff and defendant's brother were not partners in the transaction, but plaintiff was merely employed to render individual service, and he could sue in his own name for the agreed compensation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 15, 16; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. BROKERS (§ 7*)—CONTRACTS—JOINT CONTRACTS.

The testimony of defendant in an action to recover a commission for services performed by plaintiff in the sale of a farm of defendant that the obligation of defendant who had previously employed his brother to procure a purchaser was not to pay the commission to the two jointly, but to his brother alone, with the understanding that his brother would employ plaintiff, and divide the commission with him if he procured a purchaser, did not prove a joint obligation, though it disproved plaintiff's cause of action, and did not show that plaintiff and defendant's brother were joint contractors, but plaintiff could sue alone for the services rendered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-8; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. BROKERS (§ 9*)—CONTRACT OF EMPLOYMENT—REVOCATION OF AGENCY.

Where a contract employing a broker to procure a purchaser of real estate contained no provision limiting the duration of the agency, the law implied an agreement for the performance of the service within a reasonable time, after the lapse of which either party could terminate the contract on notice.

4. BROKERS (§ 88*)—EMPLOYMENT—LIABILITY FOR COMMISSION—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action by a broker for commissions for procuring a purchaser of real estate, the evidence showed that the contract of employment did not limit the duration of the agency, and it showed that prior to a sale he had revoked the agency, and plaintiff testified that he received no notice, and showed that the purchaser at first abandoning the idea of purchasing the property subsequently decided to purchase and actually purchased the property, instructions that defendant could revoke the agency if he acted in good faith, and not in furtherance of a purpose to deprive plaintiff of a fairly earned commission, fairly submitted the issue of revocation.

5. BROKERS (§ 44*)—EMPLOYMENT—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS.

Where an owner employing a broker to procure a purchaser mailed his notice of revocation after receiving a proposal from a purchaser procured by the broker, the act of the owner was in bad faith, and did not deprive the broker of his commission.

6. BROKERS (§ 44*)—EMPLOYMENT—RIGHT TO COMMISSIONS.

Where an owner employing a broker to procure a purchaser of real estate mailed a notice of revocation before receiving the proposal of a purchaser procured by the broker, or knowledge of the proposal, he was not relieved of the imputation of bad faith, but his subsequent acceptance of the purchaser's offer entitled the broker to receive his commission on the theory that he had performed the contract while unrevoked.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Brokers, Cent. Dig. § 45; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Sullivan County; Fred Lamb, Judge.

Action by Thomas A. Dodge against Stephen L. Childers. From a judgment granting a new trial after verdict for defendant, he appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Bingham, Earl F. Nelson, and W. H. Childers, all of Milan, for appellant. D. M. Wilson and John W. Clapp, both of Milan, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. Plaintiff sued to recover a commission for services performed in the sale of a farm owned by defendant in Sullivan county. The petition states that in the month of October, 1910, defendant "placed the said farm in plaintiff's hands to sell or exchange for him at and for the sum of not less than $47.50 per acre, and agreed to pay plaintiff the sum of 50 cents per acre for selling or trading the same at that price per acre, and agreed, in addition, to pay him the one-half of all that said land brought over and above $47.50 per acre; that the plaintiff found a purchaser in one W. O. Swearengen of said county, and that said farm of 700 acres was sold to said Swearengen for $48 an acre, and that a deed was made by said defendant and his wife on the 6th day of March, 1911, for said 700 acres, and that the said Swearengen is now the owner and in the possession thereof; that thereby the defendant became indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $525, and that the said sum was and is justly due from defendant to plaintiff; but that, although the plaintiff has demanded of defendant the sum of $525, the defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay plaintiff the said sum of $525 or any part thereof." The principal defenses interposed by the answer are, first, that plaintiff is not entitled to maintain the action as an individual plaintiff, for the reason that he was not employed in that capacity but as a member of a partnership; and, second, that defendant revoked the agency of the partnership before a purchaser ready, willing, and able to purchase the farm on the terms proposed had been procured. A reply in the nature of a general traverse of these affirmative defenses was filed by plaintiff, and the issues raised by the pleadings were tried and submitted to a jury. A verdict for defendant was returned, and in due time plaintiff filed a motion for a new trial which alleged errors in the rulings on questions of evidence and in the instructions given the jury, and further alleged that the verdict was against the weight of the evidence. The court sustained the motion and granted a new trial, but failed to state the ground of the ruling in the order. Defendant appealed.

Plaintiff is the owner and publisher of a newspaper in Milan, the county seat of Sullivan county. Defendant owned a farm of 700 acres 6 or 7 miles from Milan. Some time before the events in controversy, he had removed to Oklahoma, and resided on a farm in the vicinity of Helena, in Alfalfa county. He wished to sell his farm in Sullivan county, and visited Milan in October, 1910, partly for the purpose of effecting a sale. He had employed his brother, W. H. Childers, a lawyer in Milan, as his agent, but no purchaser had been found. During the visit to Milan he had an interview with plaintiff, in which, according to the testimony of the latter, he agreed to employ plaintiff to advertise the farm, and agreed that if a purchaser should be procured by such means who would buy the farm at $47.50 per acre to pay plaintiff a commission of 50 cents per acre, and, if a higher price should be obtained, to pay an additional commission equal to one-half the excess of the purchase price over $47.50 per acre. The agency of W. H. Childers was not revoked, and it was agreed that plaintiff should turn over to him the answers received by plaintiff to the advertisements, and Childers should, thereafter, conduct the negotiations with prospective buyers, for which service he should receive a commission from defendant equal to that of plaintiff in the event their combined efforts produced a purchaser.

The evidence of defendant contradicts that of plaintiff only as to the details of the employment of the latter. The fact that plaintiff's services were enlisted is not disputed, but defendant says he employed his brother to sell the farm at the price stated, agreed to give him a commission of $1 per acre if he procured a purchaser on the terms proposed, and that plaintiff was employed to assist his brother, and was to share his brother's commission in case their joint efforts proved successful. Neither party claims that plaintiff was to receive a commission if his services in advertising the farm did not procure a purchaser, and, as we understand defendant's version of the tripartite agreement, W. H. Childers would have been entitled to receive the full commission had he procured a purchaser without the aid of plaintiff's services in advertising the farm, and was required to share the commission with plaintiff only in the event of the purchaser being procured through the medium of plaintiff's services.

[1] Before proceeding further with the statement of the facts of the case, we shall pause to dispose of the contention of defendant that plaintiff was a partner of W. H. Childers, and therefore cannot maintain this action which is prosecuted for the enforcement of an individual demand. In the instructions to the jury given at the request of defendant, the learned trial judge treated the question of partnership or no partnership as involving an issue of fact, and authorized the jury to return a verdict for defendant on the hypothesis presented by defendant's evidence relating to that issue. We think this was an erroneous view to take of the evidence. The mere fact, if it be a fact, that plaintiff (if his services proved effective) was to share the commission with W. H. Childers, is not conclusive evidence of a partnership agreement. Plaintiff was employed to render a special service, and his employment was merely auxiliary to that of Childers. The agency of the latter was more general, of a wider scope, and was accorded rights in which the lesser agency had no participation. There was no mutual agreement between plaintiff and Childers to share all the profits that might be realized from the subject-matter of the agency of the latter, but only such profits as might accrue from plaintiff's service. Without an agreement to share the profits derived from both sources the contract lacked a fundamental element of a partnership agreement. Plaintiff was employed to render individual service, and the question of partnership or no partnership raised by the pleadings involves no issue of fact.

[2] It is suggested that, if plaintiff and Childers were not partners, nevertheless they were joint contractors with defendant. We do not think so. The obligation of defendant, as stated by himself, was not to pay the commission to the two agents jointly, but to his brother alone, with the understanding that his brother would employ plaintiff and divide the commission with him if he procured a purchaser. Defendant testified that in reply to plaintiff's application for employment he said: "I will make arrangements with Hez (W. H. Childers) to sell the place, and anything that you and him does is all right with me." This tends to disprove the cause of action pleaded in the petition founded on the alleged employment of plaintiff by defendant on terms including a direct obligation of defendant to pay plaintiff a stated commission, but it does not tend to prove the existence of a joint obligation of the promisor to two or more promisees which is an essential element of a joint contract.

The evidence discloses that plaintiff advertised the farm in each issue of his paper, and turned over to W. H. Childers the answers received by him. Prompted by one of these advertisements, a Mr. Swearengen called on W. H. Childers in December, 1910, and inquired about the terms of sale. On being informed that the price was $50 per acre, Swearengen refused to buy at that price, and exhibited no further interest in the subject until February 25, 1911, when he again called on Childers, and offered $48 per acre for the farm on condition that a farm of 160 acres owned by him be accepted as part payment of the purchase price. Childers told him to put his offer in writing and mail it to defendant. Swearengen did so, and mailed the letter that evening to defendant at Helena, Okl. Two days later—i. e., February 27th—defendant mailed letters at Helena, addressed, respectively, to plaintiff and W. H. Childers, revoking the employment of each, and withdrawing the farm from the market. There is a sharp dispute between the parties over the fact of whether defendant mailed these letters before or after he received Swearengen's letter. Defendant says he had no knowledge of Swearengen's proposal at that time, and that he was prompted to withdraw the farm from sale on account of the near approach of another crop season and his decision to work the farm himself. In a day or two after he mailed the letters he went to Milan, and within a week after Swearengen had mailed his offer defendant accepted it in person, and afterward the sale was consummated.

[3, 4] The instructions given the jury at the request of defendant express the idea that defendant had the right to revoke the agency if he acted in good faith, and not in furtherance of a purpose to deprive plaintiff of a fairly earned commission. These instructions correctly state the rule applicable to one of the controverted issues of fact. There is evidence introduced by defendant to the effect that in the early part of February, perhaps two weeks before the reappearance of Swearengen with his offer, defendant mailed a letter to W. H. Childers, in which he withdrew the farm from the market and dismissed his agents. Childers testified that immediately after receiving that letter he advised plaintiff of its contents. Plaintiff denies this statement, and says he received no such notice of the termination of the agency. It was proper to send this issue of fact to the jury, with the direction to return a verdict for defendant on the acceptance of defendant's version of such notice of revocation. The contract of employment contained no provision limiting the duration of the agency, and therefore the law would imply an agreement for the performance of the service within a reasonable time after the lapse of which either party would have a right to terminate the relation by giving notice to the other. The rule recognized in this state thus is stated in La Force v. University, 108 Mo. App. loc. cit. 523, 81 S. W. 211: "The law is that even where there is no specific time named as limiting the agency, and a reasonable time elapses without a sale (circumstances considered), the owner may, in good faith, without design to avoid payment of commission, revoke the agency and sell to the party with whom the agent had been negotiating"—citing cases. To the same effect is the decision of the Supreme Court in Loving v. Cattle Co., 176 Mo. loc. cit. 351, 75 S. W. 1095. At the time in question, Swearengen, though moved to inquire of Childers about the farm by the efforts of plaintiff, had apparently abandoned the idea of purchasing, and, when the notice of revocation was communicated to plaintiff, it could not be said that his services had been fruitful. He had not procured a customer ready, willing, and able to buy the farm on the terms proposed, or on terms acceptable to defendant. And a reasonable time for the performance of the contract having elapsed defendant had the right to revoke the agency, and thereafter, without incurring liability to his discharged agents, might sell the farm to any purchaser he could find, including Swearengen.

[5] But we think the instructions deal in an erroneous and prejudicial manner with the attempt of defendant to revoke the agency by his letter to plaintiff mailed at Helena on February 27, 1911, two days after Swearengen had mailed his proposal to buy the farm. On the hypothesis of plaintiff's evidence that this letter of defendant was his first expression of a purpose to terminate the agency, we do not perceive any just ground on which the notice contained in the letter may be used to defeat plaintiff's claim to a commission. If defendant mailed the letter after receiving Swearengen's proposal, such attempt to discharge his agent in the face of negotiations initiated by the agent and about to be successfully concluded could not be regarded otherwise than as an act of bad faith towards the agent, and, as such, would not be suffered to deprive the agent of his just reward.

[6] On the other hand, if defendant's letter was mailed before he received Swearengen's letter or had knowledge of its contents, he would be relieved of the imputation of bad faith, but his subsequent acceptance of Swearengen's offer entitled plaintiff to receive his commission on the ground that he had fully performed the contract of agency at a time when it stood unrevoked and in full force. The transaction of the sale of the farm had its beginning in the offer of Swearengen to purchase on terms acceptable to defendant, and the acceptance of that offer by defendant marked the successful culmination of the transaction. The task plaintiff was employed to perform was to procure a purchaser ready, able, and willing to buy the land on the terms proposed or on other terms satisfactory to defendant. He had performed that task before the attempted revocation of the agency, and defendant will not be permitted to accept the fruits of the agency contract, and then to repudiate its burdens.

The errors in the instructions we have discussed justified the ruling sustaining the motion for a new trial, and we shall assume that the ruling was prompted by the considerations to which we have given expression. We deem it our duty to remind the court that in failing to comply with the request of counsel for defendant to state in the order the ground on which the new trial was granted the court disobeyed the express command of the statute (section 2023, Rev. Stat. 1909) that "every order allowing a new trial shall specify of record the ground or grounds on which said new trial is granted."

The judgment is affirmed. All concur.

EVIDENCE (§ 244*)—ADMISSIBILITY—DECLARATIONS OF AGENT.

In an action for false imprisonment, the declarations of defendants' agent, the day after the arrest, that defendant had plaintiff arrested, was incompetent, not being a part of the res gestæ, but merely an account of a past event.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Buchanan County; Wm. D. Rusk, Judge.

Action for false imprisonment by B. F. Carson against the St. Joseph Stockyards Company and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

John E. Dolman, of St. Joseph, for appellants. Charles C. Crow, of St. Joseph, for respondent.

ELLISON, J. This action is based upon a charge of false imprisonment. There was a judgment for plaintiff in the trial court. There was evidence tending to show that plaintiff was arrested by a policeman and detained for near six hours, charged by the policeman with stealing halters belonging to defendant company. Defendant Slack is the superintendent for defendant company; but there was no evidence that he instigated or caused the arrest, or that he ratified or adopted the act after it became known to him. The demurrer to the evidence, which was offered in his behalf, should have been sustained.

Plaintiff testified that, on the day following his arrest and release, Slack was talking with him about the halters, and stated to him that the defendant company had had him arrested, not that he had had anything to do with it. This was sufficient to support a verdict against the company if competent. Slack was the company's agent. What he said was next day after the arrest, and was therefore not a part of the res gestæ, and was therefore not competent on that ground. Neither was it competent on the ground of Slack being the company's agent, since, being spoken the next day, it was not a part of the res gestæ. It was an account of a past affair, and, being past, his agency, as to it, ceased so far as to disable him to bind his principal by admission, or by an account of the transaction. Adams v. Hannibal & St. Jos. R. R. Co., 74 Mo. 553, 556, 41 Am. Rep. 333; Bergeman v. Railway Co., 104 Mo. 77, 86, 15 S. W. 992; Redmon v. Railway Co., 185 Mo. 1, 12, 84 S. W. 26, 105 Am. STATE v. LASLEY.

(Kansas City Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 7, 1912.)

1. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 304*)—ABANDONMENT—NATURE OF OFFENSE.

A husband cannot be convicted of abandoning his wife and refusing to support her, where, although he has abandoned her, he has furnished means for her support.

2. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 304*)—ABANDONMENT—INTENT.

Where a husband, who had abandoned his wife, made arrangements for her support, in which she had first acquiesced, the fact that she later became dissatisfied with the arrangement was not evidence of criminal intent on the part of the husband, necessary to the offense of abandoning his wife and refusing to support her.

3. HUSBAND AND WIFE (§ 313*)—ABANDONMENT—EVIDENCE.

Where it was undisputed that a husband, prosecuted for abandoning his wife and refusing to support her, had made arrangements, in which the wife at first acquiesced, that she might live with her husband's brother and his wife, and purchase necessities on the husband's credit, and that with the husband's permission she received money from persons indebted to the husband, a verdict for defendant should have been directed, although the wife had become dissatisfied and left the brother's home.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nodaway County; William C. Ellison, Judge.

Clarence Lasley was convicted of abandoning his wife, and he appeals. Reversed, and defendant discharged.

Cook, Cummins & Dawson, of Maryville, for appellant. George Pat Wright and Marshall E. Ford, both of Maryville, for the State.

BROADDUS, P. J. The defendant was prosecuted and convicted of the offense of abandoning his wife. His punishment was assessed at one year's imprisonment in the county jail and a fine of $500. After taking the necessary steps to obtain a new trial, he has appealed to this court. The issue raised by the appeal is that the verdict is not supported by the evidence.

The defendant and prosecutrix were married on the 27th day of December, 1910, in Nodaway county, Mo. They went to house-keeping soon thereafter. Defendant's mother lived with them for a short time, after which William Lasley, defendant's uncle, made his home with them. About the 1st day of July, 1911, the wife made a visit to her people, near Brookfield, Mo. She went away with the understanding that she would be gone two weeks, but returned in about one week, arriving at night. She did not find defendant at home, and sent him word to come home. He did so, and seemed to be mad, and did not speak to her for a while, but that when he did speak he said he did not aim for her to come back at all; that he was going to Dakota. It seems that he only furnished his wife with sufficient funds to make the visit to Brookfield, and she had to borrow money on which to come home.

In a few days after his wife returned from her visit, defendant announced that he was going in search of work and accordingly left. This was on Tuesday. On the following Friday he returned and said he was going to work on the railroad. On Monday following his wife went to Maryville and found defendant there. She asked him "if he aimed for her to stay up there [their home] with Uncle William all the time;" that he answered that she could either stay there "or go to Grandma's and stay." From that time on until August the wife stayed part of the time at home with the uncle of defendant and partly with friends, during which period the defendant and uncle furnished the means for living. On the 11th day of August defendant removed his trunk and clothing from his home. At this time his wife was staying with Roland Lasley, defendant's brother. On the following day she went to Maryville and found defendant, who was employed there; but she testified that he would not speak to her. The next day she went to the home of her sister, Mrs. Baker. In two or three days she left and went to the home of Roland Lasley and remained there a while.

About the 1st of September she came back to her home. Roland Lasley and wife were there at the time. Defendant came during the night, but he did not see his wife until the next morning. At this time an arrangement was made between defendant and his brother Roland that the wife might go and live with the latter for a period of one year. As a consideration for the agreement, defendant turned over to his brother his furniture and paid, or was to pay, him in addition $60. The wife acquiesced in the arrangement and went to the home of Roland Lasley, and remained there until she gave birth to a child. She was not required to perform any service, and had a separate room for herself. The defendant further directed his wife to purchase necessities for the child, and have them charged to him. She made some such purchases, and defendant paid for them. With defendant's permission, she was paid small sums of money by persons who were indebted to him. The wife became dissatisfied with the treatment she received at the hands of Mrs. Roland Lasley and left them, and since has been living with friends and relatives. She says that Mrs. Lasley treated her so contemptuously that she could not stand it, and for that cause left.

The evidence was to the effect that defendant was a hard-working, poor man, and with little or no means after paying his debts. The information was filed the 7th day of February, 1912, and the conviction was had on March 7, 1912.

[1] Although the evidence showed that defendant did abandon his wife, yet it is very positive to the effect that he did not fail or refuse her support. During the year within which defendant had made arrangements with his brother to keep and support his wife, this prosecution was begun, and he was convicted of the charge of abandoning his wife and refusing to support her. Perhaps the provisions defendant made for the support of his wife were not as ample as they might have been, yet, when we consider his means for doing so, we are satisfied that he practically made reasonable provisions for that purpose.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes 151 S.W.—48

The criminal intent which the statute requires in order to constitute the offense is wholly lacking. State v. Doyle, 68 Mo. App. 219. It is said that: "In a prosecution for wife abandonment, there can be no conviction where the evidence for the prosecution shows that at the date of the information the wife, although abandoned by defendant, was living upon his means." State v. Fuchs, 17 Mo. App. 458. This case and the one under consideration are exactly alike in principle.

[2] This prosecution was instituted during the year within which defendant had made arrangements for the wife's support. That she became dissatisfied with the arrangement has no bearing whatever as evidence of a criminal intent upon the part of defendant.

[3] We think there was no question whatever, upon the undisputed evidence, that defendant was not guilty of the crime charged, and that the court should have directed the jury to return a verdict for the defendant, as asked.

Reversed. Defendant discharged. All concur.

Action by William S. Hodson against John J. McAnerney and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. Bowers, of St. Joseph, for appellant. Mytton & Parkinson, of St. Joseph, for respondents.

JOHNSON, J. This is a suit in equity to enforce the specific performance of a contract for the sale and exchange of real estate. The petition states a good cause of action, the answer pleads affirmative defenses which need not be stated in the view we take of the case, and the reply traverses all of the facts relating to the affirmative defenses save one, the truth of which is admitted.

On the theory that this admission precluded a recovery defendant filed a motion for judgment on the pleadings. The court sustained the motion and rendered judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appealed.

[1] The abstract of the record filed by appellant contains what purports to be a bill of exceptions, but in that part devoted to the record proper omits all reference to the record entries relating to the filing of the bill. It has been ruled time and again that a bill of exceptions cannot be allowed to prove itself by its own recitals, but must be authenticated by record entries which, in turn, must be shown in the abstract of the record proper. Hutton v. Clark, 145 Mo. App. 188, 129 S. W. 1050; Redd v. Railroad, 122 Mo. App. 93, 98 S. W. 89; Woodward v. Insurance Co., 156 Mo. App. 244, 137 S. W. 638; Thorp v. Railroad, 157 Mo. App. 495, 138 S. W. 100; Harding v. Bedoll, 202 Mo. 625, 100 S. W. 638.

[2] We cannot consider the bill of exceptions, and therefore cannot review the action of the circuit court in sustaining the motion for judgment on the pleadings. A motion of this character and ruling thereon can only be brought to the attention of an appellate court by an exception to the ruling duly preserved in a bill of exceptions. In Godfrey v. Godfrey, 228 Mo. loc. cit. 513, 128 S. W. 971, it is held: "Such motion is no part of the record, unless made so by the bill of exceptions." Mechanics' Bank v. Klein, 33 Mo. 559; Sternberg v. Levy, 159 Mo. loc. cit. 629, 60 S. W. 1117, 53 L. R. A. 438. In the latter case we said: "A motion for judgment on the pleadings is not a demurrer. It partakes of some of the qualities of a demurrer, but it is not a demurrer, and hence it is not a part of the record. It is a matter of exception, and can only be made a part of the record by a bill of exceptions. The question therefore raised by this motion is not before the court."

Finding no error in the record properly before us, the judgment is affirmed. All concur.

1. TRIAL (§ 191*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ASSUMING FACTS.

In an action for injuries from an automobile, where the only issue was as to ownership and control of the auto, and the evidence upon this issue was conflicting, an instruction declaring the rule of care with respect to the operation of automobiles in public streets, and directing that if "the defendant or his agent, in operating said automobile * * * at the intersection of said streets, on the day alleged in plaintiff's petition, operated the said car without observing the highest degree of care," and collided with plaintiff's horse and buggy, plaintiff could recover, was error, as assuming defendant's ownership or control of the automobile.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—USE OF STREETS—RECKLESS DRIVING—ACTIONS FOR INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries from an automobile, where the main issue was as to its ownership and control, and the evidence on that issue was conflicting, an instruction that if "defendant or his agent, in operating said automobile, * * * on the day alleged in plaintiff's petition, operated said car without observing the highest degree of care," and collided with plaintiff's horse and buggy, plaintiff could recover, was erroneous, as permitting the jury to affix liability against defendant if it found that his agent was operating the machine at the time, without requiring a finding that the agent was operating it for him, or in the course of his employment.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; George H. Shields, Judge.

Action by Noah Warrington against J. H. Bird. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Bates H. McFarland and Jeffries & Corum, all of St. Louis, for appellant. Crittenden Clark, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is a suit for damages accrued to plaintiff through the alleged negligence of defendant. Plaintiff recovered, and defendant prosecutes the appeal.

[1] It appears plaintiff was driving in a buggy north on Garrison avenue, in the city of St. Louis, when an automobile, at the crossing on Locust street, collided with his horse and inflicted serious injuries thereto. The buggy was slightly injured as well. The driver of the automobile did not hesitate, but went on with increased speed, supposedly for the purpose of concealing the identity of himself and the ownership of the machine. There is no controversy in the case with respect to the negligence of the driver of the automobile. The evidence all tends to prove that the machine was being operated at about 25 miles per hour, and no one contradicts it; whereas the speed ordinance prescribes a limit of 10 miles per hour. Neither is there a serious question in the case as it now appears touching the negligence of the plaintiff. In fact, the only issue pertained to the ownership or control of the automobile and the person operating it at the time of the injury. The evidence tends to prove that defendant owned the automobile on and before the 15th day of April. Indeed, so much is admitted. However, the collision occurred on July 24th of the same year, and defendant insists that he had sold the automobile therefore on April 15th, and no longer owned or controlled it, and that he had no knowledge of the collision whatever. The only evidence introduced by plaintiff tending to prove the ownership of the automobile of defendant at the time of the injury is that it bore a license plate on the rear, numbered 2839, and the public records in evidence revealed that the license of this number was issued to defendant on the 14th day of April, or, as defendant says, one day before he sold the machine. The statute provides such license may not be transferred to another. Other than the fact the number on the license plate was identical with that issued to defendant several months before, and the admitted fact that defendant owned the machine until April 15th, there is naught in the record to suggest that either he or his chauffeur was operating it at the time of the injury. From what has been said, it appears that the only issue in the case pertained to the ownership or control of the automobile and the identity of the person operating it.

For plaintiff the court gave the following instruction, over defendant's objection and exception: "It is the duty of persons owning and operating automobiles upon the public streets to use the highest degree of care possible to avoid injuring other persons found on such streets; and if you believe and find from the evidence in this case that the defendant or his agent, in operating said automobile in and upon the streets of Garrison and Locust, and at the intersection of said streets, on the day alleged in plaintiff's petition, operated the said car without observing the highest degree of care, and that while so operating said automobile the said automobile ran into and against plaintiff's horse and buggy and injured plaintiff's horse and buggy, and that the plaintiff at the time was exercising ordinary care, then you will find a verdict for the plaintiff." (Italics are ours.)

It is argued that this instruction is erroneous, in that, rather than submitting to the jury the question as to whether defendant or his agent was operating the automobile, it assumes such to be the fact and proceeds accordingly. The words italicized in the instruction above copied are those complained of. Under prior controlling decisions, the argument seems to be sound, and should control the disposition of the appeal. The instruction first declares the rule of high care which obtains under our statute with respect to the operation of automobiles, and then tells the jury that if it believed from the evidence that the defendant or his agent, in operating said automobile, operated the same without observing high care, etc., plaintiff was entitled to recover, provided he was exercising ordinary care on his part. The words in italics, as employed in the context of the instruction with respect to the subject-matter of high care, seem to assume that defendant or his agent was operating the automobile at the time, and suggest to the jury that such was the idea of the court. In view of the fact that the only issue in the case pertained to the ownership or control of the machine and the identity of the persons operating it, for upon this question the evidence was pro and con, this instruction is erroneous, in that it seems to remove that question from the province of the jury entirely. The court may, in its instructions to the jury, assume the truth of a proposition which is established by the undisputed testimony and appears not to be controverted; but it is manifestly improper to do so where there is a conflict in the evidence, and the issue is a vital one in the case, as here. See Fullerton v. Fordyce, 121 Mo. 1, 13, 25 S. W. 587, 42 Am. St. Rep. 516. See, also, Linn v. Massillon Bridge Co., 78 Mo. App. 111. As the liability of defendant depended entirely upon the fact that he, or his agent for him, was operating the automobile at the time, this question should have been submitted in plain terms, and not tacitly assumed, as the instruction reveals.

[2] This instruction is criticised, too, for the reason that it permits the jury to affix liability against defendant if it found that defendant's agent was operating the automobile at the time, without requiring a finding that the agent was operating it for him, or in the course of his employment. Obviously, the criticism is a just one; for, though the automobile was being operated by defendant's agent, his liability does not depend upon the mere fact of agency alone, but depends as well upon as to whether plaintiff's injury was received while defendant's agent was acting about the master's business, or within the scope of his employment. Especially is this true in view of the evidence and the particular issue in this case; for defendant denied the ownership of the automobile and the control of it through himself or his servant, and, indeed, denied any knowledge of the collision whatever.

For the reasons above stated, the judgment should be reversed and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

3. EXCEPTIONS, BILL OF (§ 6*)—CONTENTS—JUDICIAL NOTICE.

Matters of which the trial court took judicial notice are properly incorporated in a bill of exceptions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Exceptions, Bill of, Cent. Dig. §§ 8, 12; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

Original application for mandamus by the State, on the relation of O. F. Elrick and another, against Charles Claffin Allen, Judge of the St. Louis Circuit Court. Writ granted.

Earl M. Pirkey, of St. Louis, for relators.
H. A. Loevy, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. On application of relators an alternative writ of mandamus was issued against the Honorable Charles Claffin Allen, one of the judges of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, requiring him to sign a certain bill of exceptions in a cause in which one O. E. Armstrong was plaintiff and the relator Elrick and one Rankin were defendants, or to show cause on a day named why he should not do so. Accompanying the petition for the writ of mandamus is a copy of the proposed bill of exceptions which had been tendered to the honorable judge of the circuit court within due time and which he had been requested to sign but which, as was averred, he had declined to sign. In due course respondent filed his return to the alternative writ, admitting that he had refused to sign the bill of exceptions which had been tendered. Something like eleven reasons are given for this refusal. The first reason is that he, as judge, had refused to sign the bill of exceptions because it was untrue. Summarizing the reasons which follow this general denial of the truthfulness of the return, it appears that the honorable circuit judge refused to sign this bill of exceptions because, first, it omitted to set out matters that had occurred at the time of the trial of the cause in the circuit court, more accurately, at the time when default was taken against the defendants, and because it included matters of which the learned trial judge claimed that the court took judicial notice.

The action which is at the foundation of this controversy was instituted by Armstrong against Elrick and Rankin before a justice of the peace of the city of St. Louis. It appears that on the trial before the justice there was a judgment against the defendants there, from which judgment the defendant Elrick appealed to the circuit court, giving the usual appeal bond, with Kidwell, the other relator here, as surety. This cause, on appeal, was docketed for trial in the circuit court in due course and being called for trial and the appellant Elrick not appearing, as is recited in the judgment, judgment went against him and his surety, it being set out in the judgment that appellant Elrick, although duly called, failed to appear to prosecute his appeal, and that thereupon on motion of plaintiff the judgment of the justice was affirmed. It was thereupon adjudged that the plaintiff recover of the defendant Elrick and of Kidwell, the surety on his appeal bond, the amount sued for, with interest and costs and that execution issue therefor. In due time the relators here appeared in the circuit court and filed a motion to set aside the judgment and for a trial thereon, accompanying the motion with affidavits. The motion was resisted, Armstrong, the plaintiff in the cause filing counter-affidavits. All of these are set out in the bill of exceptions which was tendered. After the consideration of the motion to set aside the judgment and for trial it was overruled by the trial court. Whereupon Elrick and his surety against whom the judgment had been rendered in the circuit court prayed for an appeal to this court, paying the docket fee and filing an appeal bond, which was duly approved by the court and the appeal granted, the trial court at the same time granting an extension of time within which to tender a bill of exceptions. Within the time limited by the several extensions the relators tendered their bill of exceptions and asked that it be signed and filed in the cause. The honorable circuit judge declining to sign it, as before stated, the alternative writ was issued out of this court.

[1, 2] As before stated, the first reason assigned by the honorable circuit judge for refusing to sign the bill of exceptions is that it was untrue. This in itself is a sufficient reason, justifying a circuit judge in his refusal to sign a bill of exceptions tendered. If the return had ended with this statement it might have ended the matter. But the learned trial judge, with great frankness and propriety sets out wherein he deems it to be untrue, and sets out the matters omitted, and designates those which he claims are improperly embodied in the bill, and it was conceded at the argument of the cause that this denial of the truth of the bill was a general statement, more in the nature of a conclusion, and that the real reasons for the refusal of the honorable circuit judge to sign the bill of exceptions were, first, that it neglected to set out matters which had transpired in his court at the time of the rendition of the judgment by default against the relators, the honorable circuit judge contending that it was necessary to set these matters out in order to present a complete history of the case; second, that it set out matters of which the court took judicial notice. The question for our determination must therefore be, whether these reasons are good and sufficient in law.

Considering the first reason, we are unable to hold it valid. The sole matter presented for the determination of the trial court was the motion of relators to set aside the judgment which had been rendered against them, and it was from the action of the court on this motion that the appeal was taken, not from the judgment which had been rendered in the cause. What occurred at the time the judgment by default was rendered was therefore, for the consideration of this motion, immaterial, and it was unnecessary matter to incorporate in the bill of exceptions seeking to review the action of the trial court on the motion.

[3] The other group of objections to the signing of the bill of exceptions which the honorable circuit judge makes is, that the bill tendered incorporates matters of which it is claimed the trial court took judicial notice. However that might be and however far the trial court might take judicial notice of matters occurring before it, as the case which was to be presented to the appellate court, we are unable to see how this latter court can take judicial notice of matters which are not in any manner presented to it and which did not occur before it but which occurred before the trial court, unless set out in the bill of exceptions.

Our consideration of the whole case is that the reasons given by the honorable circuit judge for his refusal to sign the bill of exceptions tendered, and a copy of which is attached to the petition for the mandamus in this case, are insufficient in law.

The alternative writ heretofore issued is made final and it is ordered that the Honorable Charles Claflin Allen, as judge of the circuit court of the city of St. Louis, sign the bill of exceptions as prepared and tendered by counsel for relators and as set out in the petition herein, changing however, the date of his signing thereof from July, 1911, to the date at which he actually signs it.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 4817, providing that every person falsely or maliciously charging or accusing any female of adultery or whoredom by falsely speaking concerning her in the presence of others any false words imputing any such offense shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, the words must impute lack of chastity, and if it appears from the circumstances under which they were uttered that they were not intended or to be understood as imputing lack of chastity, but were intended and to be understood as terms of abuse or vituperation, the uttering of them does not constitute the offense, and hence, where the evidence tended strongly to show that they were used as terms of abuse, an instruction to this effect was improperly denied.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Mississippi County; Henry C. Riley, Judge.

Mary E. White was convicted of crime, and she appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Boone & Lee and H. C. O'Bryan, all of Charleston, Gresham & Moore, of Silkeston, and Luther Ely Smith, of St. Louis, for appellant. J. M. Haw, of Charleston, and Geo. H. Traylor, of New Madrid, for the State.

CAULFIELD, J. [1] The defendant appeals from a conviction and fine of $500 under section 4817 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri 1909, which provides that "every person who shall falsely and maliciously charge or accuse any female of * * * adultery or whoredom, by falsely speaking of and concerning such female, in the presence and hearing of any other person or persons, any false and slanderous words which shall impute to her any such offense, * * * shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor." The evidence tended to prove that the defendant and Mrs. Walker occupied adjoining farms, and on several occasions the latter's cattle had gotten into defendant's wheat field. On the last one defendant's father and hired man undertook to put the trespassing cattle into defendant's lot near her house. Mrs. Walker, with her little 10 year old girl, arrived on the scene about the time the men were driving the cattle into defendant's back lot. This back lot had three gates, one from the field, another into another lot, called the front lot, and another out into the public road. Mrs. Walker stood at the gateway leading into the road, and asked defendant's father to turn the cattle out, and let her take them home. This he refused to do, and proceeded to drive them on through the back lot into the front lot. About this time Mrs. Traylor, the other prosecuting witness, came along with her little girl, and, ascertaining the trouble, advised Mrs. Walker to go in and get her cattle. Both the women and Mrs. Walker's little girl then went into the defendant's back lot, and Mrs. Walker opened the gate leading into the defendant's front lot where the cattle were. Then Mrs. Walker and her little girl went into the front lot, and commenced to drive the cattle out, while Mrs. Traylor stood at the gate. Mrs. Walker's version, on direct examination, of what happened about this time, is as follows: "A. Mrs. White said: 'Don't open that gate.' I said: 'All right. Come on Sarah, we will let them alone.' Q. Sarah, who is that? A. My girl. So Sarah started, and Mrs. White came running to the door—came running out of the door, saying, 'Don't open that gate; don't you open that gate; I will shoot you. I will set my dogs on you, you dirty whoring—' Q. State the very words. A. 'You dirty, whoring bitches you. I will shoot you. I will set my dogs on you.' Hair flying, and she came running towards us. She stooped on her right side and pulled up her clothes something near her knee, and pulled a pistol from her clothes, and came running, and, when she put her hand to the gate, is when I saw it was a pistol; and I was waiting for my girl to come out and get in front of me before I started. She said, 'Get out of here.' I said, 'All right, Mrs. White.' My girl runs, crying, saying, 'Run, Mama—' Judge O'Bryan: Object to her telling about what the girl did. A. She said, 'Yes, sir; you get, run.' I said: 'Mrs. White, give me time. I am going.' And she said, 'Get,' and was hissing the dog, calling us bad names every few words she spoke, saying, 'You dirty whoring bitches.' She said she would shoot the hair off of our head. She would call us 'You dirty, whoring bitches.'" On cross-examination she said that defendant had called her and Mrs. Traylor "whoring bitches" as many as seven or eight times; that defendant talked so fast witness could not say how many times; that witness was badly frightened; that defendant said, pointing her finger, "I mean you, Mrs. Walker, and Mrs. Traylor, both of you," and also said that the Walkers, Foresters, and Traylor had been running over her; that defendant talked and fussed so much that witness could not tell all she said. Mrs. Traylor added that defendant also called them "dirty low down dogs," and said that the Foresters and Traylor "had run over her, and now the Traylor and Walkers were trying to run over her, but they couldn't do it."

We think the foregoing is fairly indicative of the circumstances and manner in which the alleged slander occurred according to the state's theory. Mrs. Walker was corroborated by Mrs. Traylor and the two little girls. The defendant and her hired man, Ben Chandler, the latter by deposition, testified in her behalf as to the particular incident in question. Their testimony tended to prove that the defendant did not have a pistol or urge the dog on the two women and children, and did not use the language attributed to her. According to Chandler: "Mrs. White said, 'Get out of the lot and let the cattle alone.' Mrs. Walker made the remark that she was going to take the cattle. Mrs. White told her she wouldn't get them and said, 'Get out of the lot and stay out.' Mrs. Walker said, 'All right, Mrs. White,' and she went out; and Mrs. White said, 'You had better be at home tending to your own business and cleaning up your filthy house, instead of being up here trying to attend to mine;' and they went off." The defendant's testimony is to much the same effect. There was also considerable uncontradicted testimony to the effect that four or five years before defendant had suffered such a serious mental derangement as to necessitate her removal to the state insane asylum. A physician testified that her mental derangement was of the periodical type; that is, was liable to recur from time to time.

The defendant was refused an instruction to the effect that "if the jury from the evidence and circumstances in evidence believe that the words spoken by the defendant were uttered by her in anger, as terms of abuse and reproach to the said Susie Walker and Sadie Traylor, and was not intended as the truth, and was understood by the hearers as being mere terms of abuse and uttered in anger, and not intended to charge them with whoredom, then the jury should find for the defendant." In our opinion such instruction should have been given.

[2] In cases of criminal slander the gist of the action is the intention of the defendant in uttering the words. State v. Boos, 66 Mo. App. 537. The words used must have imputed lack of chastity to the woman or women mentioned. State v. Collins, 117 Mo. App. 658, 93 S. W. 325. If it is apparent from the circumstances under which the words were uttered that they were not intended or to be understood as imputing such lack of chastity, but were intended and to be understood only as mere terms of abuse or vituperation, then the uttering of them does not constitute criminal slander. See Bridgman v. Armer, 57 Mo. App. 528. Though we are not quite prepared to say that the evidence on the part of the state showed conclusively that the words complained of were used as mere terms of abuse and not to impute lack of chastity, it had, to say the least, a strong tendency in that direction, and amply justified the giving of the instruction asked.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

Where a city charter provides that public work and material purchased therefor shall be let to the lowest and best bidder, there must as a general rule be an opportunity for active competition; but where a patented article, or one held in monopoly, is in the bona fide opinion of the public authorities of such exceptional superiority that it would be a public injury not to use it it may be required to be used.

2. PLEADING (§ 8*)—CONCLUSIONS.

In a proceeding to enjoin municipal officers from entering into a contract for paving on the ground of its illegality, the facts constituting such illegality must be pleaded; and an allegation that the patenting of a paving material was a subterfuge to prevent competitive bidding is more a general expression than an allegation of fact.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Guy D. Kirby, Judge.

Injunction by Sallie R. Custer and others against the City of Springfield, James H. Langston, city clerk, and Harry G. Horton, city engineer. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Wright Bros., of Springfield, for appellants. Leonard Walker, Fred Moon, and Frank B. Williams, amici curiæ, all of Springfield, for respondents.

GRAY, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the circuit court of Greene county sustaining a demurrer to the plaintiffs' petition. The suit is one in equity against the city of Springfield, James H. Langston, city clerk of said city, and Harry G. Horton, city engineer. The plaintiffs are the owners of real estate on Center street, in said city, and seek to enjoin the defendants from entering into any contract for the construction of a pavement on said street, and to have a certain ordinance authorizing the paving adjudged null and void. On the 17th day of October, 1911, the city council passed an order directing the city engineer to prepare and file specifications for the construction of "Hassam pavement, patented (class B), on Center street from Benton avenue to the National boulevard." Having adopted the preliminary statutory resolution and no remonstrance having been filed, the council on the 2d day of January, 1912, passed an ordinance for the improvement. Section 1 of that ordinance reads: "That there is hereby ordered constructed on Center street from the center line of Benton boulevard to the west curb line of the National boulevard Hassam pavement, patented (class B)." The petition alleges: "Plaintiffs state that by the terms of said ordinance Hassam pavement, patented (class B), is designated as the pavement required to be constructed on said Center street and plaintiffs say that the method of application of the material in the construction of said pavement is patented and the patentee or his assigns owns and controls the patent and the said method of construction. Plaintiffs aver and say that such patent is a subterfuge created for the purpose of endeavoring to prevent competitive bidding for the construction of street paving as required by the statutes of the state of Missouri and charter of said city, and thereby cause a fraud to be wrought upon the plaintiffs and the owners of property abutting on said street. Plaintiffs aver that the arbitrary selection of said Hassam pavement, patented (class B), by the city council, will prevent and stifle competitive bidding as required by the statutes of the state of Missouri and the charter of said city, and the plaintiffs say that in the said city of Springfield streets have been paved with material of as equally good quality as the Hassam pavement, patented (class B), and of the same general character and equal in all respects thereto and such material is now so used in constructing pavements in said city and are known as 'concrete paving,' 'asphaltic concrete paving,' and other kinds, and said concrete paving is composed of practically the same material as the said Hassam pavement, patented (class B), and composed of the same kind of material and of the same general character and value. Plaintiffs aver there is no good or sufficient reason for the city of Springfield by ordinance or otherwise to direct the construction of the pavement on said Center street with Hassam pavement, patented (class B), to the exclusion of other material of an equally good quality, and of the same general character and value and to the exclusion of said pavement known as 'concrete paving,' 'asphaltic concrete paving,' and other kinds, all of which are of an equally good quality as the said Hassam pavement, patented (class B), and of the same general character and value, and, when constructed, the pavement is of the same general character as said Hassam pavement, and makes an equally good pavement and is less expensive to construct. By so limiting the construction of the pavement on said Center street to the said Hassam pavement, patented (class B), the constructing of said pavement will be placed in the hands of the patentee or his agents in said city which will result in the plaintiffs and the other property owners being required to pay a larger price for such construction than they would be required to pay if the pavement required to be used were not limited to said Hassam pavement, patented (class B), and would enable the contractor to obtain an excessive and exorbitant price and compensation for the construction of said pavement. Plaintiffs say that said ordinance is null and void, because repugnant to the provision of the charter of said city and the statutes of the state of Missouri which require that contracts shall be awarded to the lowest and best bidder, and because it arbitrarily precludes the use of any material or pavement other than Hassam pavement, patented (class B), although other material and pavement exists as hereinbefore stated, and arbitrarily deprives the landowners of whom plaintiffs are a portion of the benefits of full and fair competition."

[1] It is well settled by the authorities of this state that as a general rule, where the charter of a city provides that public work and material purchased therefor shall be let to the lowest and best bidder, there must be an opportunity for active competition. Shoenberg v. Field, 95 Mo. App. 241, 68 S. W. 945; Curtice v. Schmidt, 202 Mo. 708, 101 S. W. 61, 10 Ann. Cas. 702; Swift v. City of St. Louis, 180 Mo. 80, 79 S. W. 172. There is an exception to this general rule based on the supposed necessity of the situation. This exception is that where there is a patented article, or one held in monopoly, which in the eye of the authorities is of such exceptional superiority that it would be a public injury to be deprived of it, it may be required to be used. Barber Asphalt Pav. Co. v. Hunt, 100 Mo. 22, 13 S. W. 98, 8 L. R. A. 110, 18 Am. St. Rep. 530; Verdin v. City of St. Louis, 181 Mo. 28, 33 S. W. 480, 36 S. W. 52; Swift v. City of St. Louis, supra; Paving Co. v. Field, 188 Mo. 182, 86 S. W. 860; Cleveland Trinidad Paving Co. v. McLord, 145 Mo. App. 141, 130 S. W. 371. From these cases the rule is firmly announced that the city council, acting in good faith, has the right to designate a patented article to be used for the improvement of its streets. It therefore necessarily follows that the ordinance in question is not void simply because it designates a certain patented article, and, if it is void, it must be because of certain other allegations in plaintiffs' petition relating thereto.

We will now examine these allegations. The first one is that the pavement is patented and the patentee or his assigns owns and controls the patent and the method of construction. This is true of every patented article, and the prime reason for securing a patent is to secure to the patentee a privilege and exclusive right.

[2] It is next alleged that said patent is a subterfuge created for the purpose of endeavoring to prevent competitive bidding. This can hardly be said to be an allegation of fact, but rather a general expression and insinuation. In Paving Co. v. Field, 188 Mo. loc. cit. 203, 86 S. W. 865, our Supreme Court says: "It is absolutely essential to a valid charge of this character to plead the acts which constitute the fraud." The only allegation regarding the bad faith of the patentee in securing a patent for his pavement is that it was secured for the purpose of preventing competition. We have just said this is the purpose of all patentees. This leaves for consideration the only other allegation, stating that at the time the ordinance was passed, and for some time prior thereto, there was in general use in the city, certain other material used in constructing pavements, known as "concrete paving," "asphaltic concrete paving," and other kinds of concrete paving, composed of practically the same kind of material as the Hassam pavement, and of the same general character and class, and making equally as good pavement, but less expensive to construct; that by so limiting the construction of the pavement to said patented article the plaintiffs and other property owners would be required to pay an exorbitant price and compensation for the improvement. It is not alleged that the council acted in bad faith in selecting the patented article, nor is there any direct charge that the council acted arbitrarily. It is a matter of common knowledge that there is much difference of opinion regarding the kind and character of material to be used in paving public streets, and much discretion must be left to the city council of the cities in selecting the material, and where they have acted in good faith, courts are generally slow, indeed, to interfere with their discretion. The veto power is given to the property owners, and they can defeat the improvement, no matter how much it may be needed, by filing the required remonstrance.

[3] Under the laws governing cities of the third class, the municipal authorities are required to publish a resolution as a preliminary to the public improvement. In City of Poplar Bluff v. Bacon, 144 Mo. App. 476, 129 S. W. 466, we said: "It has been decided several times in this state that the resolution should state directly or by reference the nature and character of the improvements; otherwise the proceedings are without jurisdiction. The resolution, declaratory of the necessity of the improvement provided by the statute to be published in the official paper, is for the information and benefit of owners whose property is to be taxed to pay for the proposed improvement. When this notice is published, property owners are supposed to be notified thereby of what the council propose to do." And in Webb City v. Aylor, 163 Mo. App. 155, 147 S. W. 214, Judge Cox says: "The property owner must look to the resolution and to the sources of information therein pointed out, in order to ascertain what the city council proposes to do. Since the publication of this resolution is the only provision of the statute for notifying the property owner of what the council proposes to do, it should either be explicit in itself, or inform the property owner where he can ascertain exactly what is proposed."

[4] As above stated, the law provides that the property owners may prevent the improvement by filing a certain remonstrance within a certain time after the publication of the resolution.

From these provisions it is apparent that the council in its resolution should notify the property owner exactly what is proposed to be done. If the council should specify several different kinds of paving in one resolution, how are the property owners to know exactly what the council proposes to do? Of course, where the article is not patented, the council can designate a standard, but the patented article furnishes its own standard. As we read the decisions of this state, they hold that the city councils, acting in good faith, have the right to designate a patented article for paving streets, and also the right to select any article not patented, providing it appears that there are no other materials of the same general character which can be brought into competition. In Taylor v. Schroeder, 130 Mo. App. 483, 110 S. W. 26, and in construing Swift v. St. Louis, 180 Mo. 80, 79 S. W. 172, the Kansas City Court of Appeals said: "Under the authority of the case last referred to, in order to justify the selection of any article not patented for paving streets, it must appear that there are no other material of the same general character which can be brought into competition."

[5] We do not wish to be understood as holding that city councils have the unlimited power to designate a patented article for public improvement. We are only passing upon the sufficiency of plaintiffs' petition relating thereto. If plaintiffs had alleged facts tending to show that the patent was a fraud and not superior to paving material in common use, and that the city council had acted arbitrarily, or in bad faith, in selecting it, then the petition would have stated a cause of action, but, as we read the petition, it simply alleges that the city council has selected a certain patented article, and that there are other kinds of pavements equally as good that can be constructed for less money. In other words, it simply asks the court to substitute its judgment for the judgment of the city council, acquiesced in by the property owner as to the character of the pavement to be constructed on Center street.

The judgment will be affirmed. All concur.

ALLEN v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—NEW TRIAL (§ 6*)—DISCRETION OF LOWER COURT.

Trial judges have a wide discretion in granting new trials to accomplish justice; and their order will not be reversed, unless an abuse of discretion plainly appears.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3860-3865; Dec. Dig. § 977.* New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 9, 10; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 977*)—REVIEW—ORDERS RESPECTING NEW TRIAL.

Appellate courts are less disposed to reverse orders granting new trials than orders refusing them.

3. NEW TRIAL (§ 103*)—NEWLY DISCOVERED EVIDENCE — DISCRETION OF COURT — EVIDENCE.

In an action for personal injury alleged to have been received by the sudden stopping of a train, a grant of defendant's motion for new trial on the ground of newly discovered evidence was proper, where the evidence of defendant tended to establish that there was no sudden stop, as contended by the plaintiff, and the new evidence was that of the sister of the plaintiff, and tended to show that the plaintiff took the trip on which she was injured with intention of getting hurt, and afterwards feigned injury, as such evidence was material; and because of the relation of the witness to the plaintiff it cannot be considered that there was lack of diligence in its procurement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 215-217; Dec. Dig. § 103.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Oregon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Action by Ollie Allen against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. From an order granting the defendant a new trial on a judgment for plaintiff, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. P. Dorris, of Alton, and Orchard & Cunningham, of Eminence, for appellant. W. F. Evans and W. J. Orr, both of St. Louis, Green & Wayland, of West Plains, and George Milley, of Thayer, for respondent.

NIXON, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for personal injuries, which the appellant claims to have suffered by reason of the negligence of the agents and servants of the defendant railroad company while she was about to leave defendant's passenger train at the town of Koshkonong, Mo.

The portion of the petition charging negligence is as follows: "That on said 3d day of December, 1911, this plaintiff purchased a ticket from the station agent at Thayer, Missouri, good for one passage from Thayer, Missouri, to Koshkonong, Missouri; that on said date she boarded defendant's passenger train at the city of Thayer to ride to the town of Koshkonong; that the porter of said train, who was employed by said defendant company, came into the car in which plaintiff was seated and riding therein as such passenger, as aforesaid, and called out the station of Koshkonong and picked up the step which is set down in front of the steps of the car and started out with it; that soon thereafter the said train stopped, and quite a number of passengers who were riding thereon started towards the door to alight from said train, and went as far as the platform; that this plaintiff, believing said train had stopped for the station, and plaintiff, acting on the information given by said porter, as aforesaid, and believing said train had stopped at the platform at the station of Koshkonong, went out on the platform of the passenger coach in which she was riding, as aforesaid, for the purpose of alighting therefrom; that several parties were in front of her on the platform, and she was unable to alight at that time; that while she was standing on said platform, waiting for an opportunity to alight from said train, said train started to move, either backward or forward (and plaintiff is not sure which), with a sudden and violent jerk, without any warning whatever from any source to this plaintiff that said train was about to move, the force of which caused this plaintiff to be thrown violently backward into the door of the passenger coach, her head striking the door a violent blow, and her body being thrown violently to and upon the floor of the passenger coach, whereby and by reason thereof she received serious injuries in her head, back, spine, side, and breast; that the injuries suffered by this plaintiff, received in the manner aforesaid, were caused solely by the gross neglect of the defendant company in calling out the station by its said porter in the manner and at the time aforesaid, and in failing to warn plaintiff of the danger in attempting to alight at the time and place aforesaid, and in starting said train backward or forward, as the case may be, with a violent and sudden jerk, without warning to this plaintiff."

Immediately after the accident (on December 3, 1911, at about 2 or 3 o'clock a. m.) plaintiff was removed to her home at her father's house in Koshkonong, where her sister, Mrs. J. E. Dewberry, also resided.

At the trial plaintiff stated as a witness that as a result of the fall she received injuries to her head, and back in her spine, and that there was a contusion or bruised place on her head; that about 8 o'clock a. m. after the accident she called a physician (Dr. Barnes) to wait on her on account of the injuries she had received. She testified he did not examine her very much. On cross-examination, this question was asked, "You did not call his attention to this bruised place?" The answer was: "I said I don't know whether I did or not. I was sick." About a month later she called another physician on account of her injuries, named J. K. Cantrell, and she testified that she showed the bruised place to him, and that at that time it had not healed. She testified that she could not state that it left a scar, as it was in her hair. Dr. Barnes was not called as a witness in behalf of the plaintiff. Dr. Cantrell testified for the plaintiff that he made a physical examination of her person about the 5th day of January, some 30 days after the accident, and for that purpose removed her clothing; that in this examination he found no abrasion or bruise about her head; that he found only a little bruise on the left side of her back; that she complained of a pain or pressure of the spine in the muscles of her back when he pressed her lumbar muscles; that she also complained about her head; that when under pressure it produced pain.

Plaintiff also introduced three witnesses who were on the train or at the depot at the time the accident is alleged to have occurred. None of these corroborated her version of the accident as to the train having stopped and then started again with a jerk. Anse Owens testified that he was on the train the night she fell; that at the time she was back of him, and he did not see the fall, but heard it, and that she was at that time about halfway out; that she "just kinda slipped down again when he saw her, and it seemed like she fainted." He did not see her lying on the floor. He stated that when they arrived at Koshkonong he did not notice any jerking of the train; that the train may have given a jerk and the witness not have noticed it. Charles Thoman testified for the plaintiff that he was at the depot at the time the accident is said to have happened. He stated that the chair car of that train usually stopped at the end of the station, but that on this night they ran down to the other end of the depot and stopped very suddenly, but that after the train stopped it did not start up until it pulled out. He testified, in part, as follows: "At the time I saw the woman, she was lying down in the car, with her limbs out on the platform and her body back in the car. I could not see her face; but I did see her after they took her off the train, at which time she acted as though she was hurt. She did not seem to be conscious, but kind of dazed, and complained about her head. I first thought she was under the influence of liquor until she complained about her head." Adam Bledsoe testified for the plaintiff that he was up at the baggage car at work, and when he got down they were helping the plaintiff out of the waiting room, at which time she was complaining about her head; that he helped take her home, and that when he left her she was complaining about her head; that he did not know whether the train stopped more than once or not.

The plaintiff also introduced evidence tending to show that she was kept in her bed some four or five weeks, and had been under treatment and unable to do any work by reason of the injuries she had received. Several witnesses testified in her behalf that during this time she was complaining of injuries in her neck and back; but these persons saw no injuries, and knew nothing as to her having been injured except what she stated.

The defendant introduced several witnesses, who testified that they were on the train at the time the injury took place, and that the train made the usual stop in the usual manner, and that there was no sudden jerking, either in stopping or starting the train. R. J. Capshaw and Sherman Tolliver were the only ones who saw the plaintiff on the train at the time she fell, and they testified that they saw her fall, and that there was another passenger behind her named Hosea Pate, and that plaintiff, at the time the train came to a stop, staggered against Hosea Pate, and her head struck against the man, and she went to the floor, and that there was no jerking of the train.

The defendant also put in evidence the plaintiff's general reputation for virtue, and no effort was made by the plaintiff to contradict the evidence of these witnesses that her reputation for virtue was bad.

The verdict of the jury was for the plaintiff in the sum of $500.

The defendant moved for a new trial and, among other grounds, set up the newly discovered testimony of Mrs. J. E. Dewberry, the plaintiff's sister. Her affidavit was produced and filed with the motion for a new trial, in which affiant stated that about a year prior to the time plaintiff claims to have been injured a Mrs. Arnold, who resided near the place where the plaintiff resided at that time, got hurt on one of the trains of the defendant and was paid damages by the defendant company; that the plaintiff, upon learning that Mrs. Arnold had received some money from the railroad company, said that she (the plaintiff) was going to get hurt on the train and sue the defendant for big damages; that on Friday prior to December 3, 1911, the plaintiff went to Thayer to visit Mrs. Lina Allen, and before plaintiff left Koshkonong she told her sister (the said Mrs. Dewberry) to write to her (the plaintiff) the next day, telling her to come home at once, and to use as a reason that the son of the plaintiff, named Willie, was sick and was worse, when, as a matter of fact, said boy Willie was not and had not been sick at that time, and that before plaintiff left the town of Koshkonong to go to Thayer at that time she gave to said witness (Mrs. Dewberry) a stamped postal card on which to write said message; that said Mrs. Dewberry did write said postal card the next day, saying, in substance, what the plaintiff had directed her to say, and said witness requested said son of plaintiff to mail said card to his mother, but said boy refused to do so, and that the father of plaintiff did mail said postal card; that plaintiff told said witness to have said card mailed as aforesaid; that plaintiff was brought home on the morning of December 3, 1911, at 2 or 3 o'clock, by Isaac Ammerman, who is married to a cousin of plaintiff, and Ollie Bledsoe, who is a second cousin of plaintiff; that after they had left plaintiff at the house plaintiff sat by the stove a while talking to said witness, and that plaintiff told said witness about what a good time she had at Thayer on that trip, and that after talking for a considerable time plaintiff took off her clothes and went to bed without any assistance, and did not complain of any injury; that said witness at that time remarked to plaintiff, "You are not hurt," and that plaintiff laughingly replied, "You cannot always tell;" that the next morning plaintiff said to witness, "I guess I had better stay in bed and send for Dr. Barnes;" that after Dr. Barnes had come and gone plaintiff did not return to bed again; and that plaintiff said to witness at that time that she wanted witness to wait on her, and she would fix her up all right for it, saying, "If there is a chance to get a stake, let me go to it." The said witness will testify (so the affidavit reads) that plaintiff was not hurt by the alleged accident, but was only pretending to be hurt, for the purpose of getting money or damages from the railroad company; that plaintiff stayed at home for two weeks after the alleged accident, during which time she stayed up around the house as well as she ever did, excepting when visitors would come to the house, and then she would get in bed and complain of pain, but would get out of bed again as soon as such visitors were gone.

It is apparent from reading her affidavit that the testimony of Mrs. Dewberry is material evidence for the defense. The only serious objection urged is that no diligence is shown by the defendant in obtaining the evidence of this witness. In its affidavit accompanying the motion for a new trial, defendant stated that no knowledge of the facts referred to in the affidavit of Mrs. Dewberry came to the knowledge of the defendant or any of its agents or attorneys or officers until since the trial of the case, and that it was not due to any lack of diligence on the part of the defendant that it was not learned sooner. When it is considered that this newly discovered evidence came from the plaintiff's own sister, a reason is apparent why the defendant should not have sooner discovered it; and it may be said that the defendant would not be expected to invade the plaintiff's own home and to interview the members of her own household to procure evidence against her.

[1, 2] The rule has been announced in Missouri with wearisome repetition that trial judges have a wide discretion in granting new trials, in order to accomplish justice; that the duty of granting a new trial rests peculiarly and specially within the sound discretion of the trial judge; and that when a new trial has been granted the appellate court will reluctantly interfere, unless it is manifest and apparent that the judicial discretion of the trial judge has been abused, or that injustice has been done. Parker v. Britton, 133 Mo. App. loc. cit. 274, 113 S. W. 259; Lee v. Knapp & Co., 137 Mo. 385, 38 S. W. 1107; Kuenzel v. Stevens, 155 Mo. 280, 56 S. W. 1076; Iron Mountain Bank v. Armstrong, 92 Mo. 265, 4 S. W. 720; Ensor v. Smith, 57 Mo. App. 584. Where a new trial is granted by the court below, an appellate court will look at it with less scrutiny than if it had been refused. Bloch Queensware Co. v. Smith, Saxton & Co., 107 Mo. App. 13, 90 S. W. 592; Udden v. O'Reilly, 180 Mo. 650, 79 S. W. 691.

[3] After an examination of the whole record in this case, we are unable to say that the learned trial judge who saw the witnesses, and who knew all the circumstances leading up to and surrounding the trial, abused his discretion in granting a new trial.

The order granting a new trial is accordingly affirmed. All concur.

GRIGGS v. BRIDGWATER.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1011*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS—TRIAL WITHOUT JURY.

A judgment for a defendant in unlawful detainer given by a court without a jury upon conflicting evidence as to whether the rights of the defendant under a lease extended to the whole or only a part of a tract is conclusive as to such question on appeal, unless, under the law and the facts, the defendant could not acquire such an interest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983-3989; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

2. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 75*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—TERM.

A lease which was executed September 23, 1909, provided that all land cleared by the lessee in the year 1908 and 1909 should be delivered to the lessor in 1912, free of sprouts, and all land cleared in 1910 and 1911 should be delivered on January 1, 1913, free of sprouts. Rev. St. 1909, § 7880, provides that no tenant for a term not exceeding two years or at will or by sufferance shall assign or transfer his term or interest or any part thereof without the written assent of the landlord. Held that, as the lease extends for a period of more than two years, the statute is inapplicable, and an assignment was valid.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 79*)—ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE—EFFECT OF DEATH OF ASSIGNOR—LESSEE.

The rights of an assignee of an interest in a lease would not be affected by the subsequent death of the assignor-lessee, even though the personal representative of such assignor refused to take charge of the lease, and for that reason it became the duty and the right of the lessor to take it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 235, 244-253; Dec. Dig. § 79.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 291*)—UNLAWFUL DETAINER—PETITION—CONFORMITY TO NOTICE TO QUIT.

The fact that the notice and demand for possession in unlawful detainer embraced more land than the amended petition on which the cause was tried would not justify a finding in favor of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1217-1241, 1243-1269; Dec. Dig. § 291.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS OF COURT WITHOUT JURY.

The finding of a court sitting without a jury must be upheld on appeal if justified on any ground, where there was no finding of facts and no declarations of law given or refused, and the record does not otherwise indicate the ground on which the court based its finding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403, 3404, 3408-3424, 3427-3430; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shannon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Unlawful detainer by Edson Griggs against Charles Bridgwater, commenced before a justice. From a judgment of the circuit court for defendant on an appeal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Orchard & Cunningham, of Eminence, for appellant. L. B. Shuck, of Eminence, for respondent.

COX, J. Action of unlawful detainer begun before a justice of the peace, appealed to the circuit court, and there tried by the court and issues found for defendant. Plaintiff has appealed.

[1] Plaintiff leased 14 acres of land to one Marie Hardcastle. By the terms of the lease Hardcastle was required to clear and cultivate the land. Afterward Hardcastle, with the consent of plaintiff, made an agreement with this defendant by which defendant acquired some interest in the lease of the land, and on the extent of that interest this controversy hangs. Plaintiff contends that defendant only acquired the right to occupy and cultivate a part of the tract covered by the lease, while defendant contends that his rights extend to the whole tract. The testimony was conflicting as to that question, and, the court sitting as a jury having found in defendant's favor, the judgment of the trial court is final, unless, under the law and the facts, defendant could not acquire an interest in the whole tract. Nickey v. Leader, 235 Mo. 30, 138 S. W. 18 loc. cit. 41.

[2] The first point made by appellant is that Hardcastle could not assign the lease or any part of it without the written assent of plaintiff under section 7880, Stat. 1909. That statute by its terms only applies to leases not exceeding two years or tenancies at will or by sufferance. This lease was executed September 23, 1909, and contained the following provision: "All land cleared by Hardcastle in the year 1908 and 1909 is to be delivered to Griggs in the year 1912 free of sprouts and all land cleared by Hardcastle in 1910 and 1911 is to be delivered to Griggs January 1, 1913, free of sprouts." It will thus be seen that the lease extended from September 23, 1909, to January 1, 1913, a period of more than two years; hence the statute does not apply.

[3] Hardcastle, the lessee, died in September or October, 1910, and appellant contends that the lease then went to his personal representative, but the administrator of Hardcastle refused to take charge of it, and, for that reason, it became the duty and the right of plaintiff to take it. However this may be, no one could interfere with the rights of defendant, and, since his rights were acquired before the death of Hardcastle, he is not affected thereby.

[4, 5] The suggestion is made in brief of counsel for appellant that the trial court based his finding upon the ground that the notice and demand for possession served by plaintiff on defendant covered more land than the amended petition on which the case was tried, and, that being true, the finding was wrong. There was no finding of facts and no declarations of law given or refused, and there is nothing in the record before us to indicate the ground upon which the court found for defendant; hence, if the finding is justified upon any ground, we must uphold it.

As we view this record, the only question for the trial court to pass upon was a question of fact, and, there being evidence on both sides of that issue, his finding is binding upon us, and the judgment must therefore be affirmed. All concur.

ROENNIGKE v. ESSIG.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 8, 1912.)

1. MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 313*)—INDEMNITY BOND—SURETY'S LIABILITY ON BOND.

Where a builder's contract appeared on one side of a printed sheet, and the bond for performance on the other, each instrument aptly referring to the other, and contemplating that the contract by its terms should be parcel of the bond, but the principal, who signed the contract, did not sign the bond, the surety, signing the bond, was bound thereby, since the principal was bound in the first instance by the contract, and the bond showed that it was a complete instrument when executed by the surety alone.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 656; Dec. Dig. § 313.*]

2. PRINCIPAL AND SURETY (§ 112*)—BUILDER'S BONDS—DISCHARGE OF SURETY.

Where a building contract stipulates that the owner shall withhold from the contractor a percentage of the price as a security against possible liens, and, until such lien claims are settled, the surety is discharged if the owner surrenders this security without his consent, but where a contract containing such stipulation was, in all its terms, made part of the contractor's bond, and the owner made the final payment 10 days after completion as he was also required to do by the contract, the surety was not thereby discharged, since, in effect, he had consented to such payment.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; George H. Williams, Judge.

Action by Edward Roennigke against Louis Essig and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant Essig appeals. Affirmed.

Eugene Buder, of St. Louis, for appellant. Carl Otto, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is a suit on a builder's bond. The finding and judgment were for plaintiff, and defendant surety on the bond alone prosecutes the appeal.

Henry A. Christophel and W. H. Pearson contracted in writing with plaintiff to furnish the materials and erect a building for him at the agreed price of $6,200. Among other things, the contract stipulated the building was to be completed and delivered to plaintiff free of all liens, etc. In connection with this contract and in assurance of its fulfillment, defendant Essig, as surety, executed the bond in suit in the amount of $6,200, whereby he bound himself to answer for the default of Christophel and Pearson in respect of any matter stipulated for in the contract. After settling with the contractors on the certificate of the architect, plaintiff was required to expend $516.87 in liquidation of lien claims against the building and prosecutes this suit upon the bond to recover therefor.

[1] It is first argued the court should have directed a verdict for defendant Essig, the surety, for the reason that the names of Christophel and Pearson, principals, were not affixed to the bond. It appears the building contract and the bond in suit were executed by the use of printed forms both on the same sheet of paper. In other words, the builder's contract is printed on one side of a sheet of paper and the bond for the faithful fulfillment of the contract on the reverse side thereof. Each of these documents in apt terms refers to the other. Christophel and Pearson, the contractors, together with the plaintiff, signed and executed the contract. The bond on the reverse side of the sheet, however, is not signed by Christophel and Pearson, but they are referred to in the body thereof as the contractors and as the principals who signed the above contract the provisions of which the bond undertakes to assure. However, it is obvious from the form of the bond that it was not contemplated that the contractors, Christophel and Pearson, should do more than sign the contract which by the terms of the two writings became parcel of the bond. In other words, it appears from the papers themselves that it was not contemplated the principals should affix their signatures to the bond, provided they signed, as they did, the builder's contract on the reverse side of the sheet. Some of the authorities declare that, where the principal omitted to sign a common-law bond when it clearly appeared that the parties contemplated that he should so sign it, the sureties are not bound, though they had affixed their signatures thereto. The theory with respect to such cases is that, as the contract of suretyship is secondary in its nature, there is no obligation entailed against the surety, unless the principal is bound in the first instance. But the rule is without force here, for it is obvious that the principals, Christophel and Pearson, were bound to the faithful execution of the contract, and the contract is parcel of the bond. This contract stipulates the full and identical obligation which the surety undertook to assure. From this it appears the principals, Christophel and Pearson, were bound in the first instance, and therefore Essig, the surety, was bound by signing the bond to the secondary obligation. The bond, printed on the same sheet with the contract, reveals that it was a completed instrument when executed by the surety alone.

The precise point has been heretofore determined in a case involving a like contract, as will appear by reference to North St. Louis Planing Mill v. Essex, 157 Mo. App. 18, 137 S. W. 295. There can be no doubt that on the face of the bond the surety's obligation was valid and complete.

[2] The builder's contract provides, among other things, that the plaintiff should pay during the course of construction to the builders not to exceed 75 per cent. of the contract price and retain a balance of 25 per cent. thereof as security against possible liens, etc., and that the final payment of this 25 per cent. should be made 10 days after the building was completed and on its acceptance by plaintiff. All payments were to be made on the certificate of J. L. Wees, architect and superintendent of the building. It appears that plaintiff made payments on the contract in accordance with this agreement on the certificate of the architect and retained 25 per cent. of the contract price until 10 days after the building was completed, when, upon its acceptance, the remaining 25 per cent. of the contract price was paid to the contractors on the certificate of the architect. It is argued the court should have directed a verdict for defendant surety on the grounds that plaintiff released the security in his hands by paying out the remaining 25 per cent. of the contract price without regard to the probable liens that might be run upon the building. There can be no doubt that, when the contract stipulates the owner shall withhold from the contractor a percentage of the contract price as a security against probable liens and until such lien claims are settled without more, the surety is discharged if the owner surrenders this security without the consent of the surety on the bond. Such is the doctrine of Evans v. Graden, 125 Mo. 72, 28 S. W. 439; Harris v. Taylor, 150 Mo. App. 291, 129 S. W. 995. But the rule invoked is wholly without influence here, for it appears conclusively that the surety consented to the payments being made by plaintiff, for the contract stipulates the course to be pursued. It cannot be said that the surety, Essig, did not consent to the payment of the final 25 per cent. of the contract price 10 days after the completion of the building upon the certificate of the architect, Wees, for the contract in plain and pointed terms stipulates that the final payment should be made upon such certificate, and that such payment was authorized when such certificate was given. Obviously the surety consented to this, for the contract, in all its terms, is parcel of the obligation between the parties, and it was the course prescribed for plaintiff to pay the balance of the contract price in accordance with the contract on the certificate of the architect as he did. Though by so doing plaintiff released a security in his hands, it is entirely clear that this security was released with the consent of the surety and in full accord with the terms of the contract and bond, for he was authorized to pay out this fund upon the certificate of the architect.

The judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—INJURIES IN STREETS — INSTRUCTIONS — NEGLIGENCE.

In an action for injuries by being struck by defendant's taxicab in a street, in which plaintiff alleged specific acts of negligence, such as excessive speed and approaching without warning, it was error to instruct that the jury should find for plaintiff if the taxicab driver was running at greater than a reasonable speed, or "was not using the highest degree of care that a very careful or prudent person would use under like circumstances, * * * and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was struck;" it being necessary for the instructions to submit the specific acts of negligence charged, and not the question of negligence in general.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; George H. Williams, Judge.

Action by Edward McDonnell against the Columbia Taxicab Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is a suit for damages accrued to plaintiff on account of personal injuries received through the alleged negligence of defendant. Plaintiff recovered, and defendant prosecutes this appeal. The place of the injury was at the crossing over Broadway on the north side of Chouteau avenue, in the city of St. Louis; the time about 8:25 o'clock p. m., after dark. Plaintiff's evidence tended to prove that the place was one where street car passengers transferred from one car line to another; that there was a great deal of traffic there; that it was customary for the Broadway cars to stop at that particular crossing to let passengers off; that there was an electric street lamp near; that while plaintiff was attempting to pass from the front end of a south-bound Broadway street car, which had stopped to let him off, to the west curb of Broadway, he was run down and injured by defendant's automobile, which was then being driven by defendant's employé acting within the scope of his employment. Plaintiff testified that after alighting, and before starting toward the curb, he took the precaution to glance to the north (whence the automobile came), and saw no vehicle coming, though there was nothing to obstruct his view. The first plaintiff knew of the automobile was when it struck him; there having been no warning sound of its approach, though it seems to have had its lights burning. It was coming south in the same direction with the car, and attempted to pass along between the car and the curb, a space some 18 feet in width, and was running along within 2 feet of the side of the car, when it struck plaintiff. As to the speed of the taxicab, the motorman on the street car testified that it was running at a "pretty good speed"; and another witness for plaintiff estimated its speed at 15 miles an hour. The testimony of other witnesses tended to prove that plaintiff was paying no attention to vehicles, but looked straight ahead of him as he went toward the west curb. The driver of the automobile testified that before he neared the crossing he was going about 12 miles an hour, and that when he got to the car he was only traveling between 3 and 4 miles an hour; that it was customary for south-bound cars to stop on the south side, and not on the north side, of cross streets, and that he had no idea, and there was nothing to indicate to him, that anybody was going to get off of that car at that place at that time; that, seeing plaintiff step off the front platform of the street car, he tried to stop the automobile by shutting off the power and putting on the brakes, but that it was then too late to avoid injuring plaintiff.

The portions of plaintiff's petition relied upon as charging defendant with negligence are, in substance, as follows: It first states that "one of the defendant's said vehicles, going at a great rate of speed, to wit, at a speed of 15 miles per hour, * * * was negligently and carelessly, and without warning, run against and over the plaintiff, knocking him down." It then states "that the said Broadway and Chouteau avenue are, and have been for many years last and past, public streets and thoroughfares in the city of St. Louis; that the said Broadway runs in a southerly direction, and that the said Chouteau avenue runs east and west, and crosses said Broadway at right angles, and at the intersection of said Broadway and Chouteau avenue is a public business place, where numerous people pass and repass, especially during the evening hours at about the hour when the plaintiff was injured." The petition then pleads that there were then in full force and effect in the state of Missouri certain statutory provisions, sections 8519 and 8523 of the Revised Statutes of Missouri, 1909:

Section 8519 provided, in pertinent part, that: "No person shall operate a motor vehicle on any public highway at a greater rate of speed than is reasonable, having regard to the traffic and use of the highway, or so as to endanger the life and limb of any person, or the safety of any property, and shall not in any event, while upon any public highway, run at a greater rate of speed than fifteen miles an hour; * * * and within the limits of all cities, towns and villages the rate of speed shall not be greater than eight miles per hour in the business portion of any city, town or village, and not greater than ten miles per hour in all other portions thereof."

Section 8523 provided that: "All persons owning, operating or controlling an automobile running on, upon, along or across public roads, streets, avenues, alleys, highways or places much used for travel, shall use the highest degree of care that a very careful person would use under like or similar circumstances to prevent injury or death to persons on, or traveling over, upon or across such public roads, streets, avenues, alleys, highways or places much used for travel. Any owner, operator or person in control of an automobile, failing to use such degree of care, shall be liable in damages to a person or property injured by the failure of the owner, operator or person in control of an automobile to use such degree of care, * * * unless the injury or death is caused by the direct negligence of the injured or deceased person contributing directly thereto."

The petition then proceeds as follows: "Plaintiff further states that said striking, running over, and injuring him by said automobile or taxicab of the defendant was directly due to and caused by the negligence on the part of the employé of the defendant operating and running said vehicle, and was a direct violation of said act, while running said vehicle upon, along, and across said public streets in the city of St. Louis, Mo., which public streets were at said time, and for years had been, highways and places much used for travel; and the defendant, through its said employé, failed to use the highest degree of care that a very careful person would use under like circumstances to prevent injuring all persons on or traveling over, upon, or across said public streets in the following particulars, to wit: (1) That the defendant, through its said employé, did negligently operate said automobile or taxicab along said Broadway, going south, and at the time it struck the plaintiff, in a reckless manner and at a dangerous rate of speed. (2) That defendant, through its said employé, did negligently operate said motor vehicle on said Broadway, going south, at and before the time it struck the plaintiff, in a reckless manner and at a rate of speed exceeding 15 miles an hour, and when approaching this said crossing on Broadway north of Chouteau avenue failed to check the speed of the taxicab or give warning of its approach whatsoever, and by reason thereof plaintiff was run over by the defendant's said taxicab, receiving the injuries herein complained of."

The answer, in addition to a general denial, contains a plea of contributory negligence. The reply was a general denial. The only reference to the question whether the collision occurred in the "business portion" of the city occurs in the cross-examination of plaintiff, as follows: "Mr. Morrow (Defendant's Counsel): Q. Mr. McDonnell, that point there isn't what is known as a business point, I understand—business part of the city—not like downtown here; that is just simply a point where the people transfer there? A. Well, go ahead. Mr. Young (Plaintiff's Counsel): Answer the question. A. Well, yes; yes."

At the instance of the plaintiff the court gave an instruction to the jury, as follows: "(1) The court instructs the jury that if they believe and find from the evidence that on the 5th day of March, 1910, at about the time charged in the petition, the plaintiff, while passing from a street car at the north crossing of Broadway and Chouteau avenue, in the city of St. Louis, was run against and over by one of the defendant's taxicabs, driven by one of its employes, going at the time at a greater rate of speed than eight miles per hour, or that the driver of said taxicab was running the same at a greater rate of speed than was reasonable, having regard to the traffic and use of said streets at said point, or that said driver of said taxicab at said time was not using the highest degree of care that a very careful person would use under like or similar circumstances in running said taxicab, and that by reason thereof the plaintiff was struck and injured by said taxicab, then the jury will find for the plaintiff."

There were other instructions; but, as they do not have any tendency to cure the alleged errors in the foregoing one of which defendant complains, we will not incur this opinion by setting them forth.

Morrow & Kelley, of St. Louis (Charles E. Morrow, of St. Louis, of counsel), for appellant. Johnson & Young, of St. Louis, for respondent.

CAULFIELD, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The defendant contends that the giving of plaintiff's instruction No. 1 was reversible error, and we are constrained to hold such contention good. Though in his petition plaintiff relies on specific acts of negligence to entitle him to recover, this instruction omits to hypothesize the facts with respect to the alleged negligence of the driver of the taxicab, and leaves the jury to find for the plaintiff if they find "that said driver of said taxicab at said time was not using the highest degree of care that a very careful person would use under like or similar circumstances in running said taxicab." It is true that in the prior part of the instruction the question of the speed of the automobile is specifically submitted to the jury; but the portion we are considering is stated in the alternative, to the end that, even though the jury might have found the driver guiltless in the matter of unlawful or negligent speed, it might still find for plaintiff if the driver failed in any manner whatever to use the highest degree of care in running the taxicab. As the Supreme Court said in condemning a similar instruction, this one was "equivalent to authorizing the jury to return a verdict for the plaintiff under any theory of negligence which they could construct or evolve out of their own minds." Allen v. St. Louis Transit Co., 183 Mo. 411, 432, 81 S. W. 1142.

[2] In this respect the giving of this instruction constituted reversible error. Where, as here, specific acts of negligence are relied upon, the instructions should require the jury to find whether the defendant was guilty in the respect charged, and not submit the question in such general terms. See Miller v. United Railways Co., 155 Mo. App. 528, 134 S. W. 1045. Another objection made to this instruction is that it, in effect, declares the defendant guilty of negligence, as matter of law, if the automobile was going at "a greater rate of speed than eight miles an hour," without requiring a finding that the place was in the "business portion" of the city, as the statute invoked contemplates (R. S. Mo. 1909, § 8519), or that that rate of speed was negligent under the circumstances. As the judgment must be reversed and a new trial had for the reason first above mentioned, we need not pass upon this second objection, which is one that can easily be avoided upon a retrial. For the same reason we do not now notice other matters of alleged error.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

John B. Dempsey, of St. Louis, for appellant. Edward W. Foristel, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. The respondent here instituted an action for divorce against his wife, the appellant, on the 19th of May, 1910. It is alleged in the petition that the parties were married in the city of St. Louis, in May, 1895, and lived together as husband and wife until April, 1910. Following the usual averment that during all of the time plaintiff had treated defendant with kindness and affection, plaintiff charges that defendant offered him such indignities as to render his condition intolerable. The indignities set out are that after the first year of the marriage defendant developed a violently jealous disposition and on divers occasions accused plaintiff of infidelity; that after the third year of the marriage on numerous occasions, "the exact dates of which are unknown to this plaintiff, which plaintiff believes to have been about once each month," defendant quarrelled with plaintiff and during the quarrel used foul and profane language toward him, on numerous occasions breaking various articles about the house and throwing dishes at plaintiff. Averring that plaintiff was a merchant engaged in the retail meat and provision business, it is charged that on divers occasions too numerous to mention, defendant would appear at plaintiff's place of business and without reasonable cause abuse the women patrons who happened to be present in plaintiff's place of business at the time and would accuse them of being intimate with plaintiff; that during the second year of the marriage, "the exact date being unknown to plaintiff," defendant without reasonable cause and while in a violent fit of temper, threw a meat axe through the front window of plaintiff's place of business; that thereafter during the year 1904 plaintiff was compelled to dispose of his business by reason of the habits, acts and practices of defendant as aforesaid. It is further averred that during the year 1909, a sister of defendant came to live with plaintiff and defendant, and defendant, without reasonable cause, accused plaintiff of being intimate with the sister; that for a period of three years next before the filing of the petition, "on occasions too numerous to mention," defendant, in the presence of others, threatened to kill plaintiff, on one occasion threatening to cut plaintiff's throat while asleep; that during the month of March, 1910, defendant was continually quarrelling with an employé of plaintiff and on one occasion threatened to throw carbolic acid in his face; that on the 15th of March, 1910, defendant at the breakfast table and in the presence of the children of plaintiff and defendant, without reasonable cause, accused plaintiff of being intimate with some Spanish ladies who lived in the neighborhood; that thereafter, on or about the 1st of April, 1910, defendant "forbids the women patrons of plaintiff to talk to plaintiff or to come into his place of business on any purpose." Stating that by reason of the habits, acts and practices of defendant, as before set out, he has suffered great anguish of mind and cannot live in peace and happiness with defendant and that there were born of the marriage two children, John aged fourteen, and Harry aged twelve, and that the defendant is an unfit person to have the care and custody of the children, plaintiff prays for divorce and that he be awarded the care and custody of the children, the petition containing the proper averment of residence in this city and state.

Admitting the marriage and birth of the children, defendant by her answer denies every other allegation in the petition.

The trial of the cause was quite lengthy and terminated in a finding and judgment in favor of plaintiff, the court also awarding him the custody and control of the children and adjudging the costs of the proceeding against defendant.

[1] We have read all the testimony as presented by the abstract of the appellant with very great care. While conceding that very great deference is to be paid to the conclusions of the learned trial judge on the evidence in a case of this character, he having the witnesses before him and hearing their testimony and being able to determine from the manner of giving the testimony and appearance of the parties and witnesses, the weight to be given to it, the duty is imposed upon us by the law to pass on the evidence and to determine the case on our own view of that evidence as presented to us by the record, a duty which we cannot shirk, even if we had the disposition to do so. This rule of decision was very distinctly announced by our court in Torlotting v. Torlotting, 82 Mo. App. 192, and, while stating the rule with great distinctness the decision of the trial court was not there followed, a divorce which it had adjudged in favor of the husband as against the wife being set aside and the case dismissed. It is true that that was done more on the application of the principles of law to the facts than on the facts themselves. Nevertheless it is a very clear example of the appellate court refusing to follow the conclusion of the trial court on the facts. That this has always been the rule of decision in this state is shown by the many cases cited in the Torlotting Case.

[2] It may appear somewhat banal to call attention to the importance of the marriage contract, a civil contract, it is true, under our constitution and laws, but a contract that lies at the very foundation of society and, in a measure, of government itself. When it becomes apparent that the true aims of the union of a man and woman can no longer be achieved by continuing the marital tie, it can hardly be that the interests of society demand that the union be preserved by mere force of law; but it is for the courts to see to it that that union is not dissolved on slight testimony, nor for either light or trivial causes. Nor is it to be dissolved, however galling its bonds may have become, if neither of the parties to it come into court with clean hands. It is of the very essence of our statute governing divorce that the party to whom it is awarded is the innocent and injured party. Where both parties are in fault the court, not attempting to weigh with nicely adjusted scales which of the two is the most or the least in fault, will award to neither the relief sought.

Section 2370, R. S. 1909, the section which enumerates the causes for divorce, concludes thus: "The injured party, for any of the causes above enumerated, may obtain a divorce from the bonds of matrimony." This rule, that the divorce is only to be granted to the injured party is further emphasized by the provisions of section 2372, authorizing a divorce in favor of the defendant, it being there provided that "Upon the hearing of the cause, if the court shall be satisfied that the defendant is the injured party, it shall enter judgment divorcing the defendant from the said plaintiff, as prayed in the answer." These provisions have not always been in our statutes regulating the matter of divorce in their present wording. Prior to the Act of March, 12, 1849, (Session Acts 1849, p. 49; chapter 55, 1 R. S. 1855, p. 662, § 1), our law provided that "the innocent and injured party" may obtain a divorce. R. S. 1845, c. 53, p. 426. But our Supreme Court in Hoffman v. Hoffman, 43 Mo. 547, held (loc. cit. 549), referring to the change in the wording of the law, that "the statute should receive the same construction in this respect as before the change; at least no better character should be required of a party seeking a divorce, and we are not inclined to allow it to a person sustaining a worse one." One of the earlier, if not the first, of the cases on our statute relating to divorce is Ryan v. Ryan, 9 Mo. 539, decided in 1845. Ryan v. Ryan is referred to with approval in Nagel v. Nagel, 12 Mo. 53, decided in 1848. In this latter case, referring to the statute, it is said (loc. cit. 55): "Thus it is seen that a party applying for a divorce must show that he or she is the innocent and injured party; otherwise the court should not grant the divorce." This construction of the statute, a construction placed upon it at a very early period in our history as a state, has been adhered to by our courts from that day to this, notwithstanding the change in its phraseology, as we have seen. It has always been held, as said by the court in Hoffman v. Hoffman, supra, loc. cit. 549, that "the least that can be required, * * * would be to compel parties to come into court with hands so far clean, at least, that the opposite party is not entitled to the same redress from them."

[3] Reviewing the testimony in this case, we have no hesitancy in saying that we agree with the finding of the trial court that the defendant in this case is guilty of the perpetration of sufficient of the acts charged by plaintiff in his petition to have entitled plaintiff to a divorce, provided he was without fault himself. We are not to be understood as finding that plaintiff has sustained all of his charges; we do not think he has sustained the most serious of them. That defendant used violent language toward plaintiff, was quarrelsome on occasions, is fairly well proven; so also there is evidence tending to show that on at least one occasion she charged him with too much familiarity with other women. These facts appear in evidence, although it must be said the evidence as to them is slight.

But there is just as much evidence presented in this record before us of unjustifiable acts by the plaintiff during the married life of the parties as of like acts by defendant. There is no substantial evidence that defendant's acts caused plaintiff to close up his business. On the contrary the evidence tends to prove that defendant had always helped plaintiff in his business and that without any apparent cause to do so plaintiff closed up his business as a merchant and practically without any notice whatever to his wife of his intention so to do, left her and the two children born of the marriage, alone in St. Louis, and visited his native land, leaving with his wife, for the support of herself and children during his absence of some two months, the sum of $100. He did not inform his wife, according to her testimony, and it is uncontradicted, of his intention to leave her and the family and make this long visit to a foreign land, until the very morning that he left. When he did leave he did not kiss either his wife or his children good-bye, and at five o'clock of the morning of the day he left, he for the first time told his wife of his intended departure. When he returned from his visit to his native land, it appears, according to his own testimony, that it was three days after his return before he entered the home. He testifies that when he came back from Germany he went home and there was no one about the house; that the shutters were shut, the doors locked and he went back to a friend of his and stayed there for another day; went back home again and it was still closed and it was the third day after his return when, as he says, he went to work and broke in the door and went inside, and his wife was not there. He is without any corroboration as to this. His wife's testimony as to the matter, and in this she is corroborated by other witnesses, is, that during these three days when he was in the city she was occupying the house with her children and that on the third day, that is the day upon which plaintiff broke into the house as he said, she had been staying for part of the day with her children at her mother's, a short distance away from the home and when she returned to her home she found her husband sitting on the doorstep. In all material matters connected with the relations between them the wife emphatically denied every one of the accusations contained in the petition or testified to and in a very great many of them she is corroborated in her denial by the testimony of others. According to his own testimony the quarrelling between these parties commenced a year after their marriage. They were married in May, 1895, and the plaintiff testifies that within a year after that and continually from then on the differences commenced between them and that they had been kept up ever since. But they lived together from May, 1895, to May, 1910—were even at the time of the trial living in the same house. Two sons were born to them of the marriage. That they quarrelled is beyond question; that he was sullen and sulky when at home with his wife and family is testified to, not only by his wife but by his own witnesses. Viewing this case throughout and considering all of the testimony in it, we have concluded that plaintiff is not an innocent party within the meaning of the statute and is not entitled to a decree. Moreover, we see no reason to prevent them renewing their marital relations and uniting in the upbringing of the two sons, both young, born to them of the marriage.

The judgment of the circuit court is reversed and the cause remanded with directions to that court to dismiss it at the cost of the plaintiff

2. TRUSTS (§ 265*)—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEES—PERSONAL LIABILITY.

The only judgment which may be rendered in an action at law against defendants as trustees under a testamentary trust is one based on their personal liability.

3. TRUSTS (§ 240*)—LIABILITY OF TRUSTEES—PERSONAL LIABILITY.

4. TRUSTS (§ 240*) — POWER OF TRUSTEE — MANAGEMENT OF ESTATE.

The provision in a will creating a trust and giving trustees power to sell or lease the property that a majority of the trustees shall govern concerns only the matter of binding the estate, and does not render the minority personally liable on contracts made or authorized only by the majority.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Walter B. Douglas, Judge.

Action by Louis Markel against Stephen Peck and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

The appeal in this case was prosecuted to the Supreme Court, by which it was transferred to this court. Thereafter it was transferred by this court to the Springfield Court of Appeals, where an opinion was rendered therein. See Markel v. Peck et al., 144 Mo. App. 701, 129 S. W. 243. Subsequently the Supreme Court declared the legislative act which purported to authorize the transfer of cases from this court to the Springfield court to be unconstitutional, and the cause was transferred back to this court on the theory that the jurisdiction of the appeal continued to reside here and the proceedings in the Springfield court were coram non judice. The case has been argued and submitted here, and upon due consideration we prefer to dispose of it upon the same theory as did the trial court; the parties by their counsel, in the argument before us, seeming to concede that our decision should depend upon the correctness or incorrectness of that theory.

This is an action at law against certain persons as trustees under the last will of Charles H. Peck, deceased, wherein the plaintiff seeks to recover damages for breach of an executory contract for future leases of real property forming part of the trust estate. Under the will the trustees are given "full power subject to the exceptions and limitations hereinafter named, to manage, rent, lease, sell and dispose of" the property belonging to the trust estate. The exceptions and limitations named do not pertain to the renting or leasing of property. The will provides that "in all cases where said trustees are by this will, empowered or required to do anything, the majority of them, except where otherwise specified shall govern, and the act of such majority shall be valid," etc. The trust is limited to continue until the expiration of 15 years next after the death of the last surviving one of the testator's descendants living at the time of his death, at which time the corpus is to be divided equally per capita between the testator's descendants then living. In the meantime the trustees are to pay the income in divers parts and proportions to some twenty-two or more persons, including the defendants, and their descendants. The contract in suit was made and entered into under date of March 6, 1903. It was not signed by the defendants, but by "Stephen Peck & Bro., Agents." By its terms said Stephen Peck & Bro., purporting to act "as agents of the estate of Chas. H. Peck, deceased," agreed to deliver to plaintiff two leases, one for a term to begin April 1, 1903, and the other for a term to begin September 1, 1907. The petition alleges that defendants entered into said agreement "through their lawfully authorized agents, Stephen Peck & Brother." The defendants denied the execution of the contract by answer, verified by affidavit. It is conceded that Stephen Peck, who is one of the trustees and a member of the firm of Stephen Peck & Bro., signed the contract in the name of said firm, and there was evidence pro and con as to whether the other three trustees authorized him or his said firm to do so. An instruction given at the instance of plaintiff permitted a verdict for the plaintiff if the defendants, or "a majority of them," authorized the firm of Stephen Peck & Bro., to execute the contract. The verdict was in favor of the plaintiff and against all of the defendants. The trial court sustained defendants' motion for a new trial on the ground that the giving of said instruction was error. The plaintiff has appealed, assigning as error the action of the court in granting a new trial.

CAULFIELD, J. (after stating the facts as above). At the time of sustaining the motion for a new trial the learned trial judge, in a memorandum filed, stated the legal theory influencing his action, as follows: "This is an action at law against certain persons as trustees under the last will of Charles H. Peck, deceased. Though the case was tried on the theory that a judgment was sought against the trustees as such, yet neither the petition nor the judgment so limit the case. In both the petition and the judgment the word 'trustees,' when used as descriptive of the parties, is properly to be taken as merely designatio personarum. That no recovery could be had in this action against the trust estate is, I think, unquestionable. The plaintiff's case is against the individuals who wronged him. If he be unable to obtain satisfaction from them, after obtaining a judgment, he may in a proper proceeding and upon a proper showing have his judgment made a charge against the trust property. Notwithstanding the fact that the parties may have had in their minds an erroneous theory of the case, if the pleadings, instructions, and judgment make a case when tested by the proper theory, the judgment should stand. As I have stated above, there is nothing in the pleadings or the judgment which would justify the claim that this action, or its result, in any way exceeded the power of the court. A judgment in effect against the trust property would exceed that power. Proceeding to an examination of the instructions, I find that the first instruction tells the jury that all of the defendants are bound by the acts of a majority of them. The pleadings show no relation between these defendants other than that of cotrustees. There is no law which authorizes the majority of a set of trustees to bind the minority in such a way as to render them or him liable de bonis propriis in a case such as this. This instruction, therefore, must necessarily be based upon the theory that the act of the majority was binding upon the trust fund in this action. That theory being clearly erroneous, the court erred in giving the instruction marked 1, and because of such error the defendants' motion for a new trial must be sustained."

[1] We agree with the conclusions so stated by the learned trial judge. Trust property cannot be reached in an action at law to recover damages for breach of an executory contract. It can be reached solely in equity. Moore v. Stemmons, 119 Mo. App. 162, 95 S. W. 313.

[2, 3] This being so, the only judgment, if any, which could be rendered in this action, would be one based on the personal liability of the trustees, and, of course, a minority trustee or trustees could not be rendered personally liable on a contract which he or they did not personally make, authorize, or adopt merely because others, composing a majority of the trustees, did authorize it.

[4] The provision of the will that a majority shall govern, etc., clearly concerns only the matter of binding the estate, and cannot be given the effect of rendering the minority personally liable on contracts made or authorized only by the majority. Whether then this instruction allows recovery against the trustees solely in their representative capacity, or allows a recovery against all if a mere majority authorized the contract sued upon, in either event it was erroneous, and the trial court was right in granting a new trial on that account.

The judgment is affirmed and the cause remanded.

POLLACK v. NATIONAL BANK OF COMMERCE IN ST. LOUIS.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 3, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 14, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 140*)—PAYMENT OF CHECK.

A check is payable on demand, and where nothing more appears the bank on which it is drawn must either pay or reject it on presentment.

Where a depositor of a bank presented to it a check for deposit, with knowledge of the custom of the bank to take checks and defer payment for a reasonable time until the bank ascertained whether there were sufficient funds of the drawer to pay it, the depositor was estopped from asserting that the bank giving him credit for the deposit could not, on finding insufficient funds to pay the check, charge the depositor's account with the amount thereof.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; James E. Withrow, Judge.

Action by Phil Pollack against the National Bank of Commerce in St. Louis. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

George E. Smith and Phil Pollack, both of St. Louis, for appellant. Edward D'Arcy, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. This is a suit to recover the amount of a deposit made by plaintiff in defendant bank. Upon the court overruling a demurrer to defendant's answer, plaintiff declined to proceed further and suffered a judgment of dismissal to go against him. From this judgment he prosecutes the appeal.

It is alleged in the petition that on September 30, 1910, and for a long time prior thereto, plaintiff was a depositor in the defendant bank, the National Bank of Commerce in St. Louis; that on said day he indorsed and deposited in defendant bank a check on said bank, drawn by the Noonan Real Estate Company to his order, directing it to pay him $427.12; that the defendant bank received the check and entered the amount therefor in his passbook as a deposit and stamped the check with the receiving stamp, marked it "O. Z.," and passed it to its bookkeeper, who thereupon entered the same to his credit in the books of the bank; that on the next day defendant requested plaintiff to reimburse it for the amount of the check, as the drawer thereof, Noonan Real Estate Company, did not have sufficient funds in the defendant bank to cover the same; and that this the plaintiff refused to do. Thereupon defendant, against plaintiff's objection, wrongfully charged plaintiff's account with said sum of $427.12. On this state of facts, plaintiff seeks judgment, on the theory that defendant bank became his debtor upon receiving the check and crediting it in his passbook and the books of the bank as though the same were a cash transaction.

Defendant bank, by its answer, denies the demand for reimbursement and the charging back were made on the day following the alleged deposit, but admits that both plaintiff and the Noonan Real Estate Company, drawer of the check, were its customers, and had for a long time theretofore each kept checking accounts therewith. It further pleads that there then was, and for many years theretofore had been, a usage and custom in the defendant bank, and in all of the banks of the city of St. Louis, which is and was well known by their depositors and to plaintiff, Pollack, to the effect that, notwithstanding checks may be received by the bank and credited in the passbook of the customer and the books of the bank upon presentation, whether drawn on that or any other bank, the transaction is in every instance subject to the right of the bank to reject the deposit and charge the amount back to the depositor at any time during the same day, if the bank discovers the drawer of the check has not sufficient funds on deposit to pay the same. In other words, it is alleged in the answer that all transactions of this character are had between the bank and its customers subject to this custom and usage, which obtains in defendant bank and in all of the banks of the city of St. Louis, and is and was at the time well known to depositors of each bank, and is and was at the time well known to plaintiff. The answer further sets forth that the Noonan Real Estate Company was without funds on deposit in defendant bank at the time of the presentment of the check, and that this fact was discovered during the same day; that upon the discovery of the want of funds of the drawer of the check the bank immediately notified plaintiff thereof and charged the amount of the check back to him, under the custom and usage above mentioned.

Plaintiff interposed a demurrer to that portion of defendant's answer setting forth the custom and usage referred to, on the theory that, though such custom and usage obtained, and that, notwithstanding his knowledge of the fact at the time the deposit was made, it constituted no defense at law. The court entertained a different view of the question, however, and overruled the demurrer as if such custom or usage, so known to plaintiff at and before the time of the transaction, justified the course of the bank in charging the amount of the check back to plaintiff during the same day.

[1] It is argued defendant ought not to be permitted to introduce evidence tending to prove such custom and usage and plaintiff's knowledge thereof, for the reason that, if established in the proof, such custom or usage would infringe the law of commercial paper, which renders checks payable on demand. No one can doubt the essential characteristic of a check is that it shall be instantly payable on demand. In this respect a check is distinguishable from a bill of exchange; for the drawee of a bill is entitled to a reasonable time, at least one day, to determine whether he will pay or accept it. But, as before said, a check is payable on demand, and if nothing more appears the bank upon which it is drawn should either pay or reject it upon presentment. See Morse, Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) § 369; Obitty on Bills and Notes (11th Ed.) § 1, c. 21, p. 353; 2 Daniel, Negotiable Instruments (5th Ed.) § 1566; McIntosh v. Lytle, 26 Minn. 336, 3 N. W. 963, 37 Am. Rep. 410; State v. Vincent, 91 Mo. 662, 666, 667, 4 S. W. 430.

[2] But, be this as it may, no one will contend for a moment that it is not within the province of the depositor presenting the check and the bank on which the check is drawn to expressly agree that the payment shall be deferred for a reasonable time until the bank may ascertain whether or not there are sufficient funds of the drawer of the check in its hands to pay it. Such an agreement, instead of operating an infringement of the established rule of law above stated, amounts to no more than a reasonable modification of its application in the interests of justice. If it were competent for the parties to thus expressly agree with respect to the matter, it would seem to be competent, too, for them to tacitly do so under the established custom, well known to both, which obtained, in good faith, throughout an extended course of dealing. It is unnecessary to determine the force and effect of the usage or custom set forth, generally speaking; for the allegation of the answer is that plaintiff well knew it.

[3] The precise question with which the court is concerned and in judgment here, therefore, is this custom and usage, which was well known to plaintiff and necessarily acted upon by him in dealing with the bank. If, at the time the check was presented, plaintiff knew of this custom, as alleged in the answer, and notwithstanding presented the check for deposit in the usual course, it would seem that the precepts of natural justice alone suggest that he should be bound thereby as if an express agreement to that effect were entered into; for otherwise grievous loss might be entailed upon the bank dealing with him on the faith of the usage and his knowledge of it. In such circumstances the principle of estoppel intervenes to preclude plaintiff and save harmless the bank dealing with him in the utmost good faith; and this is true though the check presented for deposit is drawn upon the same or depository bank, as is the case here. Touching the question of an express agreement or usage in such cases, Mr. Morse, in his work on Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) vol. 2, § 569, says as follows: "When a check is presented for deposit drawn on the depository bank, the bank may refuse to pay it, or take it conditionally by express agreement, or by usage, if such a one exists, as in California; but otherwise, if it pays the money, or gives credit to the depositor, the transaction is closed between the bank and the depositor, unless the paper proves not to be genuine, or there is fraud on the part of the depositor. The giving of credit is practically and legally the same as paying the money to the depositor and receiving the cash again on deposit. The intent of the parties must govern, and presenting a check on the bank, with a passbook in which the receiving teller notes the amount of the check, is sufficient indication of intent to deposit, and to receive as cash." (The italics are our own.) See, also, State v. Salmon, 216 Mo. 466, 522, 523, 115 S. W. 1106. From what is said by Mr. Morse, it is obvious that an express agreement between the parties should prevail, and that the intent of the parties must govern in every instance. As before said, it is unnecessary to rule here with respect to a general custom in the banks of St. Louis; for the case presents more than that, in that the answer avers plaintiff was fully informed as to such custom. This being true, the matter of the intention of the parties is one for the jury to determine; and if it were found as a fact that plaintiff knew of the custom at the time the check was presented for deposit it is competent to find, too, from this fact that an agreement accordingly, equivalent to an express one, existed between the parties at the time. Touching this matter, the answer tendered a question of fact, which, if established, would constitute a valid defense, and the demurrer was properly overruled.

The judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

HIGHT v. AMERICAN BAKERY CO.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 8, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 171*)—THEORY OF CAUSE—CONCLUSIVENESS.

Where complainant constructed his petition on the turntable doctrine of negligence, and so tried and submitted the case to the jury, he was bound by such theory on appeal.

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—"TURNTABLE DOCTRINE."

In order that an action for injuries to a child may be maintained under the "turntable doctrine," it is necessary that the machinery or appliance, the operation of which was the direct cause of the injury, shall be a dangerous appliance in itself when set in motion, or that it shall be of a kind liable to become dangerous from the position or condition in which it was left if set in motion, and defendant must have been negligent in leaving the appliance or thing causing the injury unguarded, unsecured, or unattended in an open place frequented by children, so as to allow of the appliance being put in motion by the children who had access thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 84, 129; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 1*)—"ACTIONABLE NEGLIGENCE"—DUTY TO USE CARE.

"Negligence" and "actionable negligence," even under the turntable doctrine, are distinguishable terms, since carelessness does not always involve liability, which attaches only when there has been a violation of duty by the party charged toward the party injured.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 148, 149; vol. 8, p. 7563; vol. 5, pp. 4743-4763; vol. 8, pp. 7729-7731.]

4. PLEADING (§ 418*)—COMPLAINT—CONSTRUCTION AFTER VERDICT.

Where defendant pleaded over after the overruling of a demurrer, the fact that the petition did not state a cause of action would not be ground for setting aside a verdict, or arresting judgment, if it was supported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1399, 1403-1406; Dec. Dig. § 418.*]

5. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—WAGON—DANGEROUS APPLIANCE—EVIDENCE—TURNTABLE RULE.

Defendant caused one of its wagons to be driven through a city street at a walk, from which wagon its servants discharged certain advertising whirligig toys, or aeroplanes. Plaintiff, a boy of 10, and other children, followed the wagon in an attempt to procure the toys when they fell to the earth after their power was spent. One of the toys falling under the wagon, plaintiff reached between the wheels for it; but, before he could escape, the hind wheel passed over his arm, causing the injury complained of. Held that, there being no proof that the wagon was driven negligently, or that defendant's servants had knowledge of plaintiff's dangerous position, and plaintiff never having been in front of the team, they owed no duty to him to keep a lookout to see that he did not get under the hind wheels, and, there being no evidence of actionable negligence on defendant's part, plaintiff was not entitled to recover under the turntable doctrine.

6. NEGLIGENCE (§ 85*)—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a boy of 10 placed his arm between the wheels of a moving wagon to seize a toy that had fallen under the wagon, knowing that if the wagon did not stop, and he did not get his arm out in time, he would be hurt by the wheel passing over it, and he was so injured, he was guilty of contributory negligence.

7. NEGLIGENCE (§ 82*)—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where a child placed his arm between the wheels of a slowly moving wagon, from which a toy had been thrown by defendant's servants in the wagon, in order that he might seize the toy, but before he could do so the wheel caught his arm and he was injured, the placing of his arm between the wheels, and not the attractiveness of the toy, was the proximate cause of the injury.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Hugo Muench, Judge.

Action by Alex Hight, by his father and next friend, Max Hight, against the American Bakery Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Action by an infant for damages alleged to have been sustained by him by reason of a wagon of the defendant, appellant here, running over and injuring his arm, the infant suing by his father as next friend. The action was brought against the American Bakery Company and the Heydt Bakery, alleged to be a branch of the company. After a recital of the minority of plaintiff and the appointment of his father as his next friend, the amended petition upon which the cause was tried avers that plaintiff, then being a minor under the age of ten years, on Saturday, the ninth of July, 1910, was playing with other boys, mostly older than himself, on Dickson street in the city of St. Louis near his home, and while so playing the defendants caused a large wagon, similar to a transfer wagon, to be driven through Dickson street in the locality where plaintiff was playing, from which wagon defendants caused to be thrown into the air, large numbers of toys consisting of whirligigs, on which defendant advertised certain of the commodities it had for sale; that said whirligigs were whirled into the air and would come down in different directions as they were carried by currents of the air; that it was the purpose of defendants in causing the large wagon to pass through Dickson street and causing the whirligigs to be thrown into the air to attract the attention of children thereto, and that the whirligigs were exceedingly attractive to children and in this way defendants sought to advertise and did advertise their commodities; that on the occasion mentioned while numerous children were attracted to the place where defendants' employes were driving the wagon and whirling the whirligigs into the air, many boys were attracted thereto and struggled with each other to obtain the whirligigs as they fell through the air to the street and around and under the heavy wagon; that plaintiff being a child under ten years of age and not having the discretion of a larger boy or adult, saw one of these whirligigs fall under the wagon and rushed to obtain it, placing his hand and arm under the wagon to get the whirligig, and defendants' employes who were driving the wagon then and there carelessly and negligently caused the hind wheel of the wagon to pass over plaintiff's right arm, crushing the bone and flesh above the elbow so as to maim and cripple plaintiff for life. It is further averred that the defendants and their employes in driving the wagon and throwing the whirligigs into the air knew or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known that these toys would attract plaintiff and other children of immature understanding into a place of danger of being injured by the wagon and cause them to rush to obtain such of the whirligigs as would fall under the wagon and that in doing so they were likely to maim or kill such children by running over them; "that the act of so driving over the streets with such heavy wagon, throwing such whirligigs into the air, as aforesaid, and thereby enticing children to struggle to obtain the whirligigs, and to place their hands and arms under the wagon to obtain the same, and driving heedlessly, without noticing a child who had put his hand and arm under the wagon to obtain such whirligig, and passing over and crushing and breaking his arm, was an act of negligence on the part of defendants." Averring that in consequence of the injuries plaintiff had suffered great physical pain and mental anguish and will continue to suffer the same for many years and that he is injured, crippled and maimed for life and his earning capacity, after he attains the age of twenty-one years, will be greatly diminished in consequence of his injury, plaintiff prays judgment for $7,500, with interest and costs.

The American Bakery Company, in its answer, after denying each and every allegation in the amended petition, sets up a plea of contributory negligence on the part of plaintiff, the contributory negligence alleged being that plaintiff had carelessly and negligently crawled under the wagon and between the front and rear wheels thereof while the wagon was in motion and proceeding along the street, and in so doing carelessly and negligently allowed his right arm to get under the rear wheel of the wagon.

A reply denying this was filed.

The trial coming on before the court and a jury, plaintiff dismissed as to the defendant Heydt Bakery and thereafter the trial proceeded against the American Bakery Company alone and resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff and against that defendant in the sum of $600, from which after interposing a motion for new trial as well as a motion in arrest of judgment and saving exception to the overruling of these motions, the American Bakery Company duly perfected its appeal to this court.

The learned counsel for appellant, in their printed argument upon which the cause is submitted, state that errors are assigned in only two respects in this case, aimed at the foundation of respondent's right to recover, and that question, counsel frankly state, is the only one they present for the consideration of the court; and whether error exists in the matter of giving or refusing instructions, save as to the instruction in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence, is a question which counsel say they will not discuss "for the reason that if respondent is entitled to recover under the theory pleaded and the evidence offered, we have no fault to find with the verdict and we see nothing to be gained by another trial." This very frank statement of counsel leaves as the only matters for our consideration the evidence and the action of the trial court in overruling the demurrer thereto. It is the contention of counsel for appellant that there is an entire failure of proof in the case entitling plaintiff to a recovery, and that the evidence in the case proves that under the law, plaintiff cannot recover.

The determination of these points involves a careful consideration of the testimony in the case.

Preliminary to taking up the testimony as to the accident, it is as well to say that the appliance referred to as a whirligig in the petition was also called an aeroplane by those who testified. One of these whirligigs was in evidence and a photograph of it is in the abstract. We shall hereafter designate it as the toy. Without reproducing the photograph, it is sufficient to say of the toy that it appears to have been composed of a pasteboard stem about eight inches long and about five-sixteenths of an inch in diameter. The stem is about the size of an ordinary lead pencil. It is hollow in the center. At either end two small wires about as large in thickness as a very small pin extend out at right angles from the stem for a distance of four inches and then each wire bends, forming practically a right angle with the balance of the wire, and extends then about two inches. On each of these wires thus shaped a piece of very thin glazed paper is pasted so that each piece of paper is triangular in shape. These pieces of paper constitute what may be called "wings." By taking hold of the stem and holding it stationary and winding the two wings at the bottom, and then letting go of the stem, this toy will sail through the air until the two wings, thus wound up, unwind, when the toy will drop to the ground. Small rubber bands extend from the wires, through the hollow part of the stem, and the winding process consists of simply twisting these rubber bands around each other until they are tight, the unwinding of these bands causing the wings of the toy to revolve, thus keeping the toy in the air as long as that continues, dependent also on the velocity of the wind. There was no controversy over the fact that this toy was an advertising device, having printed on the wings matter calling attention to defendant's products. When sent up from the wagon by whoever was manipulating it in the manner before described, the toy will sail in whatever direction the wind happens to carry it.

Turn now to the testimony as to the happening of the accident.

Alexander Hight, the plaintiff, offered as a witness, was questioned by the court as to his conception of the obligation of an oath. Plaintiff, being accepted as a competent witness, said he was ten years old; had been going to school for four years. He testified that he was ten years of age in August following the accident, which had occurred on Saturday, July 9, 1910; that about eight o'clock on the morning of the day of the accident he was on the corner of Dickson street and Garrison avenue, playing with three other boys; saw the wagon around the corner. The people on the wagon threw out one of these toys and the boys ran after it and it flew under the wagon. He (plaintiff) thought the wagon was stopping. He stuck his hand under the wagon to get the toy which had fallen there or which had been carried there. The wagon then began to go faster and ran over his hand, or more properly, the arm, and crushed it. He did not remember how many of these toys had been thrown out before he was hurt. One of the boys on the wagon took the toy from under the seat and wound it up and it began flying around the wagon. After it flew under the wagon he (plaintiff) went to get it. When he undertook to do that he did not think of the wagon going over his arm; that when one of these toys had been thrown up before, the boys all began running after it. Plaintiff exhibited his injured arm to the jury.

On cross-examination plaintiff testified that his home was on the north side of Dickson street, about eight houses east of Garrison avenue; had lived in that house about four years, during all of which time he had attended the Divoll School, which is about a block south of where plaintiff lived. On the morning of the accident he was playing on the corner of Dickson street and Garrison avenue; was playing on the south side of Dickson street in front of the house in which one Charles Barnett lived; was on the south side of Dickson street when he first saw the wagon. He and the other boys were playing with some pictures and after awhile the wagon came around the corner and they were throwing out these toys and he and the other boys all ran after them and one of the toys flew under the wagon and began whirling around. He did not remember how many toys he saw thrown out that morning; had seen some others thrown out but did not know where they went. When the one was thrown out which he tried to get, the wagon and team were two or three houses east of Garrison avenue; that before the wagon got around the corner he (plaintiff) was in front of Charles Barnett's house; when the whirligig was thrown out he (plaintiff) went further down the street, all the time on the south side of the street. The people on the wagon threw out the toy on the north side and it began going around on the north side. He ran around the back end of the wagon to the north side of it, got on his knees and reached between the front and rear wheels on the north side of the wagon. When he got on the north side of the wagon he was within fifteen or twenty feet from the car track. During all this time the team was moving, the driver of it sitting on the south side of the wagon. There were milk cans on the wagon, piled up about two feet or more, the highest part of the load being in the middle of the wagon. The top of the row of cans in the center of the wagon came above the top of the seat about a foot. The driver was sitting on the south side of this row of cans, sitting on the seat of the wagon. After the wagon ran over his arm it went about four houses and then stopped. The team was walking all the time, going very slowly. When plaintiff started for the south side of the street to run around the rear end of the wagon, he did not notice what the driver was doing. The remainder of his testimony related to the extent of his injury. On being recalled for further cross-examination, plaintiff testified that the wagon referred to was a large wagon and that he did not think at the time that if he got his arm under the wheel he would be hurt; he thought the wagon had stopped; he knew if he got in front of a moving wagon or got his hand under the wheel and the wheel ran over it, he would be hurt but he "thought this wagon would stop and wouldn't go for a long time." This is substantially all the testimony of plaintiff himself relating to his injury.

A witness named Blum, testifying for plaintiff, said in direct examination that he was a shoemaker by trade, living at 2933 Dickson street. He was on the front stairway of his house on the day of the accident examining his mail. He saw a team and wagon, the latter loaded with fancy milk cans and one man standing in the center of the wagon throwing off some toys and two men sitting on the wagon; that the toys that he saw were similar to one shown at the trial; saw one of them fly around the wagon and around the horses and eight or ten boys were running after it to get hold of it. Witness looked back at his mail and in half a minute heard something and looking again saw plaintiff being pulled from under the wheels of the wagon; saw the children running to get these toys; after the accident, had assisted in carrying plaintiff to his home, he living in the same apartment with plaintiff and knowing him before he was hurt. On cross-examination he testified that he saw the team come from the south side of Garrison avenue and turn east on Dickson street, keeping on the south side of that street. There was a single car track on Dickson street and the wagon was on the south side of the car track and going east. It was about three doors away from the corner of Garrison avenue on Dickson street that he saw them take plaintiff from under the wagon. When the accident occurred witness was three or four houses east of where the accident occurred and when it occurred the wagon was going toward the east. The horses were proceeding at a walk. The boys were taking plaintiff from back of the rear wheel; the rear wheel had gone over plaintiff. They were taking him out on the north side of the wagon; that he (witness) "is not quite sure whether there were three people on the wagon because he got excited"; that the wagon was loaded with some new milk cans piled like steps, the row in the center being the highest. They were about four and a half feet high from the bed of the wagon and eight or ten inches higher than the seat on which the driver was sitting. After the accident happened the wagon and team continued on east on Dickson street. The accident happened about 8:30 o'clock in the morning and he saw plaintiff before the wagon came along. Plaintiff was then on the corner of Garrison avenue, playing with some other boys on the sidewalk on the north side of the street. He saw plaintiff when he left to go toward the wagon. Plaintiff and six other boys ran out when they saw the team coming and started to run after the toys; that there were one or two toys sent up before the wagon passed the boys and then the wagon turned in on to Dickson street and some more were thrown out. The wagon was some ten or twelve feet from the corner before plaintiff ran out from the sidewalk, he being on the north side of Dickson street and on the east side of Garrison avenue, on the northeast corner of Garrison and Dickson. On re-direct examination this witness testified that he thought there were three persons on the wagon; could not tell how large they were; they were the men or boys who were managing the wagon.

Charles Barnett, sixteen years old, a witness on behalf of plaintiff, testified that at the time plaintiff was injured he (witness) was standing on the steps of his home, which was the corner house on the southeast corner of Dickson and Garrison; saw four or five boys there on the street; saw defendant's wagon coming down Dickson street; that when it was in front of his house the people on the wagon let one of the toys go and it went in the street. A little further down they let out another one of these toys which went to the north of the wagon and then between the front and back wheels. "The boys were out there trying to get this whirligig." Plaintiff got down on his knees and reached under the wagon, which was going slow and reached between the two wheels and the back wheel passed over plaintiff's arm. The people on the wagon had thrown out one of these toys before they threw the one out which plaintiff was trying to get when he was injured; that this latter toy did not go up very far, went about fifteen feet and he "guessed" the wind carried it between the two wheels. There were two men on the wagon. Plaintiff had been playing around there for some fifteen minutes. The wagon was going pretty slow and the horses were in a slow walk. On cross-examination this witness repeated that when the wagon passed witness and when the accident happened the horses were going in a walk. There were two boys or men on the seat of the wagon. The seat was on the front part of the wagon and one of these people was driving and one of them was giving out these toys; that the one driving was on the right hand or south side of the seat and the one throwing out the toys was sitting on the north side of the seat. Witness saw plaintiff run out to get the toy and get down on his knees on the north side of the wagon between the front wheel and the rear wheel of the wagon and reach under the wagon and between the wheels to get the toy and while reaching in there the rear wheel on the north side of the wagon ran over his arm. Some man came along the street and called to those in the wagon, "Stop, you have hurt a boy." They immediately stopped. Those on the wagon had been looking ahead of them; did not notice either of them turning around at any time. Plaintiff ran out from the sidewalk from behind the wagon. The team and part of the wagon had gone on by plaintiff. Three boys started out toward the wagon with plaintiff; they all seemed to be in a hurry but witness had not noticed whether they were running or not; they were all together ready to get the toy, but they didn't get down after it.

Julian Hight, an older brother of plaintiff, testified that he was with plaintiff at the time of the accident. Before it happened he and plaintiff had been playing on the sidewalk on Dickson street. They saw the wagon coming over and one man was winding up the toy which was thrown into the air and they all ran after it. Plaintiff ran after it and it went under the wagon and plaintiff stuck his hand under between the two wheels and went to jerk his hand out when the wheel went over his arm. The wagon was going very slow. There were two persons on it, one of them driving and the other throwing out the toys. When the toys were thrown out the children ran after them. All the boys ran after them and tried to get them.

On cross-examination this witness testified that they were all playing on the south side of Dickson street; that they started from that side when they ran after the toy; they saw the wagon and ran across the street and stopped and ran toward the west to come up with it; ran across the street in front of the wagon, running on the north side of Dickson street, then turned and ran back on Dickson street; when the toy was thrown out they (the boys) were on the south side of the street and the toy went toward the north and then south under the wagon; the boys all chased it from the south side across to the north side and until it went under the wagon between the front and rear wheels on the north side. The wagon was going all the time. His brother reached under the wagon to get the toy from between the front and rear wheels. There were milk cans on the wagon and banners on the side of it with the name of the brand of bread manufactured by defendant.

Beyond the testimony of the surgeon and of a sister-in-law of plaintiff as to the extent of plaintiff's injury and his suffering, this was all the testimony in chief for plaintiff.

Defendant at the close of the testimony in chief asked an instruction that under the pleadings and evidence plaintiff was not entitled to recover. This was refused and exceptions saved.

Defendant put on a witness who testified that he lived on Dickson street at the time of the accident; was on the corner of Dickson and Garrison waiting for a car. Defendant's wagon turned the corner to go east on Dickson street; as the wagon came down a hundred feet from the corner a man on it threw out one of these toys. The boys were near the northeast corner of Garrison and Dickson. They ran toward the back of the wagon and one little boy ran ahead of the rest of them, laid on his stomach, reached his arm under the wagon between the first and second wheel and his arm was run over. A street car coming along, witness got on it and as the car caught up to the wagon, witness called to the driver to stop that he had ran over a boy. The driver had not known it. There were two people on the wagon on the front seat. The wagon was loaded with milk cans, three rows high, the highest part of the load of cans being in the center. The person driving the team was a young man between twenty-two and twenty-five years old. He was sitting on the right hand side of the wagon to the south of the row of cans that was highest. Witness saw plaintiff before he ran out into the street. He (witness) was then standing at the second door from the corner of Dickson and Garrison on the north. The team was going very slowly; it went about fifty feet after running over plaintiff before it stopped. Plaintiff had left the sidewalk as soon as this advertising toy was thrown out and was about ten feet from the rear end of the wagon before he started to crawl under. On cross-examination this witness testified that he stood four or five minutes waiting for a car; that in the meantime this wagon had gone about a hundred or a hundred and fifty feet east of where he was standing; that nobody picked plaintiff up. That after it ran over the plaintiff's arm, the wagon went on about fifty feet, when witness called to the people on the wagon to stop. He did that because the driver had not seen the accident. Plaintiff was about seventy-five feet from witness when he was run over; he was run over about a hundred feet from the corner and witness was about twenty-five feet from the corner, which he deemed about seventy-five feet between him and plaintiff, when plaintiff was run over. This is all the evidence offered by defendant.

This is substantially all the testimony in the case as before stated, except that relating to the extent of the injury and the length of confinement of the plaintiff. As counsel make no point on the amount of the verdict, provided one is to be returned at all, it is unnecessary to set out this part of it.

Merritt U. Hayden and H. H. Scott, both of St. Louis, for appellant. Seneca N. Taylor, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. (after stating the facts as above). Beyond all question this case was pleaded by plaintiff and tried on the theory that it was one involving what is sometimes called "the turntable," or "attractive nuisance," or "attractive appliance" law.

Referring to that doctrine as applied to cases of injuries to children sustained by playing around or resorting to such appliances, and without any desire to go into a full discussion of it or pedantically to go over its history, it is not improper to say that it is generally conceded to have had its origin in the decision by the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of Lynch v. Nurdin, 1 Adolphus & Ellis (N. S.) 422, also reported 41 E. C. L. 422. It is rather curious to note the various constructions that have been placed upon Lynch v. Nurdin, a decision announced by Lord Denman, Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench, in 1841, by the several courts, not only of our country but of Great Britain. Great diversity of opinion has been shown as to the exact meaning and scope of that decision. A very full citation and careful analysis of the decisions of the various courts on this much vexed question is in Bottum's Adm'r v. Hawks, 84 Vt. 370, 79 Atl. 858, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 440. We refer those desirous of going into this question to the opinion of Judge Powers in that case.

Whatever diversity of opinion there may have been in the courts of Great Britain as to what was really decided in Lynch v. Nurdin, so far as the courts of that country are concerned its interpretation seems to have been definitely settled by the decision of the House of Lords in Cooke v. Midland Great Western Railway of Ireland, L. R. App. Cases (1909) 229, in which latter case Lynch v. Nurdin is expressly approved and applied in a turntable case.

Sioux City & P. R. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. Ed. 745, is the first case in the United States Supreme Court in which the turntable question arose and in which it was recognized in connection with injury to a child, who had played about it. It reached the Supreme Court on error to the Circuit Court of the District of Nebraska, in which court the case had been tried before Judges Dillon and Dundy. See 2 Dill. 294, Fed. Cas. Nos. 13,503 and 13,504. Mr. Justice Hunt, who delivered the opinion, of the Supreme Court, an opinion concurred in by all the Justices, cites Lynch v. Nurdin as authority in support of the claim of liability for injuries to a child sustained while playing with a turntable. There has been very great discussion of and disagreement as to the Stout Case in the decisions of the state courts which followed after that case had been determined, the applicability of Lynch v. Nurdin to a turntable case being sharply challenged. That its principle was to be applied to such cases in the national courts was finally and definitely determined by the Supreme Court of the United States in Union Pacific Railroad Co. v. McDonald, 152 U. S. 262, 14 Sup. Ct. 619, 38 L. Ed. 434.

Turning to the decisions in our own state, it will be found that the rule invoked in the turntable cases has been under consideration by our court as well as by the Supreme Court in several cases. As said by Judge Lamm in Kelly v. Benas, 217 Mo. 1, loc. cit. 11, 116 S. W. 557, 20 L. R. A. (N. S.) 903, referring to the turntable rule: "It is established in our law, and doubtless on principle ought to be applied (in those jurisdictions asserting the doctrine) to other cases coming strictly within the limits of the doctrine and presenting every ear-marking element upon which liability is predicated in the principal case. While this is so, the manifest distress and injustice flowing from unnecessarily extending the doctrine, or loosely applying it to many conceivable cases, has caused those courts accepting it to restrict its application to the narrowest bounds." Citations of numerous cases from our Supreme Court illustrating this follow. See particularly Witte v. Stifel, 128 Mo. 295, 28 S. W. 891, 47 Am. St. Rep. 668; Barney v. H. & St. J. Ry. Co., 126 Mo. 372, 28 S. W. 1069, 26 L. R. A. 847. The last reported decision of our Supreme Court on the question to which our attention has been called or which has come under our observation is the case of O'Hara v. Laclede Gas Light Co., not yet officially reported but to be found in 148 S. W. 884. In this latter case Judge Graves, who delivered the opinion of the court, quotes at length from the decision in Brown v. Salt Lake City, 33 Utah, 222, loc. cit. 236, 93 Pac. 570, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 619, 126 Am. St. Rep. 828, 14 Ann. Cas. 1004, and following, as stating the position of the several courts throughout the country on this rule. We refer to that case and to the quotation from it made by Judge Graves. Among other cases cited in Brown v. Salt Lake City is the case of Overholt v. Vieths, 93 Mo. 422, 6 S. W. 74, 3 Am. St. Rep. 557. Following the quotation above mentioned, Judge Graves refers for a full review of all the cases of our Supreme Court beginning with Overholt v. Vieths, supra, to the recent case of Kelly v. Benas, supra, quoting at length from that case. Discussing the facts in O'Hara v. Laclede Gas Light Company, supra, Judge Graves says: "In fact, the turntable cases are anomalous, and it is the practice of the courts to carry their doctrine no further than the previous decisions compel." So it is held by our court in Houck v. Chicago & A. R. Co., 116 Mo. App. 559, loc. cit. 568, 92 S. W. 738; Marcheck v. Klute, 133 Mo. App. 280, loc. cit. 291, 113 S. W. 654. The conclusion in the O'Hara Case is that the theory of the turntable or attractive nuisance cases was not applicable to such a case as the one then before the court.

[1-3] It is further said by the court in that case that the plaintiff had constructed her petition on the turntable doctrine of negligence and that so constructing it and submitting the case to the jury on that construction of it, it was unnecessary for the court to concern itself in an endeavor to arrive at the proper construction to be given to the petition; that "by the theory adopted below she (plaintiff) is bound here." This applies to the case now before us. That this case is distinctly presented by the petition and by the evidence as one in which the doctrine of the turntable, attractive nuisance or attractive appliance cases is sought to be invoked, is clear. Whatever diversity of views may be held by the courts as to the application of the doctrine, or even as to whether it can be sustained at all, it is fairly clear that these factors are held by all the courts recognizing the doctrine as necessary to its application: First, the machinery or appliance, the operation of which was the direct cause of the injury, must have been a dangerous appliance in itself when set in motion, as is a turntable; or it was of a kind liable to become dangerous from the position or condition in which it is left, if set in motion, this latter seeming to fall in with Lynch v. Nurdin. There the dangerous appliance, if we may call it so, was a horse and cart, articles neither in themselves or in combination dangerous. Second, negligence by the defendant in leaving these appliances or things so unguarded, unsecured or unattended, in an open place frequented by children, as to allow of their being put in motion by the children who obtain access to them. It is to be noted that the doctrine is applied only in those cases in which the person injured is a child, one of tender age; on the borderland, as to years, between the irresponsibility of childhood and the responsibility of those of mature years. No case assumes to apply the doctrine to an adult. It is clear from all the cases, that at the very foundation of liability for the injury is the negligence of the defendant. Unless that is proven, the doctrine, the benefit of the rule, cannot be invoked. It seems pretty well settled, on analyzing the cases, that the rule is to be invoked, not as a foundation for the liability of the defendant, but to meet the defense of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff, a child, injured. It is applied, not as a weapon of attack or as a ground for liability, but as a defense on the part of the plaintiff, a minor, one of tender years, against liability for his own acts of negligence, carelessness or even trespass in going upon the premises where the appliance is maintained. This is made very clear by Bottom's Adm'r v. Hawks, supra, even though Judge Powers, speaking for the Supreme Court of Vermont in that case, says that it seems "from a patient consideration of the whole subject in the light of all the cases at hand, that it is impossible to justify the doctrine on common-law principles." As is well argued in that case, while suffering a dangerous appliance, which in itself or in its position was a menace to children to remain unguarded, was an act of deliberate carelessness, "It does not necessarily follow that this action will lie. 'Negligence' and 'actionable negligence' are distinguishable terms; carelessness does not always involve liability. Before liability attaches, a duty must arise—a duty on the part of the party charged toward the party injured. So," says Judge Powers, "our discussion begins with the question: Did the defendant owe the intestate a duty, and, if so, was it the duty of active care? If the answer to both branches of this question is affirmative, then, so far as the main question is concerned, liability is stated in this declaration."

[4] In the case at bar we do not think it necessary to place our decision upon the construction of the petition to determine whether it states any cause of action. There is a verdict and judgment in this case, so that if a cause of action is stated, although imperfectly, the defendant having pleaded over after demurrer, there would be no cause for setting aside the verdict or arresting the judgment. That the petition in this case states a cause of action is not challenged. That it distinctly proceeds upon the theory of an attractive appliance and is distinctly bottomed on the doctrine of the turntable cases and that the case was tried upon that theory in the circuit court, admits of no doubt, as we have before remarked. What is claimed by counsel for appellant is a failure of proof of the material averments of the petition.

Returning to a consideration of the evidence in the case, substantially all of which we have set out, we are confronted with the question as to whether that evidence entitled the plaintiff to go to the jury: whether it shows actionable negligence on the part of defendant.

[5] It is averred that plaintiff, a child, saw one of these toys fall under a wagon being driven by employes of defendant and rushed out to obtain it, placing his hand and arm under the wagon to get it. The actionable negligence then here charged is that defendant's employes driving the wagon "did then and there carelessly and negligently cause the hind wheel of said wagon to pass over plaintiff's right arm." Again it is averred, that defendants and their employes "in driving said wagon, and throwing said whirligigs into the air, knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have known that said toys would attract plaintiff and other children of immature understanding into a place of danger of being injured by said wagon, and cause them to rush to obtain such whirligigs as would fall under the wagon, and that in doing so they were likely to maim or kill such children by running over them," and it is charged "that the act of so driving over the streets and with such heavy wagon, throwing such whirligigs into the air, as aforesaid, and thereby enticing children to struggle to obtain said whirligigs, and to place their hands and arms under the wagon to obtain the same, and driving heedlessly, without noticing a child who had put his hand and arm under the wagon to obtain such whirligig, and passing over and crushing and breaking his arm, was an act of negligence on the part of the defendants." It is furthermore averred in the petition that "it was the purpose of the defendants in causing said large wagon to pass through said Dickson street, and in causing said whirligigs to be thrown into the air, to attract the attention of children thereto, and that said whirligigs were exceedingly attractive to children, and in this way defendants sought to advertise, and did advertise their commodities."

Taking up this last assignment first, it is to be said of it that it is entirely unsustained by any evidence in the case. There is not a syllable or line of testimony tending to show that it was the purpose of defendant to attract the attention of children to the whirligigs, the wagon or the products of the defendant. Nor is there any evidence in the case from which any such purpose may be said to have been proven. It is not to be inferred that the children residing on the streets along which this wagon was driven and the toys turned loose were prospective customers. The advertising of the product undoubtedly was intended to reach housekeepers; the toys and the piled up cans, the banner on the wagon, were all parts of an advertising scheme. But it is a far cry to say that by attracting the attention of the children to the toys the attention of the consumers would be attracted to the product. Yet this is the argument that must be relied on to sustain this averment of the petition. It is argued by counsel for appellant that this is a material averment in this petition. Those counsel argue that if the purpose of sending up these whirligigs or toys was to invite the attention of children and to cause them to congregate around the wagon of the defendant for the purpose of increasing the business of defendant, it would seem that defendant owed respondent a very different duty from that which it owed him if he got in the way of the wagon through some impulse of his own and without appellant's knowledge or consent. We think this is a sound argument. We further agree that the burden of proof of this averment was on the plaintiff, respondent here. We hold he has failed to make any proof of it.

Recurring to the other allegations of negligence, careful consideration of the testimony in the case forces us to the conclusion that it fails to establish any actionable negligence on the part of defendant's employes. It appears by the evidence that defendant's employes were driving the team and wagon through the public streets of the city of St. Louis. This they had an undoubted right to do; the right of access to and user of those streets. That the team was being driven at a slow walk, is the unvarying and contradicted testimony of every witness in the case, witnesses produced and introduced by plaintiff. Even the plaintiff himself so testified. There were two persons on that wagon in charge of the team and of the appliances, one of them, the driver, the other a young man who was turning loose these toys. It is true that one of plaintiff's witnesses testifies that he thought he saw three people there, one of them standing in the center of the wagon throwing out these toys. This witness did not state that as a positive fact but stated it as a matter of opinion about which he admitted he was not certain. He is contradicted in this by every other witness of the plaintiff, all of whom were much nearer to the wagon at the time the accident happened than that witness. He was some distance from it and at the time, as he himself testifies, was engaged in opening and examining his mail, which he had in his hand. He says he looked up in a very casual way at the wagon as it passed him. Obviously he paid no particular attention to it or as to who was on it, until he saw his neighbor, the plaintiff, being picked up after the wagon had passed over his arm. He is contradicted in his assertion of there being three people in this wagon by material facts in the case. He says that he thought this third person was standing in the center of the wagon, while the evidence of every other witness in the case is that the center of the wagon, the bed back of the seat, was filled by tin cans which were piled up in the shape of a pyramid or steps, the apex of the pyramid directly over the center of the wagon and above the seat upon which the two occupants in charge of the wagon were seated. We can assume that there were two persons in charge of this wagon and seated at the proper place in the wagon on the seat. The driver was attending to the team, the other person, apparently a boy or young man, in front of this pyramid or pile of tin cans and of the seat, taking these toys from under the seat, winding them up and throwing them into the air. Both were looking to the front. Beyond question these were guilty of no actionable negligence in driving this wagon. They did not know that they had run over any one until after the wagon had gone some distance and were then told of it by a bystander. It would be a hard rule to say that those in charge of a team were required to look behind them to see if any accident was liable to happen after their vehicle had passed. All of our courts which have passed on the question of the duty of those driving a team or an engine, have, so far as we have read, confined the duty of the driver to "looking ahead," according to whether he was advancing or backing with his vehicle. We know of no case laying down any duty upon these to look behind and watch to see what has happened after the vehicle has passed. There is an exception to this rule, in so far as automobiles are concerned. See section 12, p. 329, Acts 1911. Their attention is and must be to the front. They were liable if they run over any one who was in front or could be seen in front of them, or were going at such speed as to endanger those who might also be using the public ways.

The evidence is without contradiction that these toys were thrown out toward the front of the wagon, or toward the side. If any of them passed behind the wagon they, and any one running after them, were out of the vision of the persons in charge of the wagon and who were sending the toys into the air. Nor can it be said to be an act of negligence on the part of these persons that they did not watch the flight of these toys to see what happened in connection with loosening them on the public street. There is not a particle of evidence tending to show that any boys followed any one of these toys except the boys who followed this particular toy and which this plaintiff endeavored to secure. Plaintiff and these boys did not go in front of the team. They went behind it.

There is evidence that other of these toys were set flying, but as to where they flew, what became of them, is without any evidence. Nor is there any evidence in the case that any children, or any other person for that matter, attempted to secure them or ran out into the street to get hold of them. That the toys were attractive to children is beyond question. But conceding that, is far from admitting that it proved or even tended to prove that those setting them off had any reason to apprehend that children would follow them under the wagon, especially go between the wheels of the wagon while it was in motion for the purpose of getting one. In fact plaintiff was the only boy who did reach under the wagon. It cannot be held that the law would require those in charge of this wagon, when they threw out one of these toys, to watch its flight, and to stop the team until they saw what had become of it; such requirement would be unreasonable. There was nothing therefore about the manner in which these toys were set free by the employes of defendant, or from the actions of the boys on the street, to warn them that setting the toys free was liable to inflict any injury whatever upon anybody. It was not actionable negligence, as we hold, to set loose these toys.

[6] As every witness testifies, even as this plaintiff himself testifies, when the boy, the plaintiff here, put his arm under the wagon to get hold of this toy, to reach it, he knew that the wagon was moving, that the wheels were turning. He was old enough to know that if he put his arm in front of a moving wheel and left it there, that he was going to be hurt; he was of sufficient discretion to know that; he says he did know it. His excuse is that he thought the wagon had stopped or was going to stop. It is not likely, from the facts in evidence in the case that he thought anything about this. Like any other boy of his age, the chances all are that at the time, if he thought at all, he thought he would be quick enough to get the toy from under the wagon before the wheel would reach him. He took that chance and lost. The doctrine of attractive appliances, of the turntable cases, is therefore inapplicable here and cannot relieve plaintiff of the charge of contributory negligence; cannot be used to put the responsibility for the injury, which he undoubtedly sustained upon this defendant.

[7] Furthermore, the alleged attractiveness of the toy was not the causa causans of the injury. That was a remote cause. The immediate cause was plaintiff placing his arm between the front and rear wheels of a moving vehicle; one that he knew was moving and which he had no reason to believe would stop.

For all these reasons, we are of the opinion that plaintiff cannot recover and that the learned trial court erred in sending the case to the jury. The judgment of the circuit court is accordingly reversed.

NORTONI and CAULFIELD, JJ., concur.

BIRCH TREE STATE BANK v. DOWLER.

1. TRIAL (§ 253*)—INSTRUCTIONS—IGNORING ISSUES.

Where, in an action on a note given by defendant for kitchen cabinets for resale in a designated county, defendant pleaded failure of consideration and fraud, and testified that before giving the note the payee informed him that he had never sold kitchen cabinets in the county, while in fact he had canvassed part of the county with a similar, but cheaper, cabinet, and had sold about 65, an instruction that, if the payee falsely and fraudulently represented to defendant that the county had not been canvassed, and defendant, relying on the representation, gave his note, and the county had been worked by the payee and others, the representation was false, defeating a recovery, was erroneous, because declaring as a matter of law that the representation was actionable, leaving out of consideration the question of its materiality or injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 613-623; Dec. Dig. § 253.*]

2. CANCELLATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 4*)—GROUNDS—FRAUD.

One seeking to annul an instrument, on the ground that it was obtained by fraud, must show that the representations were as to a material fact, and that they contributed to the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Cancellation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 1; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. FRAUD (§ 18*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

One suing for damages from fraudulent representations, inducing the execution of an instrument, must show that the representations were as to a material fact, and that they contributed to the injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 18; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

4. FRAUD (§ 20*)—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES—EVIDENCE.

A representation, to be actionable as a fraudulent representation, must be one on which the complaining party relied, and by which he was actually misled, to his injury; but the party complaining need not testify directly that he was influenced by and relied on the representation, but such fact may be established by other circumstances.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shannon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Action by the Birch Tree State Bank against T. H. Dowler. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 163 Mo. App. 65, 145 S. W. 843.

Lew R. Thomason, of Poplar Bluff, and L. B. Shuck, of Eminence, for appellant. Green & Wayland, of West Plains, and Orchard & Cunningham, of Eminence, for respondent.

GRAY, J. This was an action by the plaintiff, Birch Tree State Bank, a corporation, against the defendant, upon his negotiable promissory note, which was drawn in the usual form for the payment of the sum of $225. The note was originally executed by defendant T. H. Dowler, to W. H. Hurt for 112½ kitchen cabinets. The note was subsequently assigned for value to the Birch Tree State Bank, and, not being honored when it became due, the present suit was brought by the assignee.

The note was executed under the following circumstances: W. H. Hurt was the agent for the Mound City kitchen cabinets, and sold to the defendant, as we have stated, 112½ of these cabinets, for which the defendant was to pay him $12 each, upon the following terms: Four dollars was to be paid by note for each of the cabinets, and the balance of the purchase price, $8, for each of the cabinets f. o. b. St. Louis, was to be paid when they were ordered, and the defendant was to have the option of ordering as many of the cabinets as he chose upon payment of this additional $8, but by the contract of the parties the sale was restricted to Howell county, and all sales were to be made within one year from the date of the contract. Under the agreement the defendant executed to W. H. Hurt these two promissory notes, each for $225. Subsequently the defendant ordered under his contract 4 of these kitchen cabinets, which he sold. He thereafter sent an order for more cabinets, but for some reason the order was not delivered, but returned.

Owing to the condition of the record in this case, we do not feel justified in passing on all the issues that are really presented by the evidence. While both parties have filed what they style "abstract of the record," the pleadings are not set out in either. In the appellant's abstract, it is said: "Petition of the plaintiff in the usual form; action on the following promissory note." As to what is contained in the answer, only the following appears in the abstract: "The answer admits the execution of the note, and pleads, in defense of plaintiff's action, failure of consideration, and fraud in the procurement of the note by the payee, and a knowledge of said fraud by the plaintiff." But there is enough in the record, however, properly preserved by appellant, to convince us that appellant's complaint against respondent's instruction No. 1 is meritorious.

[1] The defendant testified that, prior to the time he gave the note sued on, he inquired of the payee if he had ever sold kitchen cabinets in Howell county, and that the payee said he had not, and that he had never been west of the Mississippi river. The evidence shows that in 1901 the payee had canvassed a part of Howell county with a similar, but cheaper, cabinet, and had sold about 65 in the county. The defendant gave the following testimony: "Q. Did you try to sell these kitchen cabinets in Howell county? A. Yes; but I found they had sold something up there about the same. Q. And you tried to sell these kitchen cabinets there? A. Yes, sir. Q. Why couldn't you sell them? A. They said that was more than they were worth."

Defendant's instruction No. 1 reads: "The court instructs the jury that if you find and believe, from the evidence, that W. H. Hurt sold kitchen cabinets to the defendant, T. H. Dowler, and gave him the exclusive right to sell such kitchen cabinets in Howell county, Mo., for one year or less, and falsely and fraudulently represented to him that Howell county had never been worked, and that the defendant, relying on said representations, gave his two notes to W. H. Hurt for $225 each, and that he, the defendant, relied on said representations made by Hurt, and that said county had been worked by Hurt and others, or by Hurt alone, in the sale of such kitchen cabinet, then such representations would be false; and if you find that said false and fraudulent representations were made as above stated, then and in such event, before the plaintiff would be entitled to recover, it must show by a greater weight of the evidence the following facts: (1) That it is the bona fide owner of the note in suit. (2) That it purchased said note for value before maturity. (3) That it had no knowledge of any fraud perpetrated by W. H. Hurt, as an inducement to the defendant to sign said note." There was not a word of testimony that the kitchen cabinet had ever been sold in Howell county. As we have stated, there was testimony that several years before a cheaper, but somewhat similar, cabinet had been sold in West Plains, Howell county; but there was no testimony that the cabinet defendant had purchased had ever been sold in that county.

[2, 3] The instruction is highly prejudicial, under the testimony, for another reason: By it the jurors were told that if Hurt falsely and fraudulently represented to defendant that Howell county had not been canvassed, and that the defendant, relying on said representation, gave his notes, and that said county had been worked by Hurt and others, then such representation would be false, etc. This instruction declares as a matter of law, that such a representation is actionable, and leaves out of consideration entirely the question whether it was material or injurious. The law is well settled that where it is sought to annul an instrument, the execution of which was obtained by false and fraudulent representations, or where it is sought to recover damages for such representations, it must be shown that the representations were as to a material fact, and that they contributed to injury. Brownlee v. Hewitt, 1 Mo. App. 360; Smith v. Dye, 88 Mo. 581; Feller v. McKillip, 100 Mo. App. 660, 75 S. W. 379; Thompson v. Newell, 118

Mo. App. 405, 94 S. W. 557; Champion Funding & F. Co. v. Heskett, 125 Mo. App. 516, 102 S. W. 1050.

[4] Since the case is to be retried, we call attention to the fact that the evidence does not show that the defendant relied on the statement of Hurt that Howell county had not been worked, and that he would not have entered into the contract, had he known that fact. In order to make a misrepresentation fraudulent, it must be one upon which the complaining party relied, and by which he was actually misled to his injury, and in a legal sense a person is not damaged by a false representation by which he is not influenced, and it is incumbent upon the party, attempting to recover for fraud or deceit found upon false representations, to show that he was influenced by them, and in all cases it is a fact which should be averred and must be maintained by evidence. Wannell v. Kem et al., 57 Mo. 478; Noble v. Buddy et al., 160 Mo. App. 318, 142 S. W. 438; Bailey v. Smock, 61 Mo. 213; Webb v. Rockefeller, 195 Mo. loc. cit. 74, 93 S. W. 772, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 872; Sioux Banking Co. v. Kendall, 6 S. D. 543, 62 N. W. 377, and cases therein cited; Halliwell Cement Co. v. Stewart, 103 Mo. App. 182, 77 S. W. 124.

It is not necessary for the complaining party to testify directly that he was influenced by and made the contract relying on the representation as such fact may be established by other facts and circumstances in the case. Chilson v. Houston, 9 N. D. 498, 84 N. W. 354. In a case where a person was induced to trade for land, and the seller represented that the tract contained a certain number of acres, which was false, it may well be said that, when the complaining party has proven that there was a material difference between the number of acres represented and the number actually contained in the tract, and that he paid a valuable consideration for the property, he has made a question for the jury on the issue as to whether he relied on the false statements concerning the number of acres, and that proof of any shortage in the number of acres would be proof of injury and damage by the representation. But in this case, the misrepresentation was that Howell county had not been worked, and the evidence shows that several years before a part of the county had been canvassed for a similar, but cheaper and inferior, article. From the proof of these facts alone, how can a court or jury say that the defendant would not have entered into the contract, had Hurt told him that 10 years before he had, in a part of the county, sold an inferior and cheaper article. In Bailey v. Smock, supra, it is said: "The court should be satisfied by the clearest evidence of the fraudulent representations and that they were made under such circumstances as to show the contract was founded upon them." The defendant did not testify that he believed the statements of Hurt, or that he was induced by them to enter into the contract, and, even when he was asked why he could not sell the cabinets in Howell county, he said that the persons to whom he tried to sell said the price was too high.

What we have said regarding the issue will depend upon the allegations of the answer and reply thereto. The judgment will be reversed, and the cause remanded.

NIXON, P. J. Under the evidence in this case, I am of the opinion that the plaintiff's requested instruction, in the nature of a directed verdict, should have been given by the trial court.

WALD v. WALD.

(St. Louis Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 3, 1912.)

1. DIVORCE (§§ 245, 308*)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN OF PARTIES—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 2361, authorizing the court at any time to review any order awarding alimony and the custody of children of the parties, the court granting a divorce retains jurisdiction as to the modification of a judgment touching the custody of the children, and the same may be brought to the attention of the court by motion in the original cause as a proceeding constituting only a continuance of the original jurisdiction of the court.

2. DIVORCE (§ 300*)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN OF PARTIES—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Where the custody of a child is awarded in divorce proceedings, the child becomes a ward of the court, and the court should not permit its removal into another jurisdiction, unless its best interests require it.

3. DIVORCE (§ 303*)—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN OF PARTIES—JURISDICTION OF COURT.

Where a wife obtained a divorce from her husband, and the court awarded to her the custody of the child, and she was about to remove it from the jurisdiction of the court, the husband, on motion for a modification of the judgment, was entitled to a hearing to determine whether the best interests of the child required its retention within the jurisdiction of the court, or whether the removal would best subserve its interests.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Chas. Clafin Allen, Judge.

Action by Cad S. Wald against Emile M. Wald. From a judgment denying the application of defendant to modify the order awarding the custody of a child of the parties, he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

This is an appeal from the judgment of the court denying defendant the right to introduce testimony on his motion to modify a decree of divorce entered against him in favor of plaintiff several years theretofore with respect to the custody of the minor child of the parties. We adopt from defendant's (appellant's) brief the following statement of facts which reveals the question in controversy and the ruling of the court thereon:

"On October 8, 1904, the plaintiff in this proceeding recovered a decree of divorce from defendant and was awarded alimony and the custody of their minor child, Lucile, then aged six years; and on October 31, 1904, the decree was modified, allowing defendant to visit the child on Tuesday and Thursday evenings of each week, and allowing him to take her out on Saturday and Sunday of each week. In February, 1911, the defendant filed his motion in said cause, under section 2381, R. S. 1909, to modify the said decree touching alimony and touching the custody of said minor, in which motion the defendant, after reciting the then state of the record, alleged that he has at all times since the decree paid to plaintiff the alimony as in the decree provided; that he has at all times recognized and respected her right to the custody of said child, as in the decree provided; also that he has at all times since the decree taken advantage of the privilege granted to him of visiting the child on Tuesday and Thursday evenings, and of visiting or taking her out on Saturday and Sunday, of each week; that said child is now 13 years of age, and the relations between her and her father, the defendant, have been most filial and affectionate, and that, besides paying the alimony to the mother, the defendant has also from time to time, when occasion made it proper to do so, provided the child with such necessities and luxuries as his means permitted; that since the decree plaintiff has been residing with her mother and sister at 5450 Clemens avenue, St. Louis, Mo., and the child has been residing with her; and that defendant has always been permitted to visit her at the said abode.

"It is also alleged that plaintiff contemplates becoming married in the near future to a man residing at Seattle, Wash.; that her future husband is well able to provide for her support, and after the marriage she will no longer need alimony from the defendant to provide for her support; that plaintiff intends to remove said child to Seattle as her future home, and to permanently take the child from St. Louis, and beyond the jurisdiction of this court, and thus deprive the defendant of his right to visit and take out the child, as in the decree provided. It is also alleged that the best interests and welfare of the child demand that she be not taken away from the city of St. Louis, and beyond the jurisdiction of this court, and thus be deprived of the advantage of the superintending control of this court, in case her mother, through her conduct or through the conduct of her future husband, forfeits her right of custody of said child; that the welfare of said child also demands that she be not taken into the home of a stepfather; also that she be not taken away from the school where she is now being educated, and from the companionship of her playmates and relatives, all of whom reside in the city of St. Louis; also that she be not taken away, so that she will lose the companionship, advice, and assistance of her father, the defendant, as assured to her under the decree.

"It is also alleged that defendant is in the employ of the Ferguson-McKinney Dry Goods Company, in St. Louis, and is in charge of their claim department; that he is earning $100 per month; that he resides at 5017 Delmar avenue, is of good moral character, and enjoys good associates and good repute and standing; that he is well able to provide a proper and comfortable home for his said child, under proper superintendence, and to properly provide for her education and support and for her welfare; that he is able to have her make her home at his sister's house, where she will also have the benefit of the supervision and care of his sister, who is a widow and well qualified to look after the wants and needs of the child; or, if the court deems it more advantageous for the welfare of the child, defendant is willing to make any arrangement which the court may deem proper for the child to remain at the home of her maternal grandmother, with whom the child has resided and now resides; but, if such an arrangement be insisted upon, it should be made under such safeguards as may be necessary to guarantee that the said child will not be taken away or permitted to go beyond the jurisdiction of this court.

"Defendant prayed the court to review, modify, and change the decree touching alimony, and touching the custody of said child, in the following respects: That the order touching alimony, under which defendant is now obligated to pay plaintiff the sum of $30 per month, be so modified that it is to terminate upon and in the event of plaintiff's remarriage; that the order touching the custody of the child be so modified that in the future the defendant alone be awarded the care, custody, and maintenance of the child, giving, however, to the plaintiff, the right to visit the child at such times and under such conditions as the court may deem reasonable, the custody of the child to be awarded to the defendant under such conditions, if any, as the court may see fit to impose; and defendant also prayed for a restraining order, restraining plaintiff from taking the child out of the city of St. Louis, or beyond the jurisdiction of the court, until otherwise ordered by the court, and that she be notified of the making of such restraining order and of the time when the hearing will be had by the court upon the motion, and that she be required to produce the child in court upon the said hearing and to await the further orders of the court. The court set the motion for hearing, and issued a temporary restraining order, as prayed.

"On February 24, 1911, the parties appeared, and the motion came on for hearing. On an objection by plaintiff to the introduction of any evidence to be offered by defendant in support of the motion, the court took the motion and objection under advisement, and on March 2, 1912, entered an order sustaining the objection to the introduction of evidence vacating the restraining order previously issued, and overruling the motion of February 17, 1911, to modify the decree, and in so far as said motion asks for a change of the care, custody, and control of the child, the motion was denied. The court reserved jurisdiction over the cause and the parties, for the purpose of making such further orders with reference to the judgment for alimony as may hereafter be deemed meet and proper.

"In due time defendant filed his motion for a new trial. Defendant also offered to dismiss the specification as to alimony, and upon the court's refusal to permit the dismissal to be entered, defendant filed a motion, praying for leave to amend by dismissing the said specification. The latter motion, as well as the motion for a new trial, was overruled by the court, and defendant in due time perfected his appeal to this court. Defendant had also duly saved his exception to the orders of the court above complained of, and to the sustaining of the objection to the introduction of evidence, and to the order overruling defendant's motion for new trial.

"In view of the subsequent action of the court in vacating the order for alimony, when proof was subsequently submitted of the remarriage of the plaintiff, the defendant does not wish to raise, on this appeal, any question as to the propriety of the action of the court in refusing to vacate the order for alimony upon his original motion, nor to complain of the action of the court in refusing to permit defendant to dismiss the specification respecting alimony. Appellant assigns as error: First, the error of the court in entering the order of March 2, 1911, aforesaid, in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the admission of testimony offered by defendant in support of the motion, in vacating the restraining order which had theretofore been made, in overruling defendant's motion to modify the decree in so far as it related to the custody of the child, and in denying to the defendant the custody of the child, all of which matters were set out in the motion for a new trial; second, the error of the court in overruling defendant's motion for a new trial."

Schnurmacher & Rassieur, of St. Louis, for appellant. Henderson, Marshall & Becker, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTONI, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The statute provides there may be a review of any order or judgment touching the alimony and maintenance of the wife, and the care, custody, and maintenance of the children, or any of them, as in other cases. Section 2381, R. S. 1909. There can be no doubt that under this statute the court granting the divorce retains jurisdiction as to the modification of the judgment or decree touching the maintenance of the wife and the custody of the children. These matters may be brought to the attention of the court by motion in the original cause, as here, at a subsequent term, for the proceeding is but a continuation of the original jurisdiction concerning the custody of the children. See Cole v. Cole, 89 Mo. App. 223; Meyers v. Meyers, 91 Mo. App. 151.

[2] But though defendant filed a proper motion in the case, setting forth the facts upon which the modification of the decree concerning the custody of the child was sought, the court refused him the right to introduce testimony in support thereof, and denied the application upon a mere ore tenus objection thereto, as if it appeared on the facts stated in the motion no prima facie right to the relief prayed appeared. It would seem the court treated the oral objection to the introduction of evidence in support of the motion as a demurrer thereto, and by the judgment given declared plaintiff had a right to remove the child out of the jurisdiction of the court into a foreign state and into a new home, amid other surroundings, notwithstanding the decree establishing defendant's right to frequently visit his offspring and take her out on Saturdays and Sundays in St. Louis. Obviously, this was error, for the decree of divorce established a right prima facie in defendant to visit the child and take her out in St. Louis; and this is true, though it appears the divorce was granted for his fault. It is true that the motion for a modification of the decree sets forth no facts suggesting unfitness of plaintiff, the mother, as a proper person to retain custody of the little girl; but it does reveal that she was about to remove it from the jurisdiction of the court here and into a foreign state. Where the custody of children is awarded in divorce proceedings, as was done in the instant case, the child becomes the ward of the court, and the court thereby assumes a position of guardianship with respect to its person and future well-being. In this view, it is said to be against the policy of the law to permit the child to be removed into another jurisdiction and from within the province of the court first awarding the custody, unless the well-being and the future of the child would be better subserved thereby. See Miner v. Miner, 11 Ill. 43, 51; Chase v. Chase, 70 Ill. App. 572; Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206, 221, 222, 223; Jennings v. Jennings, 85 Mo. App. 290; Edwards v. Edwards, 84 Mo. App. 552.

[3] It appearing by the motion that the plaintiff, the mother, was about to remove the child from within the jurisdiction of the court, defendant was entitled to a hearing thereon, and should have been permitted to show that the interests of the child would not be bettered by the removal. Although no one can doubt that the policy of the law forbids the removal of the child from within the jurisdiction of which it is a ward, the best interests and the future welfare of the ward should in every instance be weighed in the balance and determine the final order of the court touching its custody. While it is important to retain the child within the jurisdiction of the court, to the end of exercising its guardianship and power in making future orders for the custody, care, and maintenance, it appears that the controlling thought influencing prior decisions on the subject makes for the welfare of the child, and a considerable discretion is allowed on this score. In other words, unless it appears the interests of the child would be best subserved by the removal, she should be retained here within the power of the court. Jennings v. Jennings, 85 Mo. App. 290; Campbell v. Campbell, 37 Wis. 206, 221.

The judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded. It is so ordered.

Error to Circuit Court, Morgan County; John M. Williams, Judge.

Action by J. A. Hawkins against Charles A. Wiest. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff brings error. Reversed and remanded.

R. M. Livesay, Forman & Hubbard, and J. W. McClelland, all of Versailles, for plaintiff in error. A. L. Ross, of Versailles, and Sangree & Bohling, of Sedalia, for defendant in error.

ELLISON, J. Plaintiff's action is founded on a promissory note. The judgment in the trial court was for defendant.

It appears that the note was executed to defendant by John and Martha Birchfield, that it was negotiable in form, was for $350 with interest, and was dated the 5th of March, 1907, due one year after date. On the back is a credit of $24.72, and the blank indorsement of defendant and also the blank indorsement of R. M. Johnson, "Without recourse." The evidence disclosed that defendant, as payee, brought suit against the Birchfields on the note in the Buchanan county circuit court, and on February 3, 1909, nearly a year after it became due, obtained judgment. The note was obtained from the files of the circuit court by defendant, and on January 5, 1910, he indorsed it for value by the blank indorsement appearing thereon to R. M. Johnson, and the latter thereafter indorsed it by the above indorsement on the back thereof to plaintiff without recourse.

The petition alleges that the judgment was unknown to plaintiff when he purchased the note, and "that by reason of the judgment the note as against the makers thereof merged into the judgment, and for that reason no presentment to the makers for payment was made by plaintiff, and no notice of presentment, demand, and nonpayment given to defendant."

[1] The foregoing shows that defendant, the payee of the note, after recovering judgment upon it against the makers, and after it was due, started it out afresh by negotiating it to Johnson, who indorsed to plaintiff. It is true that an indorsee of an overdue negotiable note takes it subject to all proper defenses as between the original parties to it, the maker and the payee. But it should not be overlooked that a note, negotiable in form, being overdue, does not destroy its negotiability. A bill indorsed after due becomes a new bill at sight (Davis v. Francisco, 11 Mo. 572, 49 Am. Dec. 98; Kelly v. Staud, 136 Mo. 430, 37 S. W. 1110, 58 Am. St. Rep. 648), or, as expressed in our present statute, becomes a note payable on demand (section 9978, R. S. 1909). And ordinarily there must be demand, notice, and protest. Therefore when defendant, after obtaining judgment upon the note against the makers, took possession of it and reissued it, though after due, it became a new instrument payable on demand.

Defendant, however, insists that the note became extinct by merger into the judgment. So does it lose vitality, as to the maker, by payment, yet if it be reissued by the payee, as to him it becomes a legal obligation, a new bill at sight. Kelly v. Staed, supra. It seems to us it would be most unjust and unreasonable to permit defendant, who reissued the note after obtaining judgment upon it, to escape liability for his act to his indorsees on the plea that there was no note, that it had become void by being merged in the judgment. To do so would be in the face of the statute itself (section 10035, R. S. 1909), which declares that every person negotiating a note warrants "that it is in all respects what it purports to be," and "that he has no knowledge of any fact which would impair the validity of the instrument, or render it valueless."

[2] We think from the fact that defendant himself had put the note into a judgment against the makers it became functus officio as to them, and as to them became merged in the judgment, and there remained no right to pursue them on the note; their liability being transferred to the judgment. Tourville v. Wabash Ry. Co., 148 Mo. 614, 623, 50 S. W. 300, 71 Am. St. Rep. 650; Freeman on Judgments, § 215. There was therefore no right to present the note to the makers for payment, and no right in any one to expect it would be paid, if presented. It was no longer an obligation against them. In such circumstances defendant has no right to require demand and notice as a prerequisite to his liability as indorser.

The judgment should have been for the plaintiff, and it is accordingly reversed and the cause remanded. All concur.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—PREMISES—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION—DUTY OF LANDLORD.

While a landlord, who demises parts of premises to a number of tenants, is bound to maintain in reasonable repair a common passageway, he is not bound to maintain or keep in repair premises demised as a dwelling, there being no implied warranty in the contract of letting that the premises are tenantable or suitable for the purposes for which they are leased; and hence, though the demised premises were a ramshackle house, the tenant's minor child, who was injured by the falling of a mantel, cannot recover.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 630-641; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 150*)—PREMISES—REPAIRS—ENTRY.

Where a single dwelling was demised to one person, without any covenant as to repairs, no one, not even the landlord, could enter, without defendant's consent, to make repairs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Landlord and Tenant, Cent. Dig. §§ 536-557; Dec. Dig. § 150.*]

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES FROM DANGEROUS CONDITION—COVENANT TO MAKE REPAIRS.

Though it was agreed that the landlord should repair the demised premises and make them reasonably safe, a breach of that covenant will not support an action for personal injuries due to failure to make such repairs, those injuries being deemed too remote to have been contemplated by the parties when the covenant was given.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; Chas. C. Allen, Judge.

Action by Irene Korach by L. F. Korach, her next friend, against Anna M. Loeffel. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

O. Porter Johnson and W. Blodgett Priest, both of St. Louis, for appellant. Julius T. Muench, of St. Louis, for respondent.

REYNOLDS, P. J. In this case plaintiff, after filing an original and two amended petitions, to each of which demurrers were successfully interposed on the ground that they stated no cause of action, filed her third amended petition. In this she avers that she is an infant under the age of two years, that her father has been duly appointed her next friend, has duly qualified as such, and that she brings this action by that father as her next friend. It is then averred that on a day named her father, by a verbal contract, leased certain premises in the city of St. Louis of the defendant, then the owner and in possession of them, for the purpose of residing therein with his family, including plaintiff; that afterwards Korach with his family, including plaintiff, took possession of and moved into and began the occupancy of the premises as a residence, "and plaintiff then and there became a tenant of this defendant." It is further averred that it was the duty of defendant by the terms and conditions of the verbal lease, to have the premises in a safe and proper condition for the use and occupancy of plaintiff so that plaintiff could occupy them with safety, but it is alleged that the premises were not, at the time of the renting, and for a long time prior thereto had not been, in a safe condition; that there was located in one of the rooms a large fireplace or grate, over which was a large and heavy metal plate or metal sheet covering, so adjusted and placed that plaintiff could not see or know by the exercise of ordinary care that it was insecure and improperly fastened and could not see or know that it was dangerous and unsafe and liable to give way and fall. Plaintiff avers that defendant negligently and carelessly permitted this metal sheet covering over the grate to be so placed, adjusted and maintained that at the time of the leasing it was dangerous to the occupants of the premises including plaintiff, and that defendant knew or could have known by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence that it was dangerous and unsafe; that defendant could have repaired the same and prevented the happening of the injuries complained of but that defendant negligently and carelessly permitted this grate or plate to be and remain in the unsafe and dangerous condition thereby directly causing the injuries to plaintiff of which she complains. That on a day named and while plaintiff was occupying the premises and was on the floor of the parlor or sitting room in which this grate was located and while she was within about three feet of the fireplace, the metal sheet, plate, or covering over the grate, by reason of its unsafe, insecure and dangerous condition, as before mentioned, fell from its place onto and upon plaintiff, crushing and bruising her left hand, breaking and fracturing the second and third fingers of that hand and causing plaintiff severe pain and anguish. Charging that her injuries are serious and permanent and that she has suffered great pain of body and mind, she demands judgment for $5,000.

A demurrer was filed to this petition on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was sustained and plaintiff electing to stand upon the petition and declining to plead further, judgment followed in favor of defendant, from which plaintiff has duly perfected her appeal to this court.

The error here assigned is to the action of the court in sustaining the demurrer, it being argued that this third amended petition does state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

[1] Counsel for appellant make some reference to the abandoned petitions. It is a settled rule of practice in our state that by pleading over, as was done here, those abandoned petitions disappeared from the case and are not, so far as concerns the present case, open to consideration. No pretense is made that the demurrers to the abandoned petitions were improperly sustained.

[2-4] The question here presented is on the liability of the landlord in damages to a member of the tenant's family, the tenant being in the occupancy of the whole of the premises, under a verbal lease. It will be noted that there is no charge of misrepresentation, misfeasance or concealment of fact by the landlord.

Accepted writers on the law of landlord and tenant lay it down as the rule established by the great weight of authority, that the lessee cannot assert a claim for damages against the lessor on the ground that owing to the condition of the premises at the time of the leasing, he or a member of his family suffered physical injury by reason or in consequence of the condition of the leased property at the time of the letting; that there is no implied warranty in the contract of letting that the premises are tenantable or suitable for the purposes for which they were leased, or, in the case of a dwelling house, that it is either safe or convenient, and that where the landlord has created no nuisance and is guilty of no willful wrong or fraud or culpable negligence, he is not liable for any injury suffered by any person occupying or coming upon the premises during the term of the lease. See 1 Tiffany on Landlord and Tenant, § 86, pp. 556-559; 1 McAdam on Landlord and Tenant (4th Ed.), p. 373; 2 Id. pp. 1313-1315. Our Supreme Court in Ward v. Fagin, 101 Mo. 669, 674, 14 S. W. 738, 739, has said: "Of course, if the landlord is not bound to repair unless upon a covenant so to do, it must logically follow that any injuries arising from a failure on his part to repair can give no cause of action to the tenant, whether resulting to the tenant's goods or to his person. If the landlord owes no duty to his tenant in this regard, then certainly negligence cannot be imputed to him; for negligence can only spring from unperformed duty. Cooley on Torts (2d Ed.) 791; Hallihan v. Railroad, 71 Mo. 113. * * *

And, if it be conceded, as it must (be) from the authorities, that the landlord is not bound to keep the leased premises in repair, the same principle will apply whether the tenant be lessee of the whole premises or of only a portion thereof; for what is true of the integer of non-liability must be equally true of each of its component fractions."

The averment is that "it was the duty of the defendant, by the terms and conditions of the verbal lease aforesaid, to have said premises in a safe and proper condition for the use and occupancy of plaintiff so that plaintiff could occupy said premises with safety." This can hardly be construed into an averment that there was a covenant to repair—at most it is a conclusion drawn by the pleader on the verbal contract of letting.

In Glenn v. Hill, 210 Mo. 291, loc. cit. 296, 109 S. W. 27, 28, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 699, our Supreme Court has stated the rule as follows: "There is no averment in the petition that under the contract of leasing the defendants agreed to repair, and in the absence of an agreement in the lease binding the landlord to put or keep the premises in repair, he is not liable in damages for failure to do so or for injuries sustained by the tenant by reason thereof."

The rule is very concisely stated in Robins v. Jones, 15 C. B. (N. S.) 221, loc. cit. 239, that "fraud apart, there is no law against letting a tumble-down house." The same rule is announced and fully discussed by the Kansas City Court of Appeals in Graff v. Brewing Company, 180 Mo. App. 618, 109 S. W. 1044.

In Marcheck v. Klute, 133 Mo. App. 280, loc. cit. 290, 113 S. W. 654, 658, it is said, referring to the fact that a child of plaintiff had been killed by falling through an open chute in a building in which he was playing: "Conceding plaintiff's children were licensed to play in the loft, defendants were under no duty to keep the floor safe for their use in that manner, and unless guilty of misfeasance, were not liable for an accident received by them."

This is not the case of a common passageway, the possession of which is in the landlord. In such a case "there is an implied obligation imposed by the law upon the landlord to exercise ordinary care to keep such common portion of the premises in a reasonably safe condition for such purposes as may reasonably be anticipated to be a proper use of the property for which it is let." Karp v. Barton, 164 Mo. App. 389, loc. cit. 396, 144 S. W. 1111, 1112; Marcheck v. Klute, supra, 133 Mo. App. l. c. 287, 113 S. W. 654. See, also, McGinley v. Alliance Trust Co., 168 Mo. 257, 66 S. W.

153, 56 L. R. A. 334. These are all cases in which the injured party was a member of the family of the tenant, and in which the injury was sustained from defects in those parts of the premises which were in control of the landlord.

Here the father of plaintiff, the lessee, was in possession of the whole premises, a single dwelling, and without his permission, no one, not even the landlord, could enter to make repairs. McGinley v. Alliance Trust Co., supra, 168 Mo. loc. cit. 263, 66 S. W. 153, 56 L. R. A. 334.

[5] But if it be said that the petition avers a contract to repair, and recovery can be had for damages suffered by reason of the failure to repair, it is to be observed that the contract is averred to be with the father, not with plaintiff. Conceding that the contract inures to plaintiff as a member of the family of the lessee, she certainly can have no higher right than the lessee under the contract. As to that right it is said in the Marcheck Case, supra, 133 Mo. App. l. c. 291, 113 S. W. 659: "The weight of authority is that a lessor's covenant to repair will not support an action for a personal injury due to failure to make repairs, because those injuries are deemed too remote to have been contemplated by the parties when the covenant was given," citing cases. That rule was not applied in the Marcheck Case—for reasons there given—but it does apply here. No promise is alleged to have been made by the lessor looking to special provision for guarding the children of the lessee, as was in evidence in the Marcheck Case, but a mere general promise to repair is averred.

Our conclusion upon the case is that the demurrer to the third amended petition was properly sustained. The judgment of the circuit court is affirmed.

TURNER v. GIBSON.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 60*)—MONEY SUBJECT—MONEY IN CUSTODY OF LAW.

In view of Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 8778, providing, if on the sale of property more money is received than is sufficient to pay the amount of the execution in the officer's hands, the surplus shall be paid over to defendant, the excess of the proceeds of a sale under execution, remaining in the sheriff's hands after satisfying the execution, is subject to garnishment by another creditor of the judgment debtor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 115, 116; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 58*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—PROPERTY IN LEGAL CUSTODY.

The principle underlying the rule that property in custodia legis is not subject to garnishment, etc., is to protect the jurisdiction of the court from invasion by another tribunal or officer, and not to protect the debtor's property.

Certified Question from Court of Civil Appeals of First Supreme Judicial District.

Action by B. L. Turner against N. M. Gibson. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appealed to the Court of Civil Appeals, which court certified a certain question to the Supreme Court. Question answered as stated.

Jacob C. Baldwin and Charles H. Taylor, both of Houston, for appellant. Woods & Graham, of Houston, for appellee.

BROWN, C. J. Certified question from the Court of Civil Appeals of the First Supreme Judicial District, as follows:

"In the above-styled cause, pending in this court on appeal from the county court of Harris county, the appellant seeks to subject to a writ of garnishment money in the hands of appellee, Gibson, who is sheriff of Brazoria county. This money is the excess of the proceeds of a sale by Gibson under execution of property of appellant's debtor, remaining in his hands after satisfying the writ of execution under which the property was sold. The trial court held that the money, having come into the hands of the sheriff by virtue of his office, is in custodia legis and for that reason not subject to garnishment. Upon consideration of this question at a former day of this term, this court reached the conclusion that the rule announced in Pace v. Smith, 57 Tex. 555, and in Loftus v. Williams, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 393, 59 S. W. 291, does not require a holding that the surplus in the hands of appellee is not subject to garnishment, and reversed the judgment of the court below, and rendered judgment for appellant. Appellee has filed a motion for rehearing, and being in doubt as to the correctness of our holding, and the question being of general importance, and the case not being one in which a writ of error will lie, we deem it advisable to certify for your decision the following question:

"Upon the facts stated, did the trial court err in holding that the money in the hands of the sheriff was not subject to garnishment?"

[1] We answer: The trial court erred in holding that the money in the hands of the sheriff was exempted from the writ of garnishment. The opinion of the Chief Justice of the Court of Civil Appeals in this case correctly disposes of the question of law involved, and is approved. Our Supreme Court has gone quite far on the question of protection to property from legal process in the hands of officers of the law, but no decided case by this court will sustain the action of the district court. Article 3778, Revised Civil Statutes of 1911, reads: "If, on the sale of property, more money is received than is sufficient to pay the amount of the execution or executions in the hands of the officer, the surplus shall be immediately paid over to the defendant, his agent or attorney." Clearly the surplus of the sale becomes the property of the judgment debtor, and he is entitled to receive it at once. If, however, the sheriff should have another execution in his hands against that party, he would be required by law to levy upon that surplus, and could be held responsible if he failed to do so. Hamilton v. Ward, 4 Tex. 356; Walton v. Compton, 28 Tex. 569; Mann v. Kelsey, 71 Tex. 609, 12 S. W. 43, 10 Am. St. Rep. 800. It would be peculiar logic which would hold that the sheriff must condemn the money in his possession to the payment of another execution against the same party, yet a court could not do the same by regular proceeding of garnishment.

[2] The principle which underlies the doctrine of "custodia legis" does not look to the protection of the debtor's property, but protects the jurisdiction which has attached from invasion by another tribunal or officer. There is apparent conflict in cases decided by this court; but we believe that they have distinguishing features, although they may not be reconcilable on principle. We are of opinion that the statute which requires the sheriff to immediately pay the surplus to the defendant has the effect to fix the right in him to possession of it, and, being so entitled to possession, it is subject to seizure for his debt by execution in the hands of the same officer, or by garnishment from a court. Drake on Attachments, § 251. After stating the rule which would deny the right to appropriate the surplus created by execution sale by other process, Mr. Drake, in his work on Attachments, says: "This rule, however, applies only where the sheriff is bound, virtue officii, to have the money in hand to pay to the execution sheriff, and not to cases in which he has in his possession, after satisfying the execution, a surplus of money raised by the sale of property. Such surplus is the property of the execution defendant, and, being held by the sheriff in a private, and not in his official, capacity, it may be attached in his hands." This proposition is supported by these cases: Burleson v. Milan, 56 Miss. 399; Jacquett v. Palmer, 2 Har. (Del.) 144.

We find no case in any state, where the sheriff was authorized to levy upon money in his own hands, that denies the right to garnish such funds. The distinction made in many of the cases is exceedingly technical, and, believing that our rule is just and consistent, we will adhere to it.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 719*)—ASSIGNMENT—"APPARENT ON THE FACE OF THE RECORD."

In Rev. Civ. St. 1911, arts. 1607, 1612, requiring that errors at law not "apparent on the face of the record" be presented by timely assignments of error, the phrase quoted refers to such manifest error as when removed destroys the foundation of the judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2968-2982; Dec. Dig. § 719.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 719*)—ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR—ERROR APPARENT ON THE FACE OF THE RECORD.

Where, in an action to cancel deeds conveying certain land, one defendant's one-third life estate in such land was not put in issue either by the pleadings or evidence, and such defendant joined with her husband in his claim for the entire interest of plaintiffs in the land under the deeds or the homestead laws, the refusal of the Court of Appeals to reverse or reform the judgment of the district court partitioning the land and divesting such defendant of her life estate did not present error apparent upon the face of the record, such as could be considered on writ of error in the absence of a timely assignment of error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2968-2982; Dec. Dig. § 719.*]

3. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 58*)—PLEADING—DEED OF MARRIED WOMEN.

Where, in an action to set aside deeds executed by married women, on the ground that defendant, their stepfather, had fraudulently included therein a 100-acre tract not agreed upon, and through their confidence in him had induced them to sign the deeds without reading them or discovering the fraud, the proper execution of the deeds was not questioned, it was not necessary for the petition to allege that the notary, through fraud or imposition, failed to explain the deeds to them; the rule that the notary's certificate is conclusive of the facts therein stated, unless fraud or imposition is alleged, not applying where the proper execution of the deed is admitted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 316, 317; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

4. ESTOPPEL (§ 22*)—DEEDS BY MARRIED WOMEN.

Where a married woman is imposed upon by one in whom she has confidence, and induced to sign and acknowledge a deed covering land which she has not bargained to sell, she is not estopped, in an action to set the deed aside, to allege her want of knowledge of what land was covered by the deed.

5. DEEDS (§ 203*)—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE—CERTIFICATE OF NOTARY.

In an action to set aside a deed executed by a married woman, the certificate of the notary to her acknowledgment is not competent as testimony to show that she knew what land was covered by the deed.

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Fifth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by J. C. Davis, Myrtle Davis, and others against R. V. Oar and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs was affirmed by the Court of Civil Appeals (135 S. W. 710), and defendants bring error. Affirmed.

J. P. Yates and T. D. Starnes, both of Greenville, for plaintiffs in error. Sherrill, Mulkey & Hamilton, of Greenville, for defendants in error.

DIBRELL, J. This was a suit begun in the district court of Hunt county by J. C. Davis and Myrtle and Ella Davis, joined by their husbands, Lee and J. F. Davis, against R. V. Oar and wife, M. A. Oar, to cancel so much of three deeds as conveyed a certain tract of 100 acres of land out of the Donelly survey, in Hunt county; said deeds having been executed by plaintiffs to the defendant R. V. Oar. These deeds conveyed other lands against which no relief is sought. Earl C. Davis intervened, claiming an interest in the property the subject of the litigation, and about his claim there was no controversy.

The plaintiffs J. C., Myrtle, and Ella Davis and the intervenor, Earl Davis, were the children of the defendant Mrs. M. A. Oar, and her former husband, J. A. Davis. At the time of the death of J. A. Davis, the father of plaintiffs and husband of the defendant Mrs. M. A. Oar, he held in his name four tracts of land, 100 acres in the Sallie Owen survey in Hunt county, 50 acres in the Elam survey in Hunt county, 110 acres in the John Mason survey in Hunt and Hopkins counties, and 100 acres in the Donelly survey in Hunt county. The three first tracts mentioned were the community property of J. A. Davis, deceased, and his surviving wife, Mrs. M. A. Oar. The last tract mentioned, which is the subject of this controversy, was the separate property of J. A. Davis, deceased, the father of plaintiffs and the intervenor. On November 26, 1904, J. C. Davis and Myrtle and Ella Davis, joined by their husbands, Lee and J. F. Davis, executed deeds to R. V. Oar conveying each their one-eighth interest in the three tracts of land, the community property of J. A. Davis, deceased, and his surviving wife, Mrs. M. A. Oar, and also their one-fourth interest each in the 100 acres out of the Donelly survey, that was the separate property of their deceased father, J. A. Davis. The 100 acres of land in controversy, the separate property of J. A. Davis, deceased, was located contiguous to the 100 acres out of the Sallie Owen survey, and the two tracts thus contiguous were occupied by J. A. Davis and his wife during his lifetime, and after his death by the defendants R. V. and M. A. Oar as their homestead. The defendants in 1906 moved from said lands so occupied as their homestead to Cumby, where they purchased a home, and where they were residing at the time of this suit.

Plaintiffs seek to cancel said three deeds in so far as they convey their interest in the 100 acres of land out of the Donnelly survey, but not otherwise. The ground upon which plaintiffs seek to cancel said deeds in so far as they convey their interest in the 100 acres, the separate property of their father, is that some time prior to November, 1904, the defendant R. V. Oar proposed to buy the respective interests of plaintiffs in the three tracts of land that formed a part of the community estate of their father and mother, and after some trading and agreement was reached, whereby plaintiffs agreed to sell their respective interests in said three tracts of land for the stipulated price of $550 to be paid each of them by the defendant R. V. Oar, their stepfather, aggregating the sum of $1,650. They did not agree to sell the defendant Oar any part of their interest in the 100 acres of land in controversy, and it was understood by all parties that the 100 acres in controversy, which was known as the home place, was not to be conveyed. The defendant R. V. Oar agreed to have the deeds drawn in accordance with the agreement and understanding of the parties as above indicated, and plaintiffs, having been reared by said defendant from their early childhood, reposed great confidence in their said stepfather, and did not think he would impose upon them or attempt to cheat and defraud them out of any of their property. By reason of their close relationship to the defendant R. V. Oar, and confidence in him, they did not read or have read to them the deed before its execution and delivery, and that said Oar, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiffs out of the land in controversy, embraced said 100 acres in the deed and procured a notary to take the acknowledgment, and said notary failed to explain the same to plaintiffs, or to any one of them, and plaintiffs did not know that the land in controversy was embraced in the description of the lands in the deeds. But that the defendant Oar did know that said land was included in the description of the lands in said deeds and accepted same with such knowledge. No consideration was paid by said Oar for said land, but he paid only the amount agreed upon for the three tracts they agreed to sell him, which amount was adequate compensation for plaintiffs' interest in those tracts, but grossly inadequate as a consideration for all the land embraced in the deeds. Plaintiffs did not discover that the land in controversy was included in said deed until in the year 1908, when they learned through their mother that defendant R. V. Oar was claiming the land in his own right. Soon after this discovery suit was brought to cancel the deeds in so far as they conveyed the 100 acres in question. Abandonment of the land in controversy as a homestead was alleged, and there was a prayer that the deeds "described be canceled and held for naught, in so far as they attempt to convey the interest of plaintiffs in the said 100 acres of the Donnelly survey, and that plaintiffs have judgment against R. V. Oar and M. A. Oar for their one-fourth interest each in said land, and that same be partitioned."

Defendants answered by general demurrer, special exceptions, a general denial, plea of homestead, and a community interest in said 100 acres of land to the extent of certain improvements placed thereon since their intermarriage. They pleaded specially that the deeds were executed by plaintiffs with full knowledge that they contained the 100 acres of land in controversy, and that the plaintiffs Ella and Myrtle Davis were married women, and that the notary taking their acknowledgments fully explained said deeds to them as required by law; that plaintiffs either read or had read to them said deeds; and that they are estopped from claiming the land sued for or any part thereof. The court overruled defendants' general demurrer to plaintiffs' petition, but sustained the second special exception to said petition, which exception was in substance that because the plaintiffs Myrtle and Ella Davis, being married women, conveying their separate property, had the deeds fully explained to them by the notary, as required by law, and because said petition failed to show that the certificate of the notary certifying these facts was obtained by fraud, the certificate of the notary was conclusive of the facts therein certified. This objection was met by a supplemental petition. The issues of fraud in the procurement of the deed and of homestead were submitted to the jury, which returned a verdict for plaintiffs on both issues, and judgment for plaintiffs and intervener for the land in suit, and its partition was duly entered.

[1] The first question raised in the application for writ of error is one of practice. The assignment presenting this question was not made in the court below, or in the Court of Civil Appeals, until upon motion for rehearing, and is as follows: "The Court of Civil Appeals erred in not reversing or reforming the judgment of the district court, ordering partition of the land in controversy between the plaintiffs and intervener, because the judgment divested the defendant Mrs. M. A. Oar of her one-third life estate in said land." The Court of Civil Appeals refused to consider the assignment, and that court's action, as well as that of this court here exercised, depend in a measure upon the issue whether or not the assignment presents "an error of law, apparent upon the face of the record." Such is the contention of plaintiffs in error, and upon the face of the application we were of the opinion, when the writ was granted, that such an error appeared. However, upon a more careful examination of the entire record, we have concluded that we were mistaken in our first impression.

[2] The adjudications of this court have given to the expression, "an error of law, apparent upon the face of the record," the meaning of such error as is fundamental in character or one determining a question upon which the very right of the case depends, or such an error as being readily seen lies at the base and foundation of the proceeding, and necessarily affects the judgment. Wilson v. Johnson, 94 Tex. 276, 60 S. W. 242; Houston Oil Co. of Texas v. Kimball, 103 Tex. 103, 122 S. W. 533, 124 S. W. 85. Unless the error presented for the first time in a motion for a rehearing in the Court of Civil Appeals, or in the application for writ of error in the Supreme Court for the first time, is such an error as meets the provision above quoted as its meaning has been construed to be as above stated, it will be treated as waived and cannot be considered.

In announcing the rule and construing the meaning of articles 1607 and 1612 of the Revised Statutes of 1911, being articles 1014 and 1018 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, relating to assignments of error, in the case of Wilson v. Johnson, above cited, Judge Gaines said: "Since every error must in one sense appear upon the face of the transcript, it is difficult to tell what is meant by this language, but we incline to think it intended to signify a prominent error, either fundamental in character or one determining a question upon which the very right of the case depends." One of the latest utterances upon this subject will be found in the case of the Houston Oil Co. of Texas v. Kimball, 103 Tex. 103, 122 S. W. 533, 124 S. W. 85, in which Judge Brown gives a clear and more definite construction of the meaning of these articles of the statute above referred to in the following language: "Webster defines the word, 'apparent', thus: 'clear; manifest to the understanding; plain; evident; obvious; appearing to the eye or mind.' This does not mean that an error which can be ascertained by looking into the record and considering the evidence may be considered without an assignment, for that would include every error that can be considered at all. Nothing can be considered as an error which cannot be made apparent by an examination of the record; therefore, the language of the statute must be given that construction which will make it consistent with its requirements in other respects. The language, 'apparent upon the face of the record,' indicates that it is to be seen upon looking at the face of the record—that is, the assignment itself—the fact pointed out by it must show a good and sufficient ground for the court to interfere to prevent injustice being done to one of the parties. Perhaps the best expression is that it must be a fundamental error, such error as being readily seen lies at the base and foundation of the proceeding and affects the judgment necessarily."

It is evident that the meaning of the two articles of the Revised Statutes of 1911, arts. 1607, 1612, and articles 1014 and 1018 of the Revised Statutes of 1895, when taken one in connection with the other, which must be done, is that all errors of law which are not "apparent upon the face of the record" must be presented by assignments of error distinctly specifying the grounds on which a reliance is had for a revision of such error, and a failure to make such assignment of error must be treated as a waiver thereof. It seems to us there is no more accurate and comprehensive summing up of the whole matter than is contained in the last sentence in the excerpt taken from the opinion of Judge Brown in the Houston Oil Case cited above, "that it must be a fundamental error, such error as being readily seen lies at the base and foundation of the proceeding and affects the judgment necessarily." At the risk at being thought to have added perfume to the violet or color to the rose, we suggest that the error contemplated by the provision of the law under discussion was intended such manifest error as when removed destroys the foundation of the judgment.

In the case of Pendleton v. Colville, 49 Tex. 528, a number of defendants were nonresidents, and were cited by publication, the suit being for land, and upon the day of trial an amendment was filed setting up a new cause of action and judgment was founded on the matters alleged in the amended pleading, without notice to the parties actual or constructive. In reversing that judgment the court said: "The assignment of errors fails to specify this as a ground of error, but it is one which is apparent on the record, and is so fundamental that the court will act upon it though not assigned." It is evident that the error of law there considered lay at the base and foundation of the proceeding and affected the judgment necessarily, and destroyed its foundation.

In the case of Dean v. Lyons, 47 Tex. 20, the suit was for a tract of land in the form of trespass to try title. The issue made by the pleading was whether or not one John F. Lyons had conveyed the land in question to his son John T. Lyons, through whom plaintiffs in that case claimed, "the court, however, after charging upon this issue, presenting to the jury other and different issues that were not embraced in the pleadings of the parties, and the jury found upon them, and upon their finding the court proceeded to render a further judgment that the land was bound for the support of John T. and Caroline Lyons to the extent of $175 annually each, during their respective lives, to be paid in semiannual payments to each of them; that the rental value of the land was of the value of $350; that, if the land failed to produce said amounts thus to be paid to them, the deficit should be supplied by a sale of so much of the land as might be necessary for that support." In reversing that case upon the ground of fundamental error Chief Justice Roberts said: "There was no pleading in the case designed to produce, or capable of producing, these results, nor was the evidence adduced upon the trial sufficient to establish such results, had it been offered for such purpose, which was certainly not justified by the pleading." So in that case it may be said the error of law considered by the court lay at the base and foundation of the proceeding and affected the judgment necessarily, and destroyed its foundation.

In the case of Fuqua et al. v. Pabst Brewing Co., 90 Tex. 301, 38 S. W. 29, 750, 35 L. R. A. 241, the question presented arose out of a general demurrer, which in effect challenged the validity of a contract set out in the petition, and upon which the cause of action was based. The Court of Civil Appeals considered the question in the absence of an assignment, and their right to do so was made the basis of an assignment in this court. In rendering the decision of the court in that case Judge Denman said: "We are of opinion that this objection is not well taken (1) because the general demurrer urged in the trial court necessarily raised the question of the validity of the contract sued on, it being the settled practice to disregard the reason given in an assignment and to treat the same as if such reasons had been omitted; and (2) because, if the contract be controlled by and is violative of said statute, the same is thereby declared to be void (T. & P. Coal Co. v. Lawson, 89 Tex. 394, 32 S. W. 871, 34 S. W. 919), and it was the duty of the Court of Civil Appeals, notwithstanding the absence of an assignment, to set aside the judgment rendered thereon, as its rendition was 'an error in law * * * apparent on the face of the record.'" This is another instance where the error lay at the base and foundation of the proceeding and affected the judgment necessarily and destroyed its foundation. We think no case will be found decided by this court where the assignment was presented for the first time in the appellate court and considered upon the ground of "an error of law, apparent on the face of the record," that is not based upon the ground that such error goes to the foundation of the cause of action upon which the judgment is based, and thereby destroys the validity of such judgment.

Let us determine whether the error here complained of is one that meets the requirement of the law as it has been construed by this court as above indicated. It must be conceded that neither by pleadings of the parties nor by any testimony presented in the court below was the subject of Mrs. Oar's one-third life interest in the land in controversy made an issue. She joined her husband in his claim for the entire interest of plaintiffs in the land under the deeds from plaintiffs, and, in the event that the land could not be held under said deeds, then the right in the whole tract of land was claimed by virtue of the homestead laws. Plaintiffs and intervener in their prayer for relief asked judgment against the defendants for the entire tract of land and its partition. It was thus well said by Judge Talbot in his opinion overruling the motion for rehearing: "Not having pleaded this matter, or in any way invoked the aid or action of the court below to protect the interest of Mrs. Oar in a life estate of one-third of the land, appellants cannot be heard to complain for the first time in the manner attempted here. Had an issue been made in the trial court, as to whether or not Mrs. Oar was entitled to have set apart to her, for and during her life, one-third of the land in controversy, in the event plaintiffs should recover, it might have been shown, if such was the fact, that Mrs. Oar had, by deed or otherwise, parted with her life estate in said land." If the error complained of is one of law, it neither lies at the base and foundation of plaintiffs' cause of action, nor is it such an error of law as is apparent upon the face of the record. To determine whether it be an error of law at all depends upon the issue of title made by the pleadings and the evidence adduced to sustain or deny the respective rights of the parties. In the absence of any claim on the part of Mrs. Oar in her pleadings, or in the presentation of her claim to any part of the land in controversy, other than that claimed through the deed to her husband and the right of the homestead, which claims were litigated, the court might well presume that, if she was entitled to a one-third life interest in the land, she had waived such claim. Whether this view be sound or not, there is no phase of the law under which we can treat the supposed error of law as one of a fundamental character. As suggested by Judge Talbot, if a claim had been made by Mrs. Oar to the land by virtue of inheritance, plaintiffs might have shown by reason of some conveyance or other arrangement she had parted with such interest. We therefore think the Court of Civil Appeals was right under the circumstances in refusing to consider the assignment of error.

[3] In their second, third, and fourth assignments of error in this court plaintiffs in error seek to raise the question whether or not the certificate of an officer taking the acknowledgment of a married woman to a deed conveying land, her separate property, may be impeached by an allegation and proof that such instrument was not in fact explained to her in contradiction to such certificate that it was so explained. This question was first raised in the trial court when the defendants presented a special exception to plaintiffs' petition that it was defective in not alleging that the deeds sought to be canceled were not explained to those plaintiffs who were married women, and that such failure on the part of the notary to so explain such deeds to the grantors who were married women was the result of fraud or imposition on the part of the notary. This special exception was sustained, and plaintiffs, in order to meet the objection, filed a supplemental petition in which fraud was alleged, and the question presented by plaintiffs in error is as to the sufficiency of the allegation in the supplemental petition to constitute fraud on the part of the notary.

We think it unnecessary to discuss the question as to whether or not the allegations of the supplemental petition were sufficient to constitute fraud on the part of the notary in failing to explain the deeds of conveyance to the grantors who were married women, for the reason the question may be more appropriately settled by determining whether or not the trial court committed error in the first place by sustaining the special exception that produced the necessity of the allegations in the supplemental petition to meet the views of the trial judge. If it was error to sustain the special exception to plaintiffs' petition, then it becomes immaterial that the trial court refused to sustain special exceptions to the allegations of fraud on the part of the notary as contained in the supplemental petition. It is the well-settled rule of law in this state that the certificate of the officer taking the acknowledgment of a married woman is conclusive of the facts therein stated, unless fraud or imposition is alleged. Hartley v. Frosh, 6 Tex. 208, 55 Am. Dec. 772; Brand v. Colorado Salt Co., 30 Tex. Civ. App. 458, 70 S. W. 578; Waltee v. Weaver, 57 Tex. 571; 1 Cyc. 619. But, while the rule above stated is well and definitely settled in this state, it has application only in those cases where the proper execution of the deed itself is questioned. In the case at bar the proper execution of the deeds is not questioned, or in any manner made an issue in the cause of action as stated in the pleadings first excepted to. The trial court erred in sustaining the special exception addressed to such pleading, because it failed to allege that the deeds were not explained to the grantors, who were married women, by the notary, and that such failure was the result of fraud on the part of the notary. The action was to cancel certain deeds in so far as they conveyed a certain tract of 100 acres of land that defendant Oar fraudulently had inserted in the deeds executed by plaintiffs. In no manner did this action call into question the proper execution of the deeds. That was admitted, but it was alleged that plaintiffs did not sell or agree to sell the 100 acres of land in controversy, and that plaintiffs on account of their close relationship to the defendant R. V. Oar, who was their stepfather and who, having reared them from early childhood, stood in relation to them as parent, and in whom they reposed great confidence, did not read the deeds or have them read or explained, and that said defendant took advantage of their confidence, and knowingly had the description of the land in controversy embraced in said deeds for the purpose of defrauding plaintiffs.

[4] It cannot be said that, when a married woman has thus been imposed upon, she is estopped to allege her want of knowledge of the fact that the deed embraced property she never sold or contracted to sell the grantee.

[5] In such a proceeding, the certificate of the notary is not competent as testimony to show that the grantor knew the land claimed not to have been sold was in fact embraced in the deed. That fact might be shown by the testimony of the notary himself, but his statement to one state of fact would not preclude the grantor from denying the correctness of such statement. This suit, not in any manner involving the validity of the execution of the deeds sought to be canceled, did not and could not permit the application of the doctrine that the certificate of the officer taking the acknowledgment speaks verity and is nonassailable as to the facts it certified. In the absence of allegations of fraud or imposition on the part of the notary. It follows, therefore, that the trial court erred in sustaining the special exception urged by defendants to plaintiffs' second amended original petition, and that it did not err in refusing to sustain the special exceptions urged by defendants to the first supplemental petition.

We think all other questions presented in the petition for writ of error have been properly disposed of by the Court of Civil Appeals, and there is no error in the judgment of that court.

The judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals is accordingly affirmed.

MOLLENKOPF v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 239*)—WRONGFUL SALE—PURSUING BUSINESS IN PROHIBITION TERRITORY—INTENT.

Pen. Code 1911, arts. 45, 47, provide that no act done by accident is an offense except where there has been a degree of carelessness or negligence which the law regards as criminal, but that the mistake of fact which will excuse must be such that the person so acting under a mistake would have been excusable had his conjecture as to the fact been correct, and that it must also be such a mistake as does not arise from a want of proper care on the part of the person committing the offense. Held, that mere evidence in a prosecution for engaging in the business of selling intoxicating liquors that accused did not know that the substance she sold was intoxicating was insufficient to raise the issue that she acted by accident, in the absence of further proof that she had used care to ascertain whether it was intoxicating or not before offering to sell it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 331-347; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

2. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 239*)—WRONGFUL SALE—ENGAGING IN BUSINESS—DEFENSES—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in a prosecution for engaging in the business of selling intoxicating liquor in prohibition territory, the state's witnesses testified that they bought intoxicating wine from accused, while she claimed that the beverage was grape juice made by boiling the juice of the grape, and was not intoxicating, she was entitled to an affirmative instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence that the beverage was grape juice, and would not intoxicate, or if they had a reasonable doubt of that fact, they must acquit.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 331-347; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

3. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 239*)—WRONGFUL SALE—ENGAGING IN BUSINESS—BUSINESS AND OCCUPATION.

In a prosecution for engaging in the business of selling intoxicating liquors in prohibition territory, the court charged that, to constitute the engaging in the occupation or business of selling intoxicating liquors, it was necessary to prove that accused made at least two sales of intoxicating liquor during December, 1910, and that by the term "business and occupation" was meant a calling, trade, or vocation which one engages in to make a living or obtain wealth. Held, that such instruction was misleading, in that it authorized an inference that proof of two sales in and of itself would constitute a business or occupation, and that the latter part of the charge was a definition more burdensome on the state and more favorable to accused than required by the statute creating the offense, it being only essential, to establish engaging in the business or pursuing the occupation of selling whisky, that the state prove that accused kept in her possession whisky for sale, and that she actually made two sales within the time specified in the statute.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. §§ 331-347; Dec. Dig. § 239.*]

Appeal from District Court, Eastland County; Thomas L. Blanton, Judge.

Mary Mollenkopf was convicted of pursuing the occupation of selling intoxicating liquor in prohibition territory, and she appeals. Reversed and remanded.

J. R. Stubblefield, of Eastland, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of pursuing the occupation or business of selling intoxicating liquor in prohibition territory, and her punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the state penitentiary.

Ed Houston testified: "On or about the 18th day of December, 1910, I bought some wine from Mary Mollenkopf. I pronounced that wine intoxicating. I bought about two or three gallons, paying her $2 a gallon. I drank the wine, and it intoxicated me."

C. P. Houston testified: "On or about the 20th day of December, 1910, I bought some wine from Mary Mollenkopf. I bought a gallon, and paid her $2 for it. I also bought some wine from her about December 26th, getting a gallon and paying her $2 for it. I think the wine I bought from her was intoxicating. I drank some of it. It seemed to intoxicate me to some extent. About the best I could express it, it made me dizzy."

This was all the testimony offered in behalf of the state, and, if the defendant had also rested her case, we would feel inclined to sustain her contention that the evidence would not sustain the conviction—that it did not show she was engaged in the business or occupation of selling intoxicating liquors. However, defendant herself took the stand, and on cross-examination admitted she had sold considerable quantities of the wine or grape juice as she called it, and taking her testimony, in connection with that offered by the state, the testimony would support a verdict that she was engaged in the business of selling this liquor for profit. Among other things, she testified: "Mary Mollenkopf is my name. I live seven miles south of Cisco. I was born in Germany. I am 45 years old. I have been in this country 21 years. I am now, at this time, engaged in farming. I have been farming here in Eastland county about five years. Along about December of 1910, at that time, I was engaged in picking cotton. I was farming, gathering my crop. At that time I made a living farming. I raised corn and cotton, and had a little vineyard, and I sold some grapes. At that time I had to do the farm work myself. I didn't have anybody else to do it. I picked cotton and hoed the cotton and everything. I can't do the plowing. I am too old. Along about that time, I did some of the plowing. I helped to haul off and market my cotton and things of that kind. The farming out there was my dependence for making a living. I had no other means of getting a living. I did not sell any intoxicating liquors. Ed Houston came to me along in July, and asked me if I could make him some grape juice. I told him I could make it, and that he could get it if he would come after it. I let him have it. He paid me $2 a gallon for it. Grape juice is made by heating. It is not intoxicating. When I let him have this, it was not intoxicating. I remember the Cap Houston transaction. It was the same like Mr. Ed. Cap Houston came to me and told me to make him some grape juice, so many gallons, and he came after it, and he didn't pay me for it. I didn't let him have the next one. I let him have it two times. He paid me $2 for one gallon, and the next time he came I didn't let him have it. He didn't pay me that next one. When I let him have that grape juice, it was not intoxicating, because heated juice cannot be intoxicating; that is, the heated stuff. I did not intend to violate the law in any respect. I did not intend to violate the laws of my country." Thus the issue was squarely presented whether it was wine she sold or grape juice; whether or not it was intoxicating. The state's witnesses said it was wine and would intoxicate. She said it was grape juice, and would not intoxicate.

The record being in this condition, appellant asked the court to give a number of special charges, but we do not deem it necessary to take up and discuss each of them, but rather treat the issues they seek to have presented.

[1] In the first instance appellant asked the court to instruct the jury that, even though they believe the beverage she sold was intoxicating, yet if they believed, or had a reasonable doubt of the fact, she did not know it was intoxicating, to acquit her, and cites us to articles 45 and 47 of the Penal Code, in which it is provided that "no act done by accident is an offense except where there has been a degree of carelessness or negligence which the law regards as criminal. * * * The mistake as to fact which will excuse must be such that the person so acting under a mistake would have been excusable had his conjecture as to the fact been correct; and it also must be such a mistake as does not arise from a want of proper care on the part of the person committing the offense." We do not think the evidence brings this case within the purview of the meaning of those articles of the Code. Appellant made a sale of the article she intended to sell, and the fact she states that she did not believe it would intoxicate is not in and of itself enough to suggest this issue. She knew it was an offense to sell intoxicating liquor in Eastland county, and the evidence, to raise this question, should have gone further, and shown that she had used "proper care" to ascertain whether or not it was intoxicating before offering to sell it. It should show she made proper investigation, and not merely relied on her belief in the matter. Coleman v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 402, 112 S. W. 1049, 130 Am. St. Rep. 896.

[2] The other issue raised by the special charges is one of more doubt. Appellant testified that the beverage was grape juice, was made by boiling the juice of the grape, and that it would not intoxicate. It is a matter of common knowledge that in all parts of our state there is an article of commerce sold as a beverage known as grape juice that has no intoxicating qualities. As to its ingredients, or the mode and manner of its manufacture, we have no information. The state's witnesses swore this was wine and would intoxicate. Appellant testified positively it was not wine, but grape juice, and manufactured by boiling the juice of grapes, and would not intoxicate. We are inclined to the opinion that she had a right to have this defense affirmatively presented to the jury for their determination. The court did not do so, and refused the special instructions presenting this issue. The jury should have been told that if they believed from the evidence that the beverage sold was grape juice and that it would not produce intoxication, or they had a reasonable doubt of that fact, to acquit her. The issue in the case was whether or not the beverage was intoxicating. She admitted making the sales as alleged, but contested this issue, and it should have been pertinently presented to the jury for their determination, and a failure to do so will necessitate a reversal of the case. And, as the case will be reversed on this issue, we would call attention of the court to another part of his charge whereby the jury may have been misled.

[3] In defining "business" or "occupation," the court instructed the jury: "In order to constitute the engaging in or pursuing the occupation or business of selling intoxicating liquors, within the meaning of the law, it is necessary to prove that the defendant made at least two sales of intoxicating liquor in Eastland county, Tex., during the month of December, 1910. By the term 'business' and 'occupation' is meant a calling, trade, or vocation which one engages in for the purpose of making a living or obtaining wealth." It is insisted that this charge is confusing and misleading, and the jury would infer that proof of two sales would in and of itself constitute a business or occupation. The latter part of this charge is a definition more burdensome upon the state and more favorable to defendant than required under this act of the Legislature. Fitch v. State, 127 S. W. 1046. In the Fitch Case the question is discussed at length ably, and the charge, if it thus defined "business" or "occupation," and then followed it up by an instruction that if the jury believed one engaged in the business and made two sales, etc., would not be subject to criticism. On another trial a proper definition of "occupation" or "business" should be given without reference to the number of sales it would take to constitute one engaging in the occupation, and the jury told if a person engaged in this business or occupation, and made two sales, they would be guilty. In other words, the burden is upon the state to prove, first, that the person charged with the offense is engaged in the business and occupation of selling intoxicating liquors, and this may be proven by facts or circumstances the same as proving that a person was engaged in any other character of business, and then prove, in addition to this, that two sales of intoxicating liquor had been made to persons named in the indictment. There are two facts to be proven under the law defining this offense, and that is a person is engaged in the business, and the other is that such person made two sales while engaged in such business. They may be isolated sales, if one is proven to be engaged in that business or occupation by other facts and circumstances. The law so provides. In some cases two sales, with other facts and circumstances in the case, may authorize a jury to find that a person was engaged in that business, while in another case two sales, with no other facts or circumstances in the case, may not justify such a finding. Each case must stand upon the evidence in that case. The evidence in this case would support a finding that, if the beverage sold was intoxicating, the appellant made many sales and was engaged in the business of selling it, and this instruction, although subject to criticism, would not alone present reversible error, but, inasmuch as the case will be reversed on other grounds, we call attention to it that it may be eliminated on another trial.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the other questions raised, as the opinion herein rendered will indicate the proper disposition of them.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

BROCK v. STATE

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 20, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 158*)—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—THREATS BY ACCUSED.

In a prosecution for homicide, threats by accused to kill deceased were admissible.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 763, 764*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTION—PROVINCE OF COURT AND JURY—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

Where the state, in a prosecution for homicide, introduced threats by defendant to kill deceased, his requested instruction that if such threats were made with no intention of taking the life of deceased, or were made in a jocular manner, they should not be considered in reaching the verdict, was properly refused, as invading the province of the jury as the judge of the credibility of witnesses and the weight of the evidence.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 673*)—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES—DEFENDANT'S TESTIMONY BEARING ON MOTIVE.

Where defendant's testimony, introduced without objection, tended strongly to show his motive in killing deceased, a refusal to limit such testimony to the question of his credit as a witness was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1597, 1872-1876; Dec. Dig. § 673.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1086*)—APPEAL—NECESSITY OF OBJECTION.

Alleged error in the admission of certain evidence cannot be considered, where the record does not show that it was objected to at the time of its introduction, or that there was any motion made to exclude it.

Evidence in a prosecution for homicide held sufficient to sustain a conviction.

Appeal from District Court, Travis County; George Calhoun, Judge.

Henry Brock was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Parker and Henry Faulk, both of Austin, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of murder, and his punishment assessed at death.

The facts would disclose: That appellant and deceased had been criminally intimate for a number of years. That deceased was of a jealous nature, and if appellant paid attention to other women she would become very angry. Just a short time before the killing, appellant, being away from home, wrote deceased to send him money to return on, and she did so, when they renewed their association. They spent the night before the homicide together, and were seen walking down a street or alley early in the morning. A shot was heard, and those going to the body found the woman shot in the back of the head or neck; the pistol having been held close enough to powder-burn the skin. Appellant was cut in the face, and he says deceased became angry with him and cut him; that he did not intend to kill her, but in attempting to push or drive her off the pistol was accidentally discharged. The killing took place on April 24th, and Policeman Allen says just one week before he had a talk with appellant, and appellant told him he was having a lot of trouble with deceased. Said she had telephoned his (appellant's) wife, and told her about sending him the money to come home on, and he was staying away from home on that account. That he was afraid deceased was going to his home, and said he was going to kill her. Some other threats are also testified to by witnesses. Naomi Luck says the morning before the killing appellant told her that he and deceased "were having hell all the time, and he could not get rid of the damn bitch, unless he killed her." Edgar East testified that the night before the killing he heard appellant say, "I'll kill the God damn bitch before the sun rises." Appellant denies making the threat East testified to, and says if he made the threats testified to by Mr. Allen and Naomi Luck he was drunk, and had no intention of carrying them out; that he and the woman often quarreled, would make up, and it was nothing unusual for people in that strata of society to speak harshly and abusively of one another, and no one took it seriously.

[1, 2] Appellant requested the court to instruct the jury: "Gentlemen of the jury, you are instructed that if you find from the evidence that defendant made threats against the deceased, but that same were made with no intention of taking the life of deceased, or were made in a jocular manner with no purpose of execution, you are instructed not to consider same against defendant in arriving at your verdict." This testimony was admissible in evidence; and, while it was permissible for appellant's counsel to argue to the jury that they should give the remarks but little weight, and doubtless counsel did do so, yet it would have been improper for the court to so have instructed the jury. Under our law the jury is the judge of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight to be given testimony. Under the state's contention the threats were seriously made; and it would have been just as permissible for the court to have told the jury, if they believed they were seriously made, to give weight to them, as for him to tell them, if not seriously made, to not consider the threats. Kirk v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 224, 32 S. W. 1045, and cases cited in section 809, White's Ann. Procedure.

[3] All testimony of intimacy between appellant and deceased was introduced without objection, and it tended strongly to prove the motive of appellant in killing deceased, if he did so intentionally; and the court did not err in failing to limit such testimony to affecting the credit of defendant as a witness.

[4] The grounds in the motion complaining of the admissibility of certain testimony cannot be considered, as the record before us does not disclose that it was objected to at the time of its introduction; nor was there any motion made to exclude it.

[5] After a careful review of the entire record, we are of the opinion that the evidence supports the verdict of the jury, and they were authorized under it to conclude that it was a willful, intentional killing. The point of entrance of the bullet and its range do not give support to the accidental theory.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. JURY (§ 29*)—RIGHT OF TRIAL BY JURY—WAIVER—CRIMINAL CASES.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—NECESSITY OF EXCEPTIONS.

Unless defendants, in a misdemeanor case, take a bill of exceptions to the admission of evidence, and so preserve the point, the question of its admissibility cannot be held reversible error on appeal.

5. ADULTERY (§ 11*)—TRIAL—EVIDENCE—IDENTITY OF PARTIES.

In a prosecution for adultery, where the state necessarily depended somewhat upon circumstantial evidence, evidence tending to show that persons seen by witness under circumstances indicating the offense were the defendants was admissible as a circumstance bearing upon the identity of the parties.

Appeal from Taylor County Court; Thomas A. Bledsoe, Judge.

J. P. Mackey and Minnie Grice were convicted of adultery, and they appeal. Affirmed.

M. W. Shelley, Jr., of Abilene, for appellants. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellants were jointly indicted for adultery. They were tried together jointly, and in the trial represented by the same attorney. Each was convicted, Mackey fined $325 and Grice $100.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

They both appealed, each entering into a recognizance separately.

[1, 2] The record shows that in the organization of the jury, when both sides got through with their challenges, only five jurors were left. Thereupon both sides agreed in open court, both appellants being present, to try the case before a jury of five, which was done. No objection was made by the appellants, or either of them, by their attorney, or any other way, pending the trial. After the verdict of conviction, on motion for new trial, for the first time appellants claim that the case was tried before a jury of five men only, instead of six, and that they personally did not agree to this at the time. The verdict, as rendered, was signed by one man as foreman, and not by the other four. We think the record clearly shows that each of the appellants did agree to try the case before a jury of five men; but, whether they did or not, they knew all the time during the trial and until after its conclusion that they were being tried by a jury of five men, and made no objection thereto. The charge against them was a misdemeanor. Our statute provides that an appellant in a misdemeanor case can waive a jury altogether. This would carry with it the further right to agree to a trial by a jury composed of less than six men. Stell v. State, 14 Tex. App. 59. And it was too late for appellants to make said objection to wait till after the verdict of the jury before making any complaint. West v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 597, 114 S. W. 142; Munson v. State, 34 Tex. Cr. R. 498, 31 S. W. 357; C. C. P. art. 938.

[3] The verdict of the jury does not have to be signed by the foreman or any other or others of the jury, even in a felony case. Petty v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 586, 129 S. W. 615.

[4] By several bills appellants complain that the court admitted certain admissions and statements by each of the parties when the other was not present, and complain that the court did not charge that such testimony should be considered only against the one so making such statements or admissions, and omitted to charge that it should not be considered against the other. As the evidence on the trial of both persons was clearly admissible in the case, it was the duty of the respective appellants, if they desired it, to request written charges limiting the consideration of such evidence to the party making such statement or admission. And, if such charge were refused, it was his duty to take a bill of exceptions thereto, and thus preserve his point. It is only when such course is pursued that this court can consider any such question on appeal in a misdemeanor case. This clearly not having been done does not present reversible error. This has always been the established law of this state, and decided so many times that it is unnecessary to collate or cite the authorities; but see Giles v. State, 148 S. W. 320; Perkins v. State, 144 S. W. 244; Golden v. State, 146 S. W. 946; Luttrall v. State, 142 S. W. 589; Melear v. State, 145 S. W. 354. This applies also to appellants' complaint of the refusal of the court to give their special charge.

[5] The state, being under the necessity of securing a conviction somewhat upon circumstantial evidence, and the court having given a correct charge on that subject, did not commit any error in admitting the testimony of Tom Newman as complained by appellant, as his testimony was admissible as a circumstance, among others, tending to show that the parties he saw were the appellants, and under such circumstances as clearly showed they had sexual intercourse on that occasion. Neither did the court err in permitting the witness Horace Holt, a boy 13 years of age, to testify, as the bill does not show that he was incompetent so to do. Neither does the bill to the objection of the testimony of the deputy sheriff show any error. Nor that of the sheriff to the fact that appellant Minnie Grice told him that she was 15 years old.

We have considered all of appellants' assignments and none of them show any reversible error.

The only other question raised is appellants' contention that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict. We have carefully read the statement of facts, and in our opinion the evidence was sufficient to authorize the jury to convict the appellants. It shows such a state of fact extending over such a period of time sufficient to convince the jury, as it did, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the sexual intercourse between the appellants was habitual. She was an unmarried girl 15 years old. Appellant Mackey was a married man. It is unnecessary to detail the evidence.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Appellant in his motion for rehearing complains that we did not consider nor pass upon his bill of exception, wherein he objected to the county attorney testifying to what Minnie Grice, one of the appellants, testified before the grand jury, claiming that what was testified before the grand jury was secret and could not be disclosed, and refers us only to the case of Gutgesell v. State, 43 S. W. 1016.

He is mistaken in claiming that we did not consider nor pass on this question. We stated in the opinion: "We have considered all of appellant's assignments, and none of them show any reversible error." The Gutgesell Case, referred to and relied upon by appellant, has been so many times expressly overruled, and conceded to be by so many decisions, we thought it altogether unnecessary to say anything specially about his bill. The question has been so thoroughly considered and the authorities collated in several cases, and decided against appellant, we deem it unnecessary to again discuss the question. Wisdom v. State, 42 Tex. Cr. R. 584, 61 S. W. 926; Grimsinger v. State, 44 Tex. Cr. R. 18, 23, 29, 69 S. W. 553; Wooley v. State, 64 S. W. 1055; Pierce v. State, 54 Tex. Cr. R. 425, 113 S. W. 148; Giles v. State, 43 Tex. Cr. R. 563, 67 S. W. 411; *Smith v. WILSON v. STATE.

WEAPONS (§ 11*)—CARRYING WEAPONS—JUSTIFICATION.

Accused who had won at gaming, and who was then robbed and made to give the money back to the loser, and who knew that a police office was within calling distance or within as easy reach as his own arms, was not justified in going 700 yards to his residence returning with a pistol and himself attempting to arrest the robber, and was guilty of unlawfully carrying a pistol.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Weapons, Cent. Dig. §§ 10-14; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

Appeal from San Augustine County Court; W. C. Ramsey, Judge.

Jeff Wilson was convicted of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Foster & Davis, of San Augustine, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. In this case the undisputed testimony shows that appellant and one Will Woods engaged in gambling in a barn about 700 yards from appellant's residence; that appellant won the money of Woods, when Woods took a scantling, and compelled appellant to give him back his money; that appellant then left the barn, went to his home, armed himself with a pistol, and returned to the barn. Woods having left the barn, appellant pursued him, and shot at him with a pistol. He was convicted of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $100.

Appellant offered to testify that he went to his home to get a pistol to arrest Woods, and turn him over to the officers for robbing him, as he claimed, and whether or not this testimony was admissible presents the sole question in the case; for, if the testimony was admissible, then the special charge should have been given. If the court did not err in excluding the testimony, then no error is assigned which would present reversible error. The testimony shows that the transaction took place in the town of San Augustine; that, when appellant fired at Woods, an officer immediately appeared on the scene. Then the question presented is:

Even if Woods robbed appellant, and he, knowing that an officer of the law was in immediate reach, was he authorized to go 700 yards to his residence, secure a pistol, return the same distance, and himself attempt to make the arrest? Each case of this kind must be decided from the facts in that case, and the evidence convincing us that appellant knew that an officer of the law could be reached at once, he was not authorized to go to his home, secure a weapon, and himself undertake to make the arrest. Of course, the state's testimony would raise the issue that appellant had not such purpose and object, but we are not passing on that question, but solely upon the question that when an officer of the law is in calling distance, or is in as easy reach as the arms of appellant, is he authorized to go after his arms and make the arrest, or should he go to an officer? Under such circumstances, we think it the duty of one to appeal to the officers of the law, and not himself take the law into his own hands, and, having reached this conclusion, the judgment is affirmed. The law aids no one in a gambling transaction.

The judgment is affirmed.

CRAIG v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Oct. 16, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166½*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICE—RULINGS ON JURORS.

At the commencement of the trial of accused for perjury, his counsel asked the jurors whether they heard comments of the court, before the case was called for trial, with reference to perjury while sentencing another person convicted of a different crime. A number of the jurors, having answered in the affirmative, also stated, in answer to a question of the district attorney, that the court's remarks would have no effect on them in giving defendant a fair trial. The court overruled defendant's objection to the jurors, and he was required, after exhausting his peremptory challenges, to accept three of them as members of the jury. Held that, no prejudice having been shown, such facts were insufficient to constitute reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3114-3125; Dec. Dig. § 1166½.*]

Appeal from District Court, Hunt County; R. L. Porter, Judge.

Dabney Craig was convicted of perjury, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. D. Stinson and Evans & Carpenter, all of Greenville, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was convicted of perjury and given the lowest penalty—two years in the penitentiary.

This is a companion case to that of Moore v. State, 144 S. W. 598. That case and this all grew out of the same transaction, at the same time, between the same parties. Practically the only difference between the two is that one is a charge against Moore and the other against appellant. Every question that is raised, or attempted to be raised, in this case, was substantially raised, or attempted to be raised, in said Moore Case, supra, except one which will hereafter be noticed. Therefore, instead of taking up the several questions and again discussing or deciding them, we refer to the said Moore Case, supra.

The only question that is raised in this case which was not raised in the Moore Case is this: By appellant's bill No. 1 it is shown that, after both parties announced ready and they were engaged in questioning the jurors of the panel for the week, the appellant asked them this question: "Were you present in court on the day that the court was sentencing a young man, who had been convicted of breaking a house to steal whisky, this week, and heard the court make the following remarks: 'Young men very often engage in violations of law, and then go before the grand jury and swear falsely about it. When a man has no regard for his honor and oath, he is mighty near a lost proposition, and that worries me to see young man after young man go before the grand jury and perjure himself.'" To which question the jurors, 18 in number, whose names are given, answered that they were present and remembered hearing said remarks of the court. The district attorney then asked them: "Would said remarks of the court affect you in passing on this case, or can you give the defendant a fair and impartial trial, as if you had never heard said remarks?" To which question each of the jurors answered that such remarks would not affect him, and that they would give the defendant a fair trial. The defendant objected to the qualification of each of these jurors on account of the above and moved the court to excuse them from the panel and not require him to exhaust his peremptory challenges. The court overruled this, and the defendant then challenged peremptorily only three of these jurors, leaving him but seven peremptory challenges remaining, which he was compelled to and did exhaust on talesmen summoned and tendered him on said panel, and that there was thus left on said panel three of the said eighteen, naming them, who were impaneled and served as jurors in the trial of the case. The court qualified this bill by stating this: "The remarks complained of in the bill are fragments of a talk I gave a young man 2 or 3 days before this case was called, in passing sentence upon him for breaking a house to steal whisky. The talk I made the young man had no reference whatever to this case or any other case on the docket, and was made for the purpose of admonishing him, when he served out his time, to shun bad habits and company, such as gambling and whisky drinking, and to try to make a useful and honorable citizen. Each of the jurors on the panel stated very positively that said remarks would have no effect or bearing whatever upon them in passing upon the guilt or innocence of this defendant, and that they could and would try the case as though they had not heard the remarks. I felt satisfied at the time that said jurors would not be influenced by said remarks, and I still believe that they were not. Understanding the matter as I do, I cannot see how counsel could seriously insist upon this bill."

This bill does not show, or attempt to show, that appellant was in any way injured by having to take as jurors the said three who heard said remarks of the court. Clearly they are not shown to in any way be disqualified to serve, but, on the contrary, so far as this bill shows, they were each qualified to serve. The court did not err in refusing to sustain appellant's objections to said jurors.

The evidence in every way clearly and unquestionably showed the guilt of appellant, and the charge of the court correctly and aptly submits every question necessary or proper to be submitted under the law and evidence.

The judgment will be affirmed.

HOGUE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 6, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1144*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES—PRESUMPTIONS.

The court, on reviewing the denial of an application for a continuance on the ground of the absence of witnesses, must, in the absence of a contrary showing, presume that accused was arrested on the day the indictment was returned, and cause transferred to the county court, or within a day or two thereafter, so that, to show diligence, accused must show that he procured process for his witnesses at once, or at least within a very few days, requiring them to attend court at the next term.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2736-2781, 2801, 3016-3037; Dec. Dig. § 1144.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 598*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF WITNESSES—PRESUMPTIONS.

Where accused was indicted in the criminal district court of a county on March 30th, and the cause was transferred on the same day to the county court, the next term of which began on May 6th, accused was not entitled to a continuance on the ground of the absence of witnesses, where no process was procured, and none placed in the proper officer's hands until May 10th, returnable on May 17th, the day the cause was set for trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1335-1341; Dec. Dig. § 598.*]

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—VERDIOT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The jury are the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses and the weight of their testimony, and the court on appeal will consider only whether the evidence is sufficient as a matter of law if believed to sustain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074-3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

4. DISORDERLY HOUSE (§ 17*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to support a conviction for keeping a disorderly house.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Disorderly House, Cent. Dig. §§ 26-29; Dec. Dig. § 17.*]

Appeal from Dallas County Court, at Law; W. F. Whitehurst, Judge.

Nannie Dee Hogue was convicted of crime, and she appeals. Affirmed.

Currie McCutcheon, of Dallas, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was indicted for unlawfully keeping, and being concerned in keeping, a certain house in Dallas county as a house where prostitutes were permitted to resort and reside for the purpose of plying their vocation, and as a house kept for the purpose of prostitution. She was found guilty, and her punishment assessed at a fine of $200 and 20 days in jail.

Appellant, by his brief, presents but two questions: First, that the court erred in overruling his motion for continuance; and, second, the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. There are some other bills of exceptions in the record which are not presented by appellant, but which we have considered and find that they present no error. We will therefore discuss only the said two questions presented.

The record shows that the appellant was duly indicted by the grand jury of Dallas county on March 30, 1912, and the case properly transferred from the criminal district court of Dallas county to the county court at law and filed in said county court on the same day.

[1] It further shows that the term at which appellant was tried began on May 6, 1912, and ended June 29, 1912. The application for continuance not showing otherwise, under the law, we must presume that the appellant was arrested at once, either on March 30, 1912, or within a day or two thereafter. In order to show diligence, the appellant must have procured process for her witnesses at once, or, at least, within a very few days, requiring them to attend court at its next sitting on May 6, 1912, but this was not done.

[2] Doubtless, if it had been done, as the claimed absent witnesses were both alleged and shown to be residents of the city of Dallas where the court was held, they could have been found within the five weeks from the arrest of the appellant before the court convened. Instead of doing this, no process whatever for them was procured and none placed in the proper officer's hands until May 10, 1912, returnable on the 17th day of May, the day the case was set for trial. So that we hold, under the authorities, that no diligence is shown. Giles v. State, 148 S. W. 317, and cases therein cited; Walker v. State, 13 Tex. App. 618, 44 Am. Rep. 716, note; Massie v. State, 30 Tex. App. 67, 16 S. W. 770; Long v. State, 17 Tex. App. 129; Skipworth v. State, 8 Tex. App. 139.

[3] There was amply sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to have authorized them to acquit the appellant. The law makes them the exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and the weight to be given to their testimony. This court cannot take that question from them. Therefore, when this court is called upon to determine whether or not the evidence is sufficient to authorize the conviction, this court should properly consider only the question of whether the evidence was sufficient as a matter of law, if believed by the jury, to sustain the conviction, not upon the whole testimony of whether or not this court would have found a different verdict from that of the jury.

[4] It is unnecessary to state all of the evidence, and, of course, unnecessary to state any of that of the appellant which the jury had the right to disbelieve and give no credence to if in their judgment and opinion they ought not. The evidence conclusively shows that the appellant was in charge as tenant of the hotel which it is claimed was used by her for the purpose charged in the indictment and at the time charged therein. Two witnesses on the police force of the city of Dallas testified that the hotel run by appellant at the time charged in the indictment had the reputation of being a place where prostitutes were permitted to resort and reside for the purpose of plying their vocation. Each of them also testified that they had visited the place repeatedly along about the time charged in the indictment and shortly prior thereto, and that appellant was present each time in charge of the house; that on one occasion about March 2, 1912, they saw that two women had registered there; that they at once went up to the room assigned to these women, were invited in by them, and the women proposed to have sexual intercourse with them for the price of $10; that they declined this proposition, and at once informed the appellant, and she thereupon required these women to leave her house. Both of these women were shown to have been common prostitutes and went direct from the appellant's house to a house of prostitution, and remained therein as such up to the time of this trial some two months and a half later. Both of these women testified on this trial substantially as the said policemen had testified. They claim, and so did appellant, that they reached Dallas and went to this hotel from the train with their grips, modestly attired. One of them testified she did not know whether they could have gotten a room in said hotel for the purpose of having intercourse with these men or not. On another occasion one of these officers went into this hotel about 3 o'clock in the morning, went to one of the rooms, and found a man in bed with Mattie Nichols, whom he testified was a common prostitute, and another woman named Lula Washington, whom he testified was a common prostitute, in another bed with another man. The exact time when this occurred is not shown, but we take it from the whole of the circumstances detailed by the witnesses that it was along about the same time charged in the indictment. The two men who were caught in bed with these two women as testified by the police officer also testified and confirmed the testimony of the police officer. They claim, however, that appellant knew nothing of this, and they thought she would not have permitted it if she had known it.

It was further clearly shown that the woman, Mattie Nichols, was an employé in appellant's house, and had been continuously for some time, and that Lula Washington had a room therein for some time; her husband being a night employé at another and different hotel.

Another officer, a deputy sheriff of Dallas county, testified that on one occasion he visited this hotel, and while there saw Mattie Nichols therein, that he had known her for 35 years, and she had a bad reputation for chastity. Another very significant fact and one doubtless of considerable weight with the jury was testified to by appellant herself, and that is that said Mattie Nichols' name appeared on the register of her hotel each day, the register showing "pd" after her name which was her custom in keeping the register, and once her name so appeared twice the same date.

We think the evidence was ample sufficient to sustain the verdict.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

ALEXANDER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 380*) — CREDIBILITY — IMPEACHING OWN WITNESS.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 815, which modifies the rule forbidding a party to attack his own witness' testimony, by permitting such attack when facts and testimony are injurious to his cause, but not by impeaching his character, the prosecuting attorney, after a witness for defendant, on trial for murder, had testified that deceased had an open knife in his hand, and had said that he was going to kill some one thereabouts that night, and after asking the witness on cross-examination what defendant was doing and saying, without eliciting desired responses, was entitled to ask a witness if he did not testify to a certain state of facts before the grand jury, and upon his denial to prove by a witness that he had so stated before the grand jury, since the witness, even if considered as a state's witness, had testified injuriously.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*) — APPEAL — NECESSITY OF BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where no bills of exceptions are reserved, matters complaining of the admission of certain testimony cannot be considered.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 340*) — APPEAL — HARMLESS ERROR—ISSUES AND EVIDENCE.

Where the court submitted the issue of manslaughter, and the jury convicted defendant of that offense only, error, if any, in failing to submit that issue, in conformity with the evidence, was harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1129*) — APPEAL — SUFFICIENCY OF ASSIGNMENT OF ERROR.

An assignment of error, on the ground that "the court erred in his charge to the jury in defining manslaughter," is too general to require attention.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2954-2964; Dec. Dig. § 1129.*]

Appeal from District Court, Collin County; J. M. Pearson, Judge.

Clarence Alexander was convicted of manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was indicted, charged with murder, and, when tried was convicted of manslaughter. There was no error in overruling the application for a continuance, as it was wholly lacking in diligence.

[1] The defendant placed upon the witness stand one Joe Nichols, and proved by him that deceased had an open knife in his hand and said "he was going to kill some son of a bitch on Eleven Row to-night." On cross-examination the state asked him what defendant was doing and saying at that time, and, not eliciting desired responses, asked him if he did not testify to a certain state of facts before the grand jury, and, when he denied doing so, proved by a witness that he had so stated when testifying before the grand jury. The defendant objected, on the ground that, when the state inquired of the witness about matters not drawn out by him, the state made the witness its witness, and should not be allowed to impeach him. Article 815 of the Code of Criminal Procedure provides that "the rule that a party introducing a witness shall not attack his testimony is so far modified as that any party, when facts stated by the witness are injurious to his cause, may attack his testimony in any other manner, except by proving the bad character of the witness." See, also, Erwin v. State, 32 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 24 S. W. 904, and cases there cited. The answers of the witness to the questions propounded were of an injurious nature, and, if it should be held he became the state's witness on this phase of the case, this would present no error. We hardly think the witness became a state's witness, however. He had testified for the defendant in regard to the origin of the difficulty, and the state was only cross-examining on this phase of the case.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[2] Those grounds in the motion complaining of the action of the court in admitting certain testimony, to which no bills of exception were reserved, cannot be considered by us.

[3, 4] The court submitted the issue of manslaughter, and the jury convicted appellant of that offense only; consequently it could not be said, if the court failed to submit that issue in conformity with the evidence, any injury resulted to appellant, and in the motion it is not assigned in a way we could consider it—the ground reading: "The court erred in his charge to the jury in defining manslaughter." This is too general to call our attention to any error in the charge, if error there be. However, we will add that the court's charge was a fair submission of that issue.

The judgment is affirmed.

STANTON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 595*)—CONTINUANCE—GROUNDS—ABSENCE OF WITNESS.

Accused went to the house where his wife was working to induce her to return to him. This she declined to do, whereupon he secured a hatchet and struck her several blows on the head with it, from which she did not recover for considerable time. There was nothing said at the time that would indicate that he intended to attack her, or concerning her alleged unfaithfulness to him. Held, that the denial of accused's application for a continuance because of an absent witness, who would testify to the wife's unfaithfulness, but whose testimony was unknown to accused until the morning the application was filed, was not error.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 257*)—"DANGEROUS WEAPON"—HATCHET.

Where accused struck his wife several times on the head with a hatchet, causing wounds from which she did not recover for considerable time, and a physician testified that the wounds were all serious, and that the hatchet in the hands of a strong man like accused was a weapon with which a person could be killed, it was sufficiently shown to be a "dangerous weapon."

3. HOMICIDE (§ 257*)—ASSAULT TO KILL—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of assault with intent to murder.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 543-552; Dec. Dig. § 257.*]

Appeal from District Court, Kaufman County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

Floyd Stanton was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Woods & Morrow, of Kaufman, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of an assault with intent to murder his wife.

[1] When the case was called for trial, he applied for a continuance on account of the absence of Marcia Stanton. The facts alleged to have been known by the absent witness were unknown to appellant until the morning the application was filed. At this time he had been in jail about a month and had no opportunity to communicate with his friends on the outside to ascertain the materiality of the witness named above; that if the absent witness was present he would swear that his (appellant's) wife had been untrue to him, and that in his absence from home when at work she was seen to receive other male persons at his (appellant's) home; that the difficulty between his wife and himself grew out of the fact that she had been untrue to him as a wife, receiving other male persons, etc. This application was overruled, and a bill of exceptions taken. On the trial of the case it developed that appellant had become jealous of his wife on account of another negro at Terrell, where the difficulty occurred. Prior to the time of the attack he made on his wife, he and his wife and her sister were in a store where another negro was clerking, and his wife did not introduce him to the negro to whom she spoke and with whom she had some conversation. When they were leaving the store, he (appellant) reminded her of that fact, and she then proposed to take him back and introduce him to the other negro. This, however, was finally declined, and they went away. Subsequently, appellant went to the house of a Mr. Franks, where his wife was employed as cook, and, after spending the morning with her, knocked her down by striking her on the back of the head with a hatchet, and after she was down he repeated these licks several times, inflicting serious wounds. On the trial of the case the evidence disclosed, substantially, that appellant went to the house of Mr. Franks, where his wife was employed as servant and cook, spent the morning with her, trying to induce her to return and live with him. This she declined to do. Under the state's case, appellant, without any warning so far as his wife was concerned, secured a hatchet weighing about a pound and a quarter to a pound and a half, from a little gallery on the outside of the kitchen, came in the kitchen where his wife was, and while the white family were at dinner, his wife being en route from the kitchen into the dining room, he struck her on the back of the head with the hatchet. She fell from the force of the blow, in the dining room near where Mrs. Franks was sitting. Appellant continued to strike her on the back or side of the head several blows. He then ran away and was finally captured. There seems to have been nothing said at the time that would indicate that he intended to attack her, nor was anything said about her intimacy with anybody other than her husband, unless it was in reference to the negro mentioned above found at the store in Terrell. We are of opinion, in the light of these facts, that the court did not err in refusing a continuance. The testimony, as stated in the application, was unknown to defendant, and did not, therefore, enter into the case.

[2] One other question worthy of notice is appellant's contention that the evidence is not sufficient to support the conviction, and under the circumstances the conviction should not have been for a higher offense than aggravated assault. Appellant made a statement, which was introduced in evidence against him, which may be termed a "confession," in which he admits striking his wife, but said at the time he had no intent to kill her. The evidence shows, as above stated, that he struck her several times. The witnesses vary, some of them stating that he struck her as many as six times with the hatchet, and the blows were all confined except one to the head. The doctor stated there was a bruise or wound on one of her wrists. The doctor testified the wounds were all serious, and that either from the force of the blow or falling on the floor she bled freely from the ears, which perhaps saved her life. This blood was from the inside of the head and came out through the ears. The evidence does not show definitely the weapon was a deadly one, but the doctor and Mr. Franks testified that it was one with which a person could be killed, especially in the hands of a strong vigorous man like the defendant.

[3] There is enough, we think, in the record from which the jury could infer and conclude that appellant made an assault with intent to kill. The witnesses testified the instrument was an ordinary hatchet, and Mr. Franks stated it would weigh from a pound and a quarter to a pound and a half and was made of iron or steel. Appellant's wife was confined to her bed for quite a length of time. The sharp issue and appellant's contention from this viewpoint is whether it was done with intent to murder or only to make a serious assault. The court submitted the issue closely and sharply as between the two grades of the offense, and the appellant requested special instructions on the same point, and these were given. We are of opinion that there is enough evidence to authorize the jury to reach the conclusion that the assault was made with intent to kill, and that there is evidence enough for the jury to infer that the weapon as used, and under the circumstances of the case, was used as a deadly weapon, and that it was used under the circumstances as a deadly weapon. Witnesses testified that a party could be killed with the instrument in the hands of a man like the defendant, and that he made a vicious assault upon her is unquestioned, knocking her down and striking her several times with it after she was down, and each time on the back or side of the head. Sometimes these questions are close; but the facts are sufficient in this case, we think, to justify the conclusion of the jury that the assault was made for the purpose and with the intent to kill. They could have solved the question the other way and given appellant only the punishment of aggravated assault; but, under the facts developed, we are of opinion this court would not be justified or authorized to interfere and hold that the evidence was not sufficient.

Therefore we think the judgment ought to be affirmed, and it is, accordingly, so ordered.

HOBBS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.

1. HOMICIDE (§ 96*)—DEFENSE OF ATTACK—SHOOTING THIRD PERSON—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where accused accidentally shot his wife as he was defending himself against another, who was in his wife's company, he was entitled to defend on the ground of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 124-127; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 89*)—SHOOTING THIRD PERSON—SUDDEN PASSION—AGGRAVATED ASSAULT.

Where accused was seized with sudden passion on seeing his wife caressed by another, and shot at him, but struck his wife, he would be guilty of no higher offense than aggravated assault; the insult to the wife being adequate cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 115-118; Dec. Dig. § 89.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 310*)—ADEQUATE CAUSE—INSULT TO WIFE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused's theory was that he shot his wife, intending to shoot another, whom he discovered caressing her, such insult to her being a statutory adequate cause, accused was entitled to an affirmative charge that if the shooting occurred on account of this conduct of the person at whom he shot toward his wife, and the passion was thus engendered, he would be guilty of no greater offense than manslaughter, had death occurred, and, death not having resulted, his offense could not be greater than aggravated assault.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 657-661; Dec. Dig. § 310.*]

Appeal from District Court, Galveston County; Clay S. Briggs, Judge.

Frank Hobbs was convicted of assault with intent to murder, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. C. Turnley, of Galveston, for appellant.
C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of assault with intent to murder; his punishment being assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The evidence, briefly stated, will disclose that appellant was jealous of a man named Prince Helm; that his wife and a sister of Helm left appellant's residence to go to a certain point in the city of Galveston; that later he followed them, and, overtaking them further down the street, he found his wife and the woman Helm and Prince Helm walking along the street together, Prince Helm holding the hand of his wife while so walking. Enraged by this, he made an assault upon Prince Helm and shot at him, and in shooting at Helm struck his wife.

The court charged the jury on this theory of the case that, if they were satisfied the defendant did assault his wife with intent then and there to kill and murder her by the means charged in the indictment, and if further satisfied by the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the assault was not made under the immediate influence of sudden passion, etc., that they would find him guilty of an assault with intent to murder, stating the punishment; or if they were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant did assault Prince Helm with intent then and there to kill and murder him, by means charged in the indictment, and they were further satisfied by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the assault was not made under the immediate influence of sudden passion, etc., and if they were further satisfied that, in the act of preparing for or executing the same, the defendant through accident shot his wife, and that the assault, if any, upon his wife, if voluntarily done, that it would then be an assault to murder his wife, and they would find him guilty of an assault to murder.

The court then charged the jury, if they should not so believe that the assault, if any, upon his wife, if voluntarily done, would constitute assault with intent to murder, or have a reasonable doubt thereof, but believed beyond a reasonable doubt that such assault upon his wife would constitute aggravated assault as hereinafter defined, they would find him guilty of aggravated assault. The court then charged the jury, if they had a doubt as to the degree, whether he was guilty of aggravated assault or assault with intent to murder, to give him the benefit of that doubt. Then a charge was given submitting the issue of aggravated assault in a general way.

The jury was then charged that "any condition or circumstance capable of creating and which does create sudden passion, such as anger, rage, sudden resentment, or terror, rendering the mind for the time incapable of cool reflection, whether accompanied by bodily pain or not, may be adequate cause; and whether such adequate cause existed for such sudden passion, if any there was, it is for you to determine, and in determining this question, as well as all other matters before you, you will consider all the facts and circumstances in evidence in this case."

The court then charged the jury upon the issue of self-defense, upon the theory, if from the acts of the said Prince Helm, or from his words coupled with his acts, there was created in the mind of the defendant a reasonable apprehension that he was in danger of losing his life or of suffering serious bodily injury at the hands of said Prince Helm, then the defendant had the right to defend himself from such danger or apparent danger; and it is not necessary to the right of self-defense that the danger should in fact exist, but if it reasonably appeared to the defendant at the time, viewed from his standpoint at the time of the shooting, that such danger existed, he would have the same right to defend against it that he would have were the danger real.

The court then submitted this issue to the jury: "If you believe that the defendant committed an assault upon Prince Helm as a means of defense, believing at the time he did so (if he did do so) that he was in danger of losing his life or of serious bodily injury at the hands of said Prince Helm, and that in so acting the defendant accidentally shot the said Ida Hobbs, or if you have a reasonable doubt thereof, then you will acquit the defendant."

They found him guilty, and sent him to the penitentiary for assault to murder.

[1] It will be observed that the court submitted the right of self-defense against Prince Helm, and if he accidentally shot his wife they would find him not guilty. We understand the law to be that if he was defending himself against an attack of Prince Helm, and the testimony suggests the theory, and in shooting at Helm he shot his wife, that it would be a case of self-defense.

[2] We also further understand the law to be that if, in shooting at Helm under the immediate influence of sudden passion, he shot his wife, he could be guilty of no higher offense than aggravated assault. If Helm had insulted his wife, or was in such position with her as the law considers it adequate cause, and he shot at Helm under sudden passion produced by the cause, then, if he shot Helm, he could not be guilty of any higher offense than aggravated assault, death not resulting. He therefore could not be guilty of any higher offense in shooting his wife than he would be guilty of in shooting Helm. It is objected to the charge that this theory was not presented to the jury by the charge. It should have been given. Appellant could be guilty of no higher offense in shooting his wife under the circumstances than he would in shooting at Helm, if the jury should find that the shot received by his wife was intended for Prince Helm.

[3] Another exception is urged to the charge in this: That the court charged the jury, as stated above, in a general way, that any circumstance or set of circumstances that would produce adequate cause would be sufficient to reduce the homicide, had a killing occurred, to manslaughter; the sudden passion being present. The contention here is, as it was below, that this was a statutory adequate cause, to wit, the insulting conduct to the wife, and the criticism below and here is that the charge is not sufficient, in that it fails to inform the jury directly and affirmatively that if the shooting occurred on account of this conduct on the part of Helm towards appellant's wife, and the passion was thereby engendered, he would not be guilty of a greater offense than manslaughter, had the killing occurred, and, the killing not having occurred, that his offense would not be higher than aggravated assault.

We are of opinion that this contention is correct. Wherever the statute names, as it does in this instance, that insulting conduct about or towards a female relative constitutes adequate cause, it must be expressly mentioned in the charge to the jury as a predicate for the submission of the law in that respect. This the court did not do. The court should have informed the jury that insulting conduct towards the wife would be adequate cause, but that the jury should therefore find, if adequate cause existed and the mind of the defendant became thereby inflamed to such a degree as to render it incapable of cool reflection, appellant could be guilty of no higher grade of offense than aggravated assault, and this being the law, in shooting his wife he would be guilty of no higher offense than if he had shot Helm; that is, he could be guilty of no higher offense than aggravated assault. This contention of appellant and criticism of the court's charge is correct, and aptly presents the question.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

RAINES v. STATE.

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1081*)—APPEAL—NOTICE—RECORD ENTRY.

A recitation, at the close of a sentence, that as defendant had given notice of appeal the judgment would be suspended, was insufficient as an entry of notice of appeal.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Robt. B. Seay, Judge.

Son Raines was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Dismissed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary; his punishment being assessed at 10 years' confinement in the penitentiary.

This record is before us without a statement of facts, bills of exception, or motion for new trial. The record does not show that notice of appeal was given and entered in the court below. There is a recitation, at the close of the sentence, that inasmuch as defendant has given notice of appeal the judgment will be suspended; but under the decisions this is held not to be sufficient entry of notice of appeal.

In any event, in the condition the record is presented, there is nothing the court can review, and the judgment would be affirmed, if jurisdiction had attached; but, because of want of notice of appeal, as required by the statute, the appeal is dismissed.

ishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

The two grounds in the motion, complaining that the court erred in admitting testimony, and in excluding testimony, cannot be considered by us, as there are no bills of exception in the record.

There was no error in the court refusing the special charges requested. There was no evidence calling for the first special charge; the record not even suggesting that she, in making the sales and pursuing the occupation, was acting under the direction of her husband.

The statutes provide that the purchaser of intoxicating liquor in prohibition territory is not an accomplice; consequently the court did not err in refusing the instruction presenting this issue.

The only ground in the motion complaining of the charge of the court is too general to be considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

MCCRARY v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—BURDEN OF SHOWING ERROR.

On appeal from a conviction for unlawfully carrying a pistol, a bill of exceptions stated that a witness for the state testified that he saw a pistol in accused's pocket and told him he had better behave himself or he would get into trouble. Appellant denied this, and objected to the testimony, on the ground that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and calculated to prejudice the jury against him, since he was not being prosecuted for misbehaving himself or disturbing the peace, but had pleaded guilty to that offense. The court qualified the bill by stating that accused had denied such statement, and that it was admitted as a part of the res gestæ. Held, that the bill was so meager in stating the status of the case as not to show any reversible error.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a prosecution for carrying a pistol, where the court properly stated the law as to unlawfully carrying a pistol, an instruction that, if accused did unlawfully "have" on or about his person a pistol as charged, he should be found guilty, did not prejudice accused, because of the use of the word "have," instead of "carry."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154-3157, 3159-3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

Appeal from Smith County Court; Jesse F. Odom, Judge.

Oscar McCrary was convicted of unlawfully carrying a pistol, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was convicted for carrying a pistol and fined $100, the lowest penalty. The evidence by the state is clearly sufficient to sustain the conviction. That by the defendant, if believed, would have justified an acquittal. The jury must have believed the state's evidence, and disbelieved appellant's. We cannot disturb the verdict.

[1] By one bill of exceptions it is stated that one of the state's witnesses, Jim Rushing, testified that when appellant was in his store in the afternoon of July 11, 1911, at which time he saw in the inside coat pocket of appellant what he took to be the handle of a pistol, he said to him, "You had better behave yourself, or you will get into trouble." Appellant testified, and denied making any such statement. Appellant's objection to this was that it was immaterial, irrelevant, and calculated to prejudice the jury against him. The objection further is that he was not then being prosecuted for misbehaving himself, or disturbing the peace, but had pleaded guilty to that offense, it seems, on the same occasion, and had paid his fine therefor. The court qualified this bill by stating that appellant had testified, denying making such statement, and that this statement by Rushing was made to him at the time he saw what he took to be a pistol in appellant's pocket, and was admitted as a part of the res gestæ; that appellant had pleaded guilty to disturbing the peace there on that same day; that this testimony could not have in any way injured appellant's rights, especially as the jury gave him the minimum penalty. The bill is so meager in stating the status of the case as not to specifically show that there was any error in the admission of this testimony. His objections thereto were very general. It seems the evidence was admitted to impeach appellant's testimony. This bill shows no reversible error.

[2] By another bill appellant objects to that part of the court's charge wherein he uses this language: "Now, if you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that the defendant did, in Smith county, Texas, on or about the 11th day of July, 1911, unlawfully have on or about his person a pistol, as charged, you will find him guilty," etc. The objection to this charge is the use of the word "have," underscored above. This objection is hypercritical. The complaint and information charged that on said date appellant did then and there unlawfully carry on or about his person a pistol, and the proof by the state is that he did so carry a pistol. The court, in his charge, properly stated the law that, if any person shall unlawfully carry on or about his person a pistol, etc. Taking the charge as a whole, no possible injury could have occurred to the appellant by the use of the word "have," instead of "carry," under the circumstances. The judgment is affirmed.

MONTGOMERY v. STATE

1. HOMICIDE (§ 332*)—INSANITY—EVIDENCE—REVIEW.

Evidence held to sustain a jury's finding, sustained by the trial court, that accused was not so insane when he killed deceased as to take away criminal responsibility.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 699-704; Dec. Dig. § 332.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 421*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

On the issue of insanity, a witness was not entitled to testify over objection to what third persons had told him respecting defendant's acts or conduct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 976-983; Dec. Dig. § 421.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 439*)—INSANITY—EVIDENCE—MEDICAL BOOKS.

On an issue of defendant's insanity, he was not entitled to introduce in evidence a chapter in a standard medical work on mental and nervous diseases.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1025; Dec. Dig. § 439.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 683*)—RECEPTION OF EVIDENCE—REBUTTAL.

Code Cr. Proc. 1895, art. 698, providing that the court shall allow testimony to be introduced at any time before the argument is concluded, if it appears necessary in the due administration of justice, abolished the common-law rule as to matters in rebuttal, and hence it was not error for the court to permit the state in rebuttal to introduce eyewitnesses of the crime and to permit them to testify as to the homicide generally.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1615-1617; Dec. Dig. § 683.*]

5. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—ISSUES—INSTRUCTIONS—THREATS—SELF-DEFENSE.

Where defendant, notwithstanding his sole plea of insanity, introduced evidence of prior communicated threats by deceased, and also that but a short time prior to the difficulty deceased had given defendant a severe whipping and had threatened to take his life, the court did not err in charging on threats and self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614-632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

6. HOMICIDE (§ 294*)—INSTRUCTIONS—INSANITY—MIND AND MEMORY.

Where, in a prosecution for murder, defendant pleaded insanity, an instruction that every person with a sound memory and discretion, who unlawfully kills, etc., with malice aforethought, shall be guilty of murder, etc., was not defective for failure to use the word "mind" instead of "memory."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 605; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

7. HOMICIDE (§ 294*)—INSANITY—INSTRUCTIONS—PROOF—REASONABLE DOUBT.

Defendant, in a prosecution for homicide, having pleaded insanity, the court charged that, if defendant's guilt had been established beyond a reasonable doubt, it devolved on him to establish his insanity at the time of the killing in order to excuse himself from legal responsibility; that, if the state had proved the offense, the jury's next inquiry would be whether defendant established his plea of insanity with reference to the act charged and the time of the commission of the offense; that the law did not hold a man for an act committed when insane; and that it was not necessary that the insanity should be permanent or the person charged should be a raving maniac, but was sufficient if he was insane at the time the act was committed though he was sane at other times. Held, that such instruction was not objectionable as requiring defendant to prove insanity beyond reasonable doubt, nor for failure to inform the jury that the diseased condition must be such that defendant did not know the nature and quality of his acts, or, if he did, that he did not know he was doing wrong.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 605; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 800*)—INSTRUCTIONS—DEFINITION OF TERMS.

An instruction on insanity, in a prosecution for homicide, was not objectionable for failure to define the words "lucid interval"; they being words of generally well-understood meaning.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1808-1810, 1812; Dec. Dig. § 800.*]

9. HOMICIDE (§ 294*)—INSANITY—FORM OF INSTRUCTION.

Where the court charged that defendant was entitled to an acquittal if he was a paranoiac, or was suffering from delusion of persecution, or from a homicidal mania, or from some other form of insanity, the instruction was not objectionable as limiting the jury to the form of insanity known as paranoia.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 605; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

10. HOMICIDE (§ 294*)—INSANITY—"NATURE OF ACT"—"QUALITY OF ACT."

An instruction on insanity, in a prosecution for homicide, that, if accused was sufficiently sane to know the nature and quality of his act, he was then legally responsible therefor, was not objectionable for failure to also require that he was sufficiently sane to know that his act in killing deceased was wrong; the term "nature of act" being defined to mean the attributes which constitute the thing and distinguish it from all others, while "quality of act" is the power to clearly and distinctly apprehend its nature, so that, if a person has sufficient mental power to fully appreciate and know what he is doing, he must necessarily know that the killing of a human being is wrong.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 605; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 806*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REPETITION.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, accused pleaded insanity, the law of which was fully presented in the charge, it was not necessary for the court to qualify the paragraphs of the charge dealing with murder in the first and second degree by referring to the charge on insanity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1973, 1991; Dec. Dig. § 806.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—EVIDENCE—LIMITATION—INSTRUCTIONS—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, defendant introduced evidence of other assaults made by appellant on other persons, and the attending circumstances as bearing on the plea of insanity, it was not error for the court, in the absence of a request, to omit to limit the purpose and effect of such evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1996–2004; Dec. Dig. § 824; * Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 615, 651.]

Appeal from District Court, Jones County, Jno. B. Thomas, Judge.

J. J. Montgomery was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Payne, of Snyder, L. H. McCrea, of Roby, and Chapman & Coombes, of Anson, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was indicted for and convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at imprisonment in the penitentiary for life.

[1] It is not insisted by appellant that the evidence does not support the verdict, if the evidence would justify the jury in finding that he was sane at the time of the commission of the offense; but it is earnestly insisted that the evidence would not justify such a finding. The evidence conclusively shows that appellant was a man who transacted his own business, had been a merchant, owned rent houses, and was fully competent and capable of transacting all business in connection therewith; but it was insisted by appellant that he had delusions on the question of being persecuted, that there were certain people and orders who desired to run him out of town, and desired to take his life. It is further shown that twice prior to this trial appellant had been tried, it being sought to adjudge him an insane person, but in both instances the juries had adjudged him of sound mind. However, based on these illusions or delusions testified to by witnesses, appellant contends that he was suffering from "paranoia," a form of delusional insanity—and such contention has support in the testimony,—and he was therefore incapable of knowing and appreciating the fact that the act was a wrongful act, and that under the peculiar form of insanity from which he was suffering, under the "delusions" to which he was subject, he might conceive a condition in his mind (not existent) which would justify his act, and, while laboring under this condition of mind, he would not appreciate and know that it was wrong to kill a man. While there is much evidence in the record to sustain the contention that if appellant conceived the idea, rightfully or wrongfully, that a given person held animosity towards him and intended to do him harm, in regard to such person, owing to such delusion, appellant would be in such state of mind that he should not be held criminally responsible for his acts under such conditions. Yet, as said in the Tubbs Case, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 606, 117 S. W. 858, the appellant may be a singular and strange man, and that he may, in the light of the record, possibly be an insane man, yet this issue was submitted to the triers of fact under our law, and the jury have affirmed their solemn conviction that at the time he shot and killed the deceased he was laboring under no such infirmity of mind as would excuse him for his crime. And whatever our view individually may be, we have no right to disturb their verdict where there is evidence to sustain it, and in this case, taking the state's view, there is ample testimony to support their finding. The trial judge, in overruling the motion for new trial, has affirmed his belief in the sanity of appellant, and we would not feel authorized to grant a rehearing on this ground. And under these circumstances we will take up and review each assignment of error.

[2] In the first and second bills of exception it is shown that Madison Morgan had testified that in his opinion he did not think appellant capable of knowing the nature and quality of the offense alleged against him, and had recited an instance wherein appellant had made a seemingly unprovoked assault on Mr. Tackett, and recited other matters upon which he based his opinion, and he was asked if he had heard of others, among them an attack on John A. Wood, and what he heard. This witness was permitted to detail everything happening within his view, and all incidents within his knowledge, but on objection was not permitted to detail what third persons had told him as to acts or conduct of appellant. In this we do not think the court erred, especially as it is shown that in one instance he was requested to state what he had heard in regard to a difficulty between appellant and Mr. Wood. The record discloses that Mr. Wood was in attendance on court, and was excused by appellant without being placed on the witness stand.

[3] In the third bill it is shown that appellant offered in evidence chapter No. 14, extending from page 843 to 867, of Church & Peterson's work on Mental and Nervous Diseases. There was no error in sustaining the objection to the introduction of this chapter of a medical work. It may be that the authors were gifted and learned men, and had ably expressed their views on mental diseases and disorders, yet this court has always held such evidence inadmissible. Burt v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 436, 40 S. W. 1000, 43 S. W. 344, 39 L. R. A. 305, 330; and for an extensive list of authorities, see Wharton's Crim. Law, § 538.

[4] After the state had made its case in chief, and the defendant, had introduced his testimony and rested, the state then introduced Dr. G. J. Hubbert and W. A. McKenzie, both of whom were eyewitnesses to the tragedy. The defendant objected to them being permitted to testify, claiming their testimony was not in rebuttal of any testimony offered in behalf of defendant, as he relied on the plea of insanity, and did not attempt to justify his act. While article 697 of the Code of Criminal Procedure prescribes the order of a trial, yet article 698 provides that the court shall allow testimony to be introduced at any time before the argument of a case is concluded, if it appears necessary to the due administration of justice, and in Morris v. State, 30 Tex. App. 95, 16 S. W. 757, this court said the rule of the common law which confines cross-examination of a witness to matters inquired about on his examination in chief, or to matters in rebuttal, does not obtain in this state; that the common-law rule is practically abrogated by the provision of our Code of Criminal Procedure which authorizes the court to admit testimony at any time before argument is concluded, if it appear that it is necessary to a due administration of justice, and, if necessary for that purpose, it is admissible whether in rebuttal or not. See, also, Upton v. State, 33 Tex. Cr. R. 231, 26 S. W. 197, and Wentworth v. Crawford, 11 Tex. 127. In this case it was permissible for these witnesses to describe appellant's acts on that occasion; his demeanor and appearance as bearing on the issue of whether he was sane or insane at the time of the fatal shots, as well as the remark made by appellant shortly after he fired the shots, when he inquired as to how many times he struck deceased, and when told only once, his remark, "that he was getting old and his eyesight bad." All these incidents would aid the jury in passing on his plea of delusive insanity, and whether he was in that state of mind at the time of the killing as to comprehend the nature of his act.

[5] The appellant earnestly insists that the court erred in this case in charging on threats and self-defense, contending that his sole defense was a plea of insanity, and he did not rely on the threats nor self-defense in mitigation nor justification of his act. The state introduced no evidence on these issues, but the defendant on cross-examination of the state's witnesses proved that immediately after appellant had fired the fatal shots and advanced and struck deceased over the head, when caught and disarmed, appellant exclaimed, "I had to do this," and just before making this remark, and after firing the shots, had asked, "Are you satisfied?" In addition to this, defendant developed that but a short time prior to the fatal encounter deceased had given appellant a severe whipping, and had threatened to take the life of appellant, and these threats had been communicated to appellant before he shot and killed deceased, and when these threats were communicated to him, and he was told that deceased had called him a "G—d d—n one-eyed s—n of a b—h, and that he would put the other eye out if he got a chance," appellant had only remarked, "A man is a darned fool to make any such threats." Appellant also developed that deceased was a man who went armed, brought witnesses to prove that they had seen deceased with a shotgun on different occasions about this time, and had placed it in the witnesses' place of business. And proved that witnesses had seen deceased with a pistol on frequent occasions just before the killing. Appellant introduced other facts and circumstances bearing on this issue, and what his object and purpose was in so doing we fail to see, if it was not to raise the issues that he now complains of the action of the court in submitting to the jury. None of these facts or circumstances would tend to show whether appellant was sane or insane, and, having developed them and introduced witnesses to prove these facts, appellant cannot be heard now to complain of the action of the court in submitting these issues to the jury, and that they were properly submitted, if called for, appellant does not question. In addition to this, appellant requested a charge on one phase of self-defense, which was given by the court.

[6] Appellant complains of the following paragraph of the court's charge: "Every person with a sound memory and discretion, who shall unlawfully kill any reasonable creature in being within this state, with malice aforethought, either express or implied, shall be deemed guilty of murder. Murder is distinguishable from every other species of homicide by the absence of circumstances which reduce the offense to negligent homicide or manslaughter, or which excuse or justify the homicide." Appellant's criticism is that the court should have used the word "mind" where "memory" is used. The court submitted the issue of insanity in its proper place. The other criticisms of the definitions of murder and in submitting that issue are likewise hypercritical, and the language of the court in submitting the offense of murder has been so frequently approved by this court we do not deem it necessary to discuss it. For authorities, see section 418 et seq., Branch's Crim. Law.

[7] On the issue of insanity the court charged the jury: "Among the defenses relied upon by the defendant in this case is that of insanity. No act done in a state of insanity can be punished as an offense. Every person charged with crime is presumed to be sane—that is, of sound memory and discretion—until the contrary is shown by proof. If, under the law as herein given you in charge, and the testimony of the witnesses, the guilt of the defendant has been established beyond a reasonable doubt, it devolves on the defendant to establish his insanity at the time of committing the act, in order to excuse himself from legal responsibility; that is to say, the burden of proof to establish his plea of insanity devolves upon the defendant. If the state has, as before explained, proved the facts which constitute the offense charged in the bill of indictment, your next inquiry will be: Has the defendant established by proof his plea of insanity, or has it been established by proof from any source? If it has, the law excuses him from criminal liability, and you should acquit him. The question of the insanity of the defendant has exclusive reference to the act with which he is charged, and the time of the commission of the same. If he was sane at the time of the commission of the crime, he is amenable to the law. As to his mental condition at the time, with reference to the crime alleged, it is peculiarly a question of fact to be decided by you from all the evidence in the case, before the act, at the time, and after. The law does not hold a man for an act committed by him when insane, and it is not necessary that the insanity should be permanent, or that the person charged should have been a raving maniac at the time of the commission of the act, in order to absolve the person from punishment prescribed by law. It is sufficient to absolve such person if it is shown that he was insane at the time of the commission of the act, though it be shown that such person at other times was sane. On the other hand, the fact that such person may have been at other times insane, or may have been of impaired mind, is not sufficient to absolve such person from punishment prescribed by law from the commission of the act, if it was committed by him during a lucid interval. A person can discharge himself from responsibility only by proving that his intellect was so disordered at the time he committed the act that he did not know the nature and quality of the act he was doing. If you believe from the evidence that the defendant killed Riley Newton, but at the time he did so that he was what is called a 'paranoliac,' or was suffering from delusion of persecution, or from a homicidal mania, though you might believe he was sane on any and all other of the affairs or transactions of life, or that he was suffering from some other form of insanity, and that at the time of the killing by reason of such insanity, delusion, or mania, the defendant's mind was in an impaired and unsound state so that for the time being it overruled his reason or judgment, or conscience, or that his delusion or mania was such that it deprived him of a knowledge of the right and wrong of the killing so that he did not know the nature and quality of the act, then you will acquit him on the ground of insanity and so say by your verdict; and if you acquit the defendant on this ground your verdict will read, 'We the jury, acquit the defendant on the ground of insanity.'"

The first criticism of this charge is that it required appellant to prove his insanity "beyond a reasonable doubt." A reading of the charge will disclose that this criticism is not well founded. The next criticism is that the charge "did not inform the jury the diseased condition must be such that the defendant did not know the nature and quality of his acts, or, if he did, he did not know that he was doing wrong." In the first paragraph above copied, which is thus criticised by appellant, all these words do not occur; but they will be found in the second paragraph where the court applied the law. One must read the entire charge, and its connection, and, if it as a whole presents the issue fairly, no error would be apparent.

[8] The third complaint is that the court did not explain the meaning of the words "lucid interval." These words have a well-understood meaning; but, if appellant desired a definition of them to be given, he should have requested an instruction. It is never incumbent upon the court to explain the meaning of words whose meaning is as well understood by all mankind as is the meaning of these words, unless requested so to do.

[9] The second paragraph of the above charge is criticised because it limits the consideration of the jury to the form of insanity termed "paranoliac insanity." As all the evidence tended to show this form of insanity, if any existed, this would not present error if the criticism was authorized; but, if one reads the charge herein copied, it will be seen that this criticism is also unfounded, for the court instructs the jury, "if he was what is called a paranoliac, or was suffering from delusion of persecution, or from a homicidal mania, or that he was suffering from some other form of insanity," etc. Thus it is seen that if he was suffering from any form of insanity was submitted to the jury.

[10] Another criticism is that the court should have instructed the jury that, even if appellant was sufficiently sane as to "know the nature and quality of the act," yet if the jury in their judgment find appellant did not know it was wrong he should be acquitted. It is almost inconceivable that a man could be sane enough to fully appreciate and know the nature and quality of an act, and yet not know whether it was right or wrong to commit such an act. The "nature of an act," as defined in the Century Dictionary, is "the attributes which constitute the thing, and distinguish it from all others," while "the quality of an act" is defined to be the power to clearly and distinctly apprehend its nature, and, if a person has sufficient mental power to fully appreciate and know what he is doing, we cannot concur in an opinion that he would not be criminally liable for such an act. Many of us do not commend all the provisions of our criminal law. Some think some of its provisions wrong, and are sincere in that belief, yet they would not be justified in violating such provisions. Of course, a man must be sane enough and have sufficient comprehension to appreciate and know that such an act is a violation of law, yet there is no sane person but who knows it is wrong to take human life, and, where one is sane enough to comprehend the nature and quality of the act committed, it is not incumbent on the court to charge that, even though one comprehended the nature and quality of the offense, yet they must further find beyond a reasonable doubt that he knew such act was wrong. The court instructed the jury, if appellant's mental condition was such as to "deprive him of a knowledge of the right and wrong of the killing, so that he did not know the nature and quality of the act," he should be acquitted, and this, we think, a sufficient presentation of that question. At least, the jury could not have been misled, for by the language used they would know that, if appellant was in such mental condition as not to appreciate the gravity of the offense and know it was wrong, they should acquit. In addition to the above-copied charge, at the request of appellant the court gave the following special charge: "If you find from a preponderance of the evidence in this case that, at the time of the homicide, the defendant, J. J. Montgomery, under the influence of his delusion supposed Riley Newton to be in the act of attempting to take away his life, and he, the said defendant, killed the said Riley Newton as he supposed in self-defense, and that such delusion was the result of a defective reasoning from such a disease of the mind as that he did not know the nature and quality of the act, that is, that he was not in fact acting in his own self-defense viewed from his standpoint, and therefore did not know that he was doing wrong, then you will acquit the defendant on the ground of insanity." Thus it is seen that, taking the charge as a whole, together with the special charge given, it is not subject to the criticisms contained in appellant's motion for new trial.

[11] It was not necessary for the court in his charge on murder in the first and second degree to qualify these paragraphs by referring to the charge on insanity. In its proper place this issue was fully presented.

[12] The defendant introduced evidence of assaults made by appellant on other persons and the attendant circumstances, as he says, for the purpose of showing a peculiar form of insanity. The court in his charge did not refer to nor limit the purpose or effect of this testimony, and appellant complains of the action of the court in not limiting it. If appellant desired such instructions, he should have made a request that such be done when he himself introduced the testimony. Inasmuch as he brought this testimony into the record, and under no conceivable theory could the jury have been misled into convicting him of one of those offenses, the failure of the court to limit this testimony does not present reversible error.

This is a case in which we frankly admit that the evidence offered on behalf of defendant would have authorized the jury to find that he was suffering from a form of delusive insanity, and, taking the life and history of appellant, some of the attending physicians pronounce it paranoia in its secondary stage, and, if suffering from this disease, their opinion is he would be mentally unbalanced to the extent that he should not be held responsible for taking the life of any human being. Yet, as hereinbefore stated, this issue has been three times submitted to juries, who heard the testimony, and in many instances knew the witnesses, and each time they find appellant sane. The state's testimony would make him a man capable of transacting all the business affairs of life and protecting his interests; a nervous, irritable man, quick to become angry, and when angry commit acts of violence. A witness for defendant, Judge Montgomery, introduced to detail some circumstances, and who testified he had known appellant for many years, and had dealings with him, when asked as to his sanity, testified that appellant was of such a depraved nature that he did not care what he did, but that he was a sane man and knew right from wrong. Mr. McBride, another witness for defendant, said that "he was sane except when mad, but when he gets mad he wants revenge." A number of other witnesses for defendant, when cross-examined, expressed the opinion that, while appellant was at times "queer in his actions and remarks," yet they believed he knew right from wrong and was a sane man. All the witnesses both for the state and defendant agree that appellant was a capable business man, served as county commissioner of his county, and his erratic way of imagining that people had it in for him was the only thing on which he was not a normal man; this being virtually the sole basis of his plea of insanity. The evidence shows appellant approached deceased once before, when they quarreled, and deceased had given him a severe whipping. Shortly after he recovered from the injuries received, in passing deceased, he pulled a pistol, shot and killed him, remarking, after he shot him down, "Are you satisfied?"

The witnesses who witnessed the difficulty virtually all give to appellant a look, and state his acts were those, of a rational, sane man, and, under such circumstances, the judgment must be affirmed.

WASHINGTON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 295*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICATION TO CASE.

On a trial for homicide, where accused's evidence showed that he was told by his wife that deceased had asked her to have sexual intercourse with him, and that, when he spoke to him about it, deceased said, "Yes; God damn you, what are you going to do about it? I will cut your God damned guts out," and commenced cutting accused with a knife, the court in its charge on manslaughter should have submitted as adequate cause the repetition and renewal of the insult, as well as communicated insults.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 606-609; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 340*)—APPEAL—REVERSIBLE ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the jury convicted for murder in the second degree and assessed the punishment at 20 years' imprisonment the failure of the court in charging on manslaughter to submit as adequate cause insults shown by the evidence was reversible error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 715-717, 720; Dec. Dig. § 340.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 1165, 1172*)—APPEAL—REVERSIBLE ERROR.

An erroneous charge or ruling which actually or probably led to a higher punishment than the minimum is reversible error.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—NECESSITY.

The denial of an application for a continuance will not be reviewed in the absence of a bill of exceptions, especially where other errors necessitate a new trial at which the attendance of the absent witnesses may be obtained.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY OTHER INSTRUCTIONS.

The refusal of instructions was not erroneous where the court charged in practically the same language, or sufficiently presented the issue in the general charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2011; Dec. Dig. § 829.*]

Appeal from District Court, Kaufman County; F. L. Hawkins, Judge.

Sam Washington was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Joel R. Bond, of Terrell, for appellant.
O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree; his punishment being assessed at 20 years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] The serious question in the case is raised on the charge of manslaughter. The court charged upon communicated insults and all the environments of the case in a general way as shedding light on the condition of the mind of appellant at the time he shot and killed the deceased. Without going into a detailed statement of the evidence, we deem it sufficient to state that appellant and deceased were brothers-in-law, and had been on amicable terms. Appellant came home on the day before the homicide, and informed his wife that he felt happy, that he had finished gathering his crop, and that he was going the next day to a nearby town, and wanted herself and children to go over and assist the brother-in-law, deceased, in gathering his cotton. This was late in the evening, and about 24 hours after the alleged insulting conduct on the part of deceased towards appellant's wife. She declined to go, and finally told her husband the reason, and it was this: Deceased had been to the home of appellant and his wife the day before, late in the evening, and, after talking with her a little while, invited her in an adjoining room, with the request substantially that she have sexual intercourse with him. This she declined, and told deceased that she purposed informing her husband. After receiving this information, appellant went to his trunk, got his Masonic apron, and at the same time took from the trunk a pistol, and put it in his pocket. A doctor had been phoned to come to appellant's residence to see a sick child. As appellant left the house and about the time he reached his front gate, the doctor drove up. He returned to the house with the doctor, and went into the room where the sick child was, and, while in there with his wife and the doctor, deceased and his wife

made their appearance and entered the room. The doctor, after diagnosing the case, gave appellant a couple of prescriptions to have filled. He walked out of the house into the yard, where he found his stepson, and gave the prescriptions to him, with the request that he go to the drug store and have them filled. About this time deceased came from the house, and was walking towards the gate, and appellant informed him he wanted to talk with him. They walked for some 75 yards up the road, and appellant reminded him of what he had said, and told him he wanted to have a friendly talk with him about the matter and sever their friendly relations; that he desired to know why he had treated his wife the way he had the day before, and that he had already in other matters, to use his expression, been giving him "dirt." The deceased replied in regard to insulting appellant's wife the day before, "Yes; God damn you, what are you going to do about it? I will cut your God damned guts out;" and immediately rushed at him, and began cutting at him with a knife, and succeeded in cutting two or three holes in his coat, inflicting no injury upon his person, whereupon appellant shot and killed him. This is as favorable as the testimony could be to the defendant. The state's case is to the effect that the parties walked out of the gate and up the road about 75 yards, and while standing talking appellant remarked to deceased, "Look, look Link, your horses are about to run away," and as he turned his head to look in the direction where his wagon was appellant shot and killed him. So far as the state's evidence is concerned, it is made to appear that the deceased had no knife; not only so, but that one of the boys in the wagon had borrowed deceased's knife for the purpose of peeling an apple, and that he had the knife at the time of the homicide in his pocket.

Appellant contends under these circumstances that the court's charge on manslaughter was too restricted, in that he only submitted the issue of manslaughter from the standpoint of communicated insults, contending further that inasmuch as the deceased had repeated to appellant when he talked with him about the matter, "Yes; God damn you, what are you going to do about it? I will cut your guts out," that that was an admission to him at the time of the insult, and therefore a renewal of the insult. This being true, the contention is that the court should have submitted that insult as an adequate cause, as it was a reaffirmance of it, and that the court's charge was too restrictive in limiting to communicated insults, when, in fact, deceased at the time of the homicide had repeated the insults, and deceased challenged the defendant to accept the situation, or to do what he pleased about it. We are of opinion that appellant's contention is correct, and that the charge on manslaughter is too restrictive. The charge on manslaughter should have been submitted in the light of the statement at the time of the homicide, viewed in the light of the communicated insults by the wife to appellant.

[2] Had the jury given appellant manslaughter with the minimum punishment, it would not have been reversible error, but the jury did not do this. They gave him 20 years for murder in the second degree.

[3] The unbroken line of decisions, as we understand them in Texas, is that where the charge or the ruling of the court is erroneous, and may or probably led, or did lead, to a higher punishment than the minimum, it would be error. If the jury had been properly charged on the facts of the case, and afforded an opportunity to have decided the case on the issues of manslaughter as the facts presented them, this verdict may have been much more favorable than as found by the jury. If the ruling of the court, being erroneous, leads or probably leads to either a conviction when it would not otherwise have occurred, or, conceding the guilt of the appellant, led to a higher punishment than it would had the law been properly given, then in either case the error is fatal, and the judgment should be reversed. This we understand to be the settled law in Texas, and we are not prepared to say that had the court charged the law of manslaughter, in the light of the statements made by deceased at the time of the homicide, the jury might have given appellant a much more favorable verdict than they did give him. They could have given him five years. They could have given him five years for murder in the second degree. They could have given him manslaughter with the minimum punishment of two years, but this they did not do. We are of opinion that this is not only error, but of such a nature as requires this court to reverse the judgment.

[4] In regard to the application for a continuance, we dispose of it by saying, in the first place, a bill of exceptions was not reserved to the ruling of the court, and, in the second place, upon another trial they may obtain the absent witnesses.

[5] Error is assigned on the refusal of the court to give special instructions requested by appellant on the issue of self-defense. We do not believe there was any error in this action of the court, for the reason that the court gave the same charge in practically the same language, or sufficiently and fully presented that issue to the jury in the general charge.

Because of the error in the court's charge on manslaughter, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

COONS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

ASSAULT AND BATTERY (§ 96*) — SELF-DEFENSE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused testified that, to protect his son from unlawful violence sought to be inflicted by prosecutor and his sister, he struck prosecutor with a scantling, the failure to submit the right of accused to defend his son was reversible error, though the requested charge on the subject was not accurate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Assault and Battery, Cent. Dig. §§ 142-150; Dec. Dig. § 96.*]

Appeal from Jones County Court; Joe C. Randal, Judge.

J. C. Coons was convicted of aggravated assault, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Brooks & Brooks, of Anson, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was prosecuted and convicted of an aggravated assault, and fined $25.

The evidence by the state was amply sufficient to sustain the verdict.

There is but one question in the case necessary to be decided, and that is a complaint of the charge of the court and the refusal of appellant's special charge on the same subject—that of self-defense. A day or two before July 9, 1911, Bert Coons, the son of appellant, and Bert's wife, had some trouble. Her complaint to her husband was that her husband permitted his father and mother and their children to remain at his house, and that his father's children were disrespectful and quite offensive to her in their treatment of her and manner towards her, and that, as her parents lived in the same town, she would take their young child with her and stay with her parents until his father's family left her home. She thereupon took their child, left their home, and went to that of her father. On July 9th said Bert Coons passed her father's house, and, seeing his child in the yard, proceeded to take it in his buggy, and rapidly drive with it to his home. His wife saw him, and immediately followed. Arriving at their home, some wrangle and struggle occurred between them, she endeavoring to get possession of her child and return to her father's with it, and her husband resisting and refusing this. Hot words and some scuffling occurred between them. Appellant appeared on the scene while this was going on between his son and his wife, he having in his hand at the time a butcher knife, and told his son, so some of the witnesses say, that he would slap hell out of her, and then went out of the room where the wrangling and scuffling occurred. Bert's wife claimed that she was only temporarily leaving her husband, and she wanted to keep her child with her during that time, while her husband claimed that she intended to take their child and permanently abandon him. Just at this point Mrs. Coon's young brother, upon whom the assault and battery is alleged to have been committed, appeared, when his sister, Mrs. Coons, called him to come to where she and her husband were, and verify her purpose and intent in going to her father's with the child. Her brother started into the house. Appellant's son Bert thereupon cursed him and called him opprobrious epithets, ordered him not to come into the house, immediately got his target rifle, and presented it towards his brother-in-law, but his brother-in-law stated that, as his sister had called for him, he was going in and did proceed to go in; that her brother, upon reaching them, to keep from being shot, seized the gun, and Bert's wife also seized it, the three struggling for the possession of the gun. Appellant claims that he saw, heard, and knew nothing of this, but that his little girl, 13 years of age, thereupon informed him that they were about to kill Bert, and to run and help him; that he at once ran around the house, and in going picked up what the witnesses show to have been a scantling two by four inches, some three or four feet long, and ran up and struck Mrs. Coon's brother, Milner, whom he is charged to have committed this aggravated assault upon. He testified that he struck said Milner with this scantling only one lick, and did so to protect his son from what he thought was an assault upon him to either kill him or to seriously injure him, and to make Milner, the assaulted party, turn loose the gun.

The evidence further shows that, immediately after Milner was struck this lick, it caused him to sink down, and that he immediately left, went out of the yard. Appellant went around the house, and then they had some wordy altercation and perhaps cursing. Proper objection was made to the court's charge in submitting appellant's claimed act in defense of his son, and his special charge, which he asked and which was refused on that subject. In the court's charge, excepted to, he stated that every person was permitted by law to defend himself against any act of unlawful violence offered to his person, but did not in that portion of the charge state, instead of having a right to defend himself, that he also had the right to defend another, in this instance his son, from such unlawful violence. The evidence did not raise the question of the defense of appellant himself, but it did raise the question of an assault and battery being committed in defense of his son. The charge requested on this point, while it is not a model for such charge, did state that the law justified another to act in defense of another, and required, before conviction, the jury to believe beyond a reasonable doubt that when appellant struck Milner, if they believed he struck him, while his son, his daughter-in-law, and Milner were struggling over the possession of the gun for the purpose of making Milner release said gun, and at the time he struck him appellant believed that his son was about to be unlawfully assaulted by Milner, or that his son was in danger of serious bodily injury from Milner, then to acquit appellant. This feature of the court's charge was not submitted in the charge complained of, but was substantially so in that requested by appellant and refused.

It may be that, under the testimony in the case, the jury would not have believed appellant under all the circumstances, yet the testimony made it necessary for the court to properly submit that question to the jury for them to find, and the court could not take it away from the jury. For this error of the court in its main charge and the refusal to submit the question substantially as appellant requested, it will be necessary to reverse the judgment and remand the cause.

BISHOP v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 442*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS—LETTERS.

In a prosecution for seduction, evidence by the prosecutrix that certain letters were written by defendant to her rendered them admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1027; Dec. Dig. § 442.*]

2. SEDUCTION (§ 46*)—CORROBORATION—LETTERS.

In a prosecution for seduction, where prosecutrix alone testified that certain letters offered in evidence at the trial had been written to her by defendant, such letters could not furnish corroborative evidence, since she could not corroborate herself.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Seduction, Cent. Dig. §§ 83-86; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 722½*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—QUESTIONS.

In a criminal prosecution, questions by the state's attorney, on cross-examination of a witness, whether he came to testify in the case until he found out that defendant had been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary on a former trial, and whether he knew that defendant was convicted and sentenced at a former trial, were improper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1676; Dec. Dig. § 722½.*]

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

Willie Bishop was convicted of seduction, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Callaway & Callaway, of Comanche, and J. R. Stubblefield, of Eastland, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of the offense of seduction, and his punishment assessed at three years' confinement in the state penitentiary. This is the second appeal in this case; the opinion of the court on the former appeal being reported in 144 S. W. 278.

The testimony of the prosecuting witness, Miss Ethel Harrison, would support a verdict that appellant was guilty of seduction, if her testimony was corroborated as required by law; but one of the serious questions in the case, Does the testimony corroborate her sufficiently, tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense? Miss Harrison testifies that the first act of intercourse took place at her father's residence just before Christmas; that she was in the room with her father, mother, and sister, and Frank Brooks; that appellant came by and touched her shoulder and asked her to go out on the front gallery, when by his promises and assurances she was induced to yield her person to him. The father, mother, sister, nor Frank Brooks were not called to corroborate this circumstance. Had they been, or either of them, and they corroborated her in her testimony that appellant was present on that occasion, and they went out on the gallery together, with the testimony of Miss Flora Roscoe, the testimony would be ample to support the conviction. Why the prosecuting attorney did not call the father, mother, sister, nor Frank Brooks is not apparent of record, although the record discloses a portion of them were in attendance on court.

[1, 2] The prosecuting officers evidently relied on the letters said to have been written by appellant and introduced in evidence. Miss Harrison testified that the letters were written by appellant, and this rendered them admissible in evidence; but could they be used to corroborate her, when she alone testified they were written by appellant? Eliminate her testimony, and the letters go with it. If it was desired to use the letters as corroborative testimony, some evidence, other than that of Miss Harrison, should have been introduced tending to show that appellant wrote the letters. An accomplice cannot corroborate herself, and no testimony she gives can be so used. If the state had introduced any testimony, other than that of Miss Harrison, that the letters were written by appellant, or were in his handwriting, they might be corroborative of her testimony; but no such evidence was introduced, and appellant asked a special charge which should have been given. The charge reads as follows: "Should you find from the evidence that the prosecuting witness, Ethel Harrison, testified that she received from the defendant certain letters, which have been introduced in evidence before you, and you should further find that no other witness testified that the defendant wrote and mailed said letters, and that the state must rely alone upon the testimony of said Ethel Harrison for the purpose of showing the defendant wrote said letters, then and in that event you are instructed that said letters would not be sufficient within themselves and alone to corroborate the testimony of said Ethel Harrison and to warrant a conviction of the defendant. In other words, the law requires that the prosecuting witness, Ethel Harrison, shall be corroborated by other testimony than her own and by such testimony as tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime with which he is charged, and, if no other witness in the case testified that the defendant either wrote or mailed said letters than the said Ethel Harrison, then and in such event the said letters within themselves and alone would not furnish the corroboration which the law requires in order to warrant a conviction of the defendant."

This charge should have been given when the state offered no evidence other than that of Miss Harrison that appellant wrote the letters. She could not corroborate herself. Smith v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. R. 106, 124 S. W. 919.

[3] It is shown by bill of exceptions No. 1 that, on cross-examination of the witness Mrs. Vinie Stanfield, the district attorney asked her: "You never came here to testify in this cause until you found out that the defendant had been convicted and sentenced to the penitentiary on a former trial?" And on cross-examination of the witness John Chatman the district attorney asked him: "You know that the defendant was convicted at a former trial in this court, and given a term of three years in the penitentiary?" Such questions were highly improper and should not have been asked. Wyatt v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. R. 116, 124 S. W. 929, 137 Am. St. Rep. 926, and cases there cited. The court excluded the testimony when his attention was called to it, but we call attention to this error that prosecuting attorneys may avoid it in the future.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the other questions raised in the motion for new trial, but on account of the above errors the case must be reversed. Eliminate the letters, and the corroboration is not sufficient to sustain the verdict, and these letters were only proven up by the testimony of the alleged seduced person, who in law was an accomplice.

Reversed and remanded.

WALKER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. BURGLARY (§ 41*)—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held sufficient to sustain a conviction of burglary.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Burglary, Cent. Dig. §§ 94-103, 109; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166¼*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICE—OBJECTIONS TO JURORS.

Where accused did not exhaust his peremptory challenges, he was not prejudiced by the overruling of challenges of certain jurors for cause, whom accused thereupon challenged peremptorily.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3114-3123; Dec. Dig. § 1166¼.*]

3. BURGLARY (§ 34*)—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

In a prosecution for burglary of a clothing store, evidence of the manager of the store concerning the suit case and clothing claimed to have been stolen was not objectionable, on the ground that the goods produced and exhibited were not sufficiently identified as those stolen; the objection going to the weight, and not to the admissibility, of the evidence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420, 650*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

Where a clerk of the store alleged to have been burglarized, on discovering the burglary, showed the owner as soon as he arrived how the door had been unfastened and an entry effected, the owner was entitled to illustrate with a stick the condition of the bar with which the door had been fastened, and the door, but was not entitled to state what was told him by his clerk.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983, 1457; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420, 650.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER OFFENSES.

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, defendant denied that he had committed it, but claimed he had purchased the stolen property from G., while the state claimed defendant and G. acted together in committing the burglary, evidence that G. had previously committed other burglaries in the same town, with which defendant had nothing to do, was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822-824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 844*)—INSTRUCTIONS—OBJECTIONS.

An objection to a part of the charge on circumstantial evidence, that it did not correctly define circumstantial evidence, nor apply it to the facts of the case, without pointing out specifically wherein it was defective, was insufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 2025; Dec. Dig. § 844.*]

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 792*)—INSTRUCTIONS—PRINCIPALS AND ACCESSORIES.

Where the state claimed that, if accused himself did not commit the burglary in question, he nevertheless participated therein as a principal with another, and defendant's own evidence indicated such participation, the court did not err in charging on principals.

Appeal from District Court, Comanche County; J. H. Arnold, Judge.

Rowe Walker was convicted of burglary. and he appeals. Affirmed.

Callaway & Callaway, of Comanche, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was indicted and convicted of burglary, and his penalty fixed at two years, which is the lowest penalty prescribed by law.

[1] It is unnecessary to give a detailed statement of the evidence. It was clearly sufficient to authorize the jury to find that on or about June 19, 1911, the store of the Farmers' Union at De Leon in Comanche county, in charge of and under the control of one Morton, was burglarized, and a suit case, a suit of clothes, and other clothing were stolen therefrom. This suit case and the clothing were soon afterwards recovered and sufficiently identified to show that it was the property stolen from said store at said time. Appellant was shown to have lived in said town of De Leon since early boyhood. He was about 17 years old at the time of this burglary. He was shown to be reasonably familiar with the store, and in it the evening of the burglary, and was also in it the next morning after the burglary. He left De Leon the evening after the burglary on a freight train about 3 o'clock in the evening. By his own testimony he claimed that he bought this suit case and clothing from one Ed Gray about 2 o'clock the night of the burglary, paying him $4.15 therefor; that he and Gray were at the depot at that time of night, and that Gray left on the train a few minutes after his (appellant's) claimed purchase of the suit case and clothing; that he hid the suit case and its contents under a house that night, and himself slept in an open park—not at his grandfather's, where he is shown to have lived, if he could be said to have a place of habitation. On the freight train in the evening after he left De Leon going north, he is shown to have had this suit case filled with these clothes. In effect, on this occasion, he told the brakeman, to whom he tried to sell some of the clothes, and did sell a pair of pants, that he bought the goods on a credit and was leaving the country, not stating to that witness from whom he had bought the clothes and suit case, although, in effect, asked about it. He, on the next day, is shown to have had the said suit case filled with said clothes in Cisco, some 30 miles north from De Leon, and that on that day he sold some two suits of the clothes. The first person to whom he sold some of these clothes on that day inquired where he got so many clothes, and he stated that he had been working on the railroad, and wanted to quit his job, and could not get his money, and that he traded his time check for the clothes, and got them from said Farmers' Union store in De Leon. Later, on the same day, when he sold another suit of the clothes to another witness and was asked where he got them, he claimed that he bought them at De Leon from a clerk in said Union store. This witness could not tell for certain whether he said Ed Gray, or Ed Morton, or Ed somebody else. To another witness, the same day or the day later, to whom he sold some more of the clothes, he claimed that he was broke, and trying to get some money to go off and get a job, and did not tell this witness from whom or where he got the clothes. It was clearly shown that he did not buy the clothes, or any of them, or suit case, from either of the clerks in said store, there being only two clerks or employes in said store.

After he had made the disposition of the different suits and pieces of clothes above mentioned, it seems, the officers, upon investigation, began to hunt him to arrest him for said burglary. He heard of this, and began to undertake to evade arrest, and skipped about from first one place to another to various towns on the Texas Central and Texas & Pacific Railroads, but was ultimately arrested when fleeing and attempting to get out of the country. Later, after arrest for this burglary, when the county attorney and justice of the peace were investigating the question, he made a written statement. At first he stated, and had it written down, that he bought the clothes from Ed Gray at Cisco, and that they were delivered to him at Cisco, some 30 to 35 miles from De Leon. After having so stated, and having that so written down, the county attorney and justice of the peace told him that they knew that was not true, because they had found from others that they saw him hide the suit case under some coal in a coal tinder in De Leon. Then he had that statement erased, and stated that he bought and received the suit case and clothes from Ed Gray, and that Ed Gray delivered to him in De Leon, he paying Ed Gray $4.15 therefor. The property was shown to have been worth many times more than $4.15. He sold part of the property at what he stated at the time was much less than the goods were worth, and got something like $10 to $15. It was shown on the trial that the state had made repeated efforts to get Gray as a witness for the state and that appellant made none. The state failed to get him; that Gray had been arrested at first for this offense, but upon investigation discharged; that afterwards he was arrested and placed in jail for other offenses, broke jail, and had not been apprehended since. Upon the whole, the evidence was amply sufficient to sustain the conviction. It was largely upon circumstantial evidence. The court gave a correct and proper charge on circumstantial evidence.

Appellant has several bills of exception, not one of which is sufficient under the rules to require this court to consider the point attempted to be raised. Section 857, p. 557, and section 1123, p. 732, of White's Ann. Code Cr. Proc. However, we have gone over every one of his bills, and, as explained and qualified by the court, no reversible error whatever is shown.

[2] By his first bill he claims that the court erred in refusing to sustain his challenge for cause to several of the jurors, not one of whom served on the jury. The court, in allowing this bill, shows that the voir dire examination of the jurors did not disqualify them from serving. Notwithstanding this, appellant peremptorily challenged them, and did not exhaust his challenges, and no objectionable juror sat upon the jury, and no injury whatever is shown, even if it were conceded that the court should have sustained his challenges.

[3] There are several bills complaining of the action of the court in permitting Morton, the manager of the store, to produce, identify, and testify about the suit case and clothing claimed to have been stolen from said store at the time of the burglary. Appellant's objection to this character of testimony was that the goods produced and exhibited were not sufficiently identified as those which were so stolen. This would go to the weight, and not to the admissibility, of the evidence. The testimony by the state's witnesses sufficiently, and we think clearly, identified the suit case and some of the clothes stolen from said store. The court, in qualifying these bills, showed that this testimony objected to was only a part of the state's testimony as to the identification of the stolen goods at the time of the burglary.

[4] It was shown that Mr. Stover, one of the two clerks in said store, reached the store next morning after the burglary before Mr. Morton, the other clerk and manager thereof, did. Upon discovering that the house had been burglarized, as soon as Morton arrived, he showed him the situation of things, and how the door had been unfastened and an entry effected, and then an attempted reclosing of the door after the burglary. Both of these witnesses testified, and Stover, on the trial, illustrated and showed to the jury how the door had been opened, the entrance effected, and an attempted reclosing and refastening of the door had been made. Appellant's objection to Morton's testimony was that what Stover had told him about how the door had been opened, etc., was inadmissible as hearsay. The court, in qualifying the bills, states that he allowed the witness to illustrate before the jury with a stick the condition of the bar and door in question, but did not permit him to state a word the witness Stover had said to him. No error is shown in this.

[5] By another bill appellant claims that the court would not permit him to prove by several witnesses named that said Ed Gray had stolen a lot of goods from various stores and persons in De Leon prior to said burglary, and had secreted them under the Baptist Church in De Leon, and had sold various of these stolen articles some time before this burglary, and that appellant had nothing to do with those thefts. The court, in effect, refused to approve this bill, stating that he did not agree that it correctly stated the facts; but he further explained and qualified it by stating that appellant did offer to prove prior to this burglary on distinct and different occasions that some other boys, including Ed Gray, had stolen goods, and perhaps burglarized a store or stores, in De Leon, that he would not permit the time of the court in this trial to be taken up by inquiring into extraneous crimes, and sought to confine the testimony to the case on trial, that while it was the theory of the state that Gray and appellant acted together in the burglary in question, he did not think it proper to go into the proof of these specific extraneous crimes by Gray, if any. The testimony was inadmissible in this case, and especially so as explained by the court.

[6] There are some complaints of various paragraphs of the court's charge. We have carefully gone over the whole charge, and find that, taken as a whole, it is an admirable one, and presents all of the various questions arising in the case properly to the jury for a finding therein. None of his criticisms show any reversible error at all. Some of his complaints of the charge are too general, and do not point out any specific error. For instance, he quotes only a part of the charge of the court on circumstantial evidence, and then says that particular paragraph was error, in that it did not correctly define circumstantial evidence, and does not correctly apply it to the facts of the case, not pointing out wherein it did not correctly define circumstantial evidence, and not pointing out wherein it did not correctly apply to the facts of the case. We have considered it in connection with the case and the whole charge, and can find no error therein.

[7] He also complains that the court charged on principals, claiming that such charge was not called for, and there was no allegation in the indictment that appellant acted with any other in committing the offense, if any was committed. The theory of the state, as stated by the court, was that, if appellant himself did not commit the burglary, he participated therein as a principal with said Ed Gray; and appellant's own evidence on this point raised such question, and made it proper for the court to so charge, and the charge on the subject, taken as a whole, correctly applies the law to the facts.

The court gave a full, fair, and correct charge on the subject of appellant being found in possession of the recently stolen property from said burglarized house at the time of the burglary. This charge is strictly in conformity to charges on the subject uniformly approved as correct by this court. Section 1518, White's Ann. P. C. p. 624.

We have considered all of appellant's assigned errors in this case, and find that none of them are sufficient to authorize this court to reverse the judgment in this case.

The judgment is affirmed.

ZINN v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 13, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 4, 1912.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 70*)—SUFFICIENCY OF ACCUSATION—CHARGING OFFENSE.

An information by a county attorney, upon affidavit attached, presenting that defendant unlawfully bet at a game of cards at a place not then and there a private residence occupied by a family, and that affiant had reason to believe and did believe that defendant then played at cards at a place not then and there a private residence, is defective, in that it does not present to the court that accused had violated a law, but only that some affiant charged him with committing the offense.

Appeal from Hamilton County Court; R. Q. Murphree, Judge.

Ollie Zinn was convicted of a violation of the gaming laws, and he appeals. Reversed, and prosecution dismissed.

S. R. Allen, of Hamilton, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This is a conviction for a violation of the gaming laws.

The statement of facts and bills of exception were filed after the adjournment of court. The case being appealed from the county court, there must be an order, entered of record, authorizing the filing of these papers after term time, in order to authorize this court to consider and review them. In the absence of these matters, there is nothing which the court can intelligently revise.

The judgment is ordered to be affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

On a former day of the term the appeal herein was affirmed, without reference to the statement of facts. It is shown now the statement of facts was filed within the 20 days allowed by the court, and will be considered.

The motion for rehearing calls our attention to the fact that we overlooked the motion to quash and in arrest of judgment, contending that the information is not sufficient. The information charges as follows: "In the name and by the authority of the state of Texas, now comes P. M. Rice, county attorney of Hamilton county, Texas, upon affidavit of J. E. Beck, hereto attached and made a part hereof and in behalf of said state presents in the county court of Hamilton county, Texas, at the April term, 1912, of said court, that heretofore to wit, on or about the 13th day of November, 1911, in said county of Hamilton and state of Texas, one Ollie Zinn did then and there unlawfully bet at a game of cards at a place not then and there a private residence occupied by a family. * * * And the affiant aforesaid upon his oath aforesaid further deposes and says that he has reason to believe and does believe that heretofore, to wit, on or about the 13th day of November, 1911, in said county of Hamilton, state of Texas, one Ollie Zinn did then and there play at a game of cards at a place not then and there a private residence occupied by a family, contrary," etc. The contention is made that the information does not present in the court, under the last count mentioned and quoted, that appellant had violated the law; that it only presents to the court that the affiant further deposes and says:

This is not sufficient. The information may allege that the affidavit was filed, but it must allege that the county attorney presented in the court that appellant did the prohibited thing. It is not sufficient to present that there was an affidavit filed to the effect that appellant committed the offense, but the county attorney must directly present the fact that he charges and presents in the court that appellant did the act of which complaint is made. The first count in the information was properly presented; but it does not present that appellant, on either of the subsequent counts in the information, committed the offense. It only states the fact that the affiant, whoever he may have been, charged appellant with committing the offense. It nowhere, in connection with the third count, presents that appellant violated the law as charged in that count.

For this reason, the judgment is reversed, and the prosecution is ordered dismissed.

mit that question to the jury. The court charged that Stanfield was an accomplice, and gave a correct charge as to the necessity of the corroboration of his testimony. No complaint is made of this.

We have carefully studied the evidence in this case, and in our opinion the evidence does not show or tend to show that Hobbs was an accomplice, so as to authorize or require the court to submit that question to the jury, and the court did not err in not submitting it to the jury. It is unnecessary to recite the evidence. It in no way connects Hobbs with the theft, so as to show or tend to show that he had anything to do therewith, or was in any way an accomplice in the theft.

The judgment is affirmed.

The recognizance entered into is not in

The appeal is dismissed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[2] At a former day of this term this case was dismissed on account of a defective recognizance. Appellant files a motion to reinstate, and accompanies his motion with a recognizance in conformity with law and the rules of this court as announced in Burton v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 544, 90 S. W. 498, and the motion is granted. Appellant was prosecuted, charged with assault with intent to rape, and, when tried, was convicted of an aggravated assault, and his punishment assessed at 18 months confinement in the county jail.

[3,4] The court instructed the jury that "an assault becomes aggravated when committed by an adult male upon the person of a female." And the charge on aggravated assault is predicated on this subdivision of the provision of the Code defining aggravated assault alone. Appellant earnestly insists that there is no testimony in the record that appellant is 21 years of age, or was of that age when the offense was alleged to have been committed. The evidence would support the verdict that he is guilty of an assault, but whether aggravated or simple assault would depend upon his age. If he is less than 21 years of age, he would be guilty of simple assault only. We have searched the record in vain for some evidence upon which to base a conclusion that he is 21 years old, and we find none. The unvarying rule in this court appears to have been announced in Hartsell v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 389, 116 S. W. 1159, Judge Brooks rendering the opinion. He says: "Appellant's only contention is that the evidence fails to show that he is an adult male; the assault alleged being made upon a female. The prosecutrix, in her testimony, in speaking of appellant, uses this language: 'I know John Hartsell, the defendant, like any other boy, in passing.' Then, in another portion of her testimony, in speaking of the appellant, she uses this language: 'I saw the defendant the next day. I identified him as the man who assaulted me that night.' In the case of Davis v. State, 76 S. W. 467, in passing upon a similar question, will be found the following language: 'We are not authorized to indulge any presumption against appellant. If he is convicted of any offense, it must be upon evidence; and here we find no evidence to sustain the fact that he was an adult male, either of a positive or circumstantial character.' In this case we have the prosecuting witness speaking of appellant as a boy in one place and a man in another place. The word 'boy' is always applied to a male person under 21 years of age. 'Man' is a noun used to designate one over 21 years of age. For a discussion of similar questions, see Davis v. State, 6 Tex. App. 133; Gaston v. State, 11 Tex. App. 143; Tucker v. State, 43 S. W. 106. From the record before us we cannot tell whether appellant is a boy or man. By the record alone we are governed. If appellant is a boy, then it could not be aggravated assault. If he is a man, it could. The record on this question ought to have been made more explicit. We are not authorized to indulge presumptions against appellant, but must pass upon the case on the record as made."

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the other questions, but, on account of the above error, this case is reversed and the cause is remanded.

KEARSE v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The jury are the exclusive judges of the facts proved, and of the weight of the testimony, and the court on appeal from a verdict attacked on the ground of the insufficiency of the testimony to sustain it may only determine whether there is sufficient evidence, if believed, to sustain it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074-3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 783*)—INSTRUCTION—IMPEACHMENT OF WITNESS.

Where the state on the cross-examination of a witness for accused produced the testimony of the witness before the grand jury to contradict the testimony on the trial, a charge that the testimony given before the grand jury was not admitted to prove the guilt of accused, but solely as impeaching the credibility of the witness, was proper.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1734, 1735, 1872-1876; Dec. Dig. § 783.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ERRONEOUS INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction erroneously permitting the jury to consider the testimony of a witness before the grand jury to impeach a witness for the state, arising from the fact that the state's witness could not be impeached by such character of testimony, was in accused's favor, and he could not complain thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3154-3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 406*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

Accused on trial for rape of a girl under 15 years of age may admit that prosecutrix was not 15 years of age at the time of the alleged offense, and be bound by such admission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 785, 894-927; Dec. Dig. § 406.*]

5. RAPE (§ 38*)—STATUTORY RAPE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Where accused on a trial for rape on a girl under 15 years of age contended that the different members of the family of prosecutrix were about the premises at the time of the alleged offense, so that they would have known what was being done, the court properly permitted the state to prove the membership of the family of prosecutrix, and to show their whereabouts at the time of the alleged offense, and that the members of the family were not in sight or hearing at such time, and to show that the mother of prosecutrix was dead.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 48-50; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF TESTIMONY.

The admission of improper testimony is not reversible error unless some injury is shown or reasonably made to appear, and the mere fact that the state on the trial for statutory rape was permitted to prove that the mother of prosecutrix was dead at the time of the alleged offense was not reversible error, in the absence of any improper use of the testimony in argument before the jury or otherwise.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3137-3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

7. RAPE (§ 40*)—STATUTORY RAPE—EVIDENCE.

Under Pen. Code 1911, art. 1063, defining "rape" with a girl under 15 years of age with her consent, evidence that prosecutrix under 15 years of age was a lewd woman at the time of the alleged offense was inadmissible to affect her credibility.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-59, 64; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Error in excluding on a trial for statutory rape evidence of the bad reputation of prosecutrix for virtue and chastity is harmless, where it is conceded that she was a lewd woman at the time of the alleged offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145-3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1114*)—APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

The court on appeal may only look to the authenticated record in considering the case on appeal, or any question raised or presented therein, and it may not look to the oral assertions of accused or his attorney in oral argument.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2913, 2921; Dec. Dig. § 1114.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1064*)—APPEAL—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—MOTION FOR NEW TRIAL.

Where a motion for new trial on a trial for statutory rape alleged that the court sustained an objection to evidence, and stated that it did not want to hear the theory of accused's counsel on which the evidence would be admissible, accused on appeal could not urge that the court erred in refusing to permit his attorney to state at the time what he expected to prove.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2676-2684; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

11. RAPE (§ 38*)—STATUTORY RAPE—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial of statutory rape, evidence that a third person charged with having raped prosecutrix had been acquitted was inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 48-50; Dec. Dig. § 38.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1092*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Under Code Cr. Proc. 1911, art. 744, authorizing a bill of exceptions, and Rev. Civ. St. 1911, arts. 2058 et seq., providing for the preparation, allowance, and signature of bills of exceptions, and providing that, on the judge finding a proposed bill incorrect, he may prepare a bill of exceptions presenting the ruling of the court, and providing for bills by bystanders, the court may prepare a bill of exceptions where the bill presented is erroneous, and, where the bill as prepared by the judge is not questioned, the court on appeal is bound thereby.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2829, 2834-2861, 2919; Dec. Dig. § 1092.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166½*) — APPEAL — BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—HARMLESS ERROR.

Though the statute makes it proper for the court when an objection is made and a bill of exceptions is taken to stop the trial a sufficient length of time to then and there prepare, sign, and approve the bill, the refusal to suspend the trial for that purpose is not reversible error, where the party complaining is subsequently given his bill in full.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3114-3125; Dec. Dig. § 1166½.*]

Appeal from District Court, Fisher County; John B. Thomas, Judge.

Knox Kearse was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

M. E. Rosser and Wilmeth & Boyd, all of Snyder, L. H. McCrea, of Roby, and Higgins, Hamilton & Taylor, of Snyder, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was convicted of rape of a girl under 15 years of age, and his penalty fixed at 10 years in the penitentiary.

[1] Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. The contention is based largely on the fact that the girl alleged to have been raped by appellant contradicted herself in her testimony and was contradicted by the testimony of other witnesses and by some circumstances. There is hardly any contested case that comes to this court but what there are contradictions in the testimony, and frequently a principal witness may contradict himself in material matters. In such cases, when it is contended that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict, this court cannot legally take the place of the jury, and determine whether or not it will believe any witness or witnesses, and from all of the testimony, as put down on paper and sent to this court, it would have found a different verdict from that of the jury, and, if so, reverse the case on that account. The only question this court can determine is whether there is sufficient evidence, if believed by the jury, to sustain the conviction. This court passes upon that question as a question of law which is all it can legally do under such circumstances. Our law expressly provides that the jury in all cases are the exclusive judges of the facts proved and of the weight to be given to the testimony. This court therefore cannot take that question from the jury without usurping authority that was never given or intended to be given to it. The jury in a felony case is made up of 12 fair, disinterested, impartial, unprejudiced, unbiased, and competent jurors selected from different portions of the county, each one of whom hears all the witnesses, looks them in the face when testifying, observes their manner and the method of their examination by the respective attorneys, then hears the argument of the attorneys for each side, one side undertaking to break down the testimony of the witness and calling attention to every contradiction in the testimony of such witness and the contradiction by others of him, the other explaining such matters, and seeking to sustain such witness, then hear and take with them in their retirement the charge of the court. Then the twelve men discuss and consider in private between themselves all such matters, and, after weighing it all and all the arguments against it and in support of it, come to the conclusion that the testimony of a certain witness, or witnesses, although contradicted and although there are contradictions in the testimony of such witness, that it is true and they believe it. The jury is made up of men of different ages, from young to comparatively old men, and they pursue different occupations and businesses. With all these surroundings they are much more competent to arrive at the truth than are the judges of this court who must look solely to the testimony as written down on paper. It cannot portray the manner, the looks, and the deportment of the witness, nor the manner of his examination and cross-examination by the attorneys. Besides this, the presiding judge hears and sees and observes all that the jury does in the trial of the case and he then sustains the verdict of the jury. Therefore, when the evidence taken in its favorable light sustains the verdict, this court cannot legally set it aside. We have carefully read and studied all the evidence in this case. It is amply sufficient, if believed by the jury as it was, to sustain the verdict. We are not authorized to set it aside. It is unnecessary to recite the evidence.

[2, 3] Among others, the appellant introduced the witness Clarence Thrash, whose testimony, in some particulars, tended to break down the state's case, as made by its evidence, and in some particulars in favor of the defendant. On cross-examination of this witness the state by him showed or tended to show some inconsistencies, if not contradictions, of his own testimony, damaging to the state, given in his direct examination. Then the district attorney produced the written and signed testimony of this witness before the grand jury when they were investigating the case and found the indictment herein. He admitted that that was his signed statement of his testimony before the grand jury, and that he had so testified before the grand jury; that, before he testified before the grand jury, he was duly and properly sworn. The district attorney, who was present in the grand jury room and who wrote down this statement before it was signed by this witness, as well as one of the grand jurors, testified positively that this statement of the witness of his testimony before the grand jury was written down at the time he gave it, read over to him, and signed by him. There is no doubt, and cannot be, from the testimony that this statement was signed by the witness and his testimony before the grand jury as therein written down and signed by him. This testimony in some particulars was in direct contradiction of some of his testimony in favor of the appellant given on this trial.

The state thereupon, without any objection whatever by appellant, introduced the following portion of said statement: "My name is Clarence Thrash. I know Essie Moore and Etta Moore. Am a rural route mail carrier. Etta Moore told me she was 17 years old, and asked me to hold her mail. Have been to Moore's house two times. The first time was there was to get E. L. Moore to sign a petition to the government for a daily mail route. This was in 1911. I cannot tell what month or the day of the month. Nobody but the Moore family was there that day. I was back there some time before any arrest was made. Nobody was there that day except the two girls. It was on Friday or Friday a week before anybody was arrested. Can't say for certain. I went with Knox Kearse. Knox Kearse and I went there about the middle of the afternoon. Just the two girls were there. Two McCullough boys passed around there while we were there. We stayed there about 20 minutes. I talked to both of the girls. I have had sexual intercourse with Essie Moore. I never did have intercourse with Etta Moore. [Some omitted.] At the time Knox Kearse and I were at Moore's house as above stated, Knox Kearse went into the Moore house. I did not use my watch to tell the length of time that he was in the house. Knox Kearse was with the younger girl. We went to the house a second time to get a drink of water, and Kearse went into the house with the younger girl, Etta Moore, the second time that we were that day. This day was not a regular mail day with me. Kearse and the girl remained in the house three or four minutes. I was with Essie Moore during this time. Me and Essie had gotten to my motor cycle about 100 yards from the house, when Kearse and Etta Moore came out of the house. Kearse and Etta Moore come on to the motor cycle where me and Essie were. I did not see any children at the house that day. E. L. Moore, the father of the girls, was out in the field about a half mile. I have guded Knox Kearse, and offered to bet him a dollar that he has had intercourse with Etta Moore, but he never would say whether he had or not. He would not say anything. That day Knox Kearse told me that he had been out to Moore's before then. One night in town, when Kearse was with Lon Smith, Smith was drunk, and Kearse took him home in an auto. Kearse afterwards told me that he had been out to Moore's that night, in the car he took Smith home in, that night. Clarence Thrash."

In the introduction of it by the state, where the words in about the middle of the body of the statement above copied says in parenthesis "some omitted," the state omitted and did not introduce that part of the statement. Thereupon the appellant announced that he would introduce that part of the statement which was omitted by the state, which part is as follows: "Charles Jones told me that he had been to Moore's house. He told me this about one week before he was arrested. He said the Moore girls were warm members. Jones and I were standing in a crowd when he made this statement. He said he had been out there, and asked me if I had seen him out at Moore's house. It was about a week before Jones was arrested that he made this statement. Hugh Scarborough told me that he had been out to Moore's. I think it was about a week after the boys were arrested that he had been out there. Have seen Curtis Teeter and another boy out there at Moore's," announcing at the time that they desired to introduce it for the purpose of impeaching the prosecutrix and for whatever the jury might think it worth.

The court on this subject gave to the jury this charge: "Fourth. The written statement of the witness Clarence Thrash made before the grand jury of Scurry county, Tex., from the beginning of said statement up to and including that part of said statement ending with the words, 'I never did have sexual intercourse with Etta Moore,' and also that part of said statement beginning with the words, 'At the time Knox Kearse and I were at Moore's house as above stated Knox Kearse went into the Moore house,' and ending with the end of said statement, was not admitted before you for the purpose of proving the guilt of the defendant in this case, but was admitted before you solely for the purpose for you to consider, if you do consider it, for whatever right (weight) you may give it, if any, or for whatever you may consider it worth, if anything, as impeaching the credibility of the witness Clarence Thrash, and you will consider it for no other purpose. The balance of said statement beginning with the words, 'Charles Jones told me that he had been to Moore's house,' and ending with the words, 'have seen Curtis Teeter and another boy out there at Moore's,' offered in evidence before you by the defendant, was admitted before you solely for the purpose for you to consider, if you do consider it, for whatever you may think it entitled to, if anything, as impeaching the credibility of the witness Etta Moore, and for no other purpose." Appellant objected to this charge on various grounds. In our opinion the first part of this charge about the jury considering it to impeach the credibility of Thrash was proper, and in no way objectionable. The latter part of the charge, telling the jury they might consider the portion of it introduced by the appellant to impeach the witness Etta Moore, should not have been given, and that part of the statement should not have been admitted in evidence for that purpose. The witness Etta Moore could not be impeached by this character of statement made at the time and under the circumstances when this was by the witness Thrash, but this portion of this charge is clearly in appellant's favor, and not against him, and he has no cause of complaint on that account. Clanton v. State, 13 Tex. App. 153; Wooley v. State, 64 S. W. 1055; Turner v. State, 51 S. W. 367; Gutgesell v. State, 43 S. W. 1016; Scott v. State, 23 Tex. App. 535, 5 S. W. 142; Ripsey v. State, 29 Tex. App. 43, 14 S. W. 448; Gibson v. State, 45 Tex. Cr. R. 313, 77 S. W. 812; Wyatt v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 256, 42 S. W. 598; Gallegos v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 61, 85 S. W. 1150. We think the authorities cited by appellant on this subject are inapplicable.

[4, 5] By one bill of exceptions it is shown that when the state's witnesses E. L. Moore and Mrs. May Cross, father and sister, respectively, of the prosecuting witness Etta Moore, were on the stand as witnesses for the state, the state was permitted to prove by them that the mother of Etta Moore was dead; that before this evidence was introduced the appellant, in open court, in the presence of the jury, admitted that Etta Moore was 15 years of age on January 6, 1912, and that she was not 15 years of age at the time of the alleged offense (the offense was alleged to have been committed on April 20, 1911, and the proof showed, if committed, it was on or about the same date). By another bill that when said state's witness E. L. Moore, father of Etta, was upon the stand as a state's witness, the state asked him who composed his family in the spring of 1911, and during April of that year. He answered: "I had three little girls and two little boys at that time. The names of the three little girls were Essie, Etta, and Linnie." Then the state's counsel asked him whether or not his wife was dead at that time. He answered: "At that time my wife was dead." State's counsel then asked him when his wife died, to which he replied: "My wife died four years ago last fall, the fall of 1911." The appellant objected to the said questions by the state, asking whether or not his wife was dead at that time and his answers thereto, and the state's further question of him when she died and his answer thereto, "for the reason that same was immaterial, irrelevant, and calculated to inflame the minds of the jury, and to prejudice the rights of the defendant before the jury." The court overruled these objections, and permitted the questions and answers above objected to. The court in approving the bills qualified them by stating the court did not believe the defendant could waive or the state dispense with the proof of prosecutrix's age, and he admitted the proof to account for the absence of the mother as a witness to the age of the prosecutrix. We think the appellant could admit and be bound thereby; that the prosecutrix was not 15 years of age at the time of the alleged offense upon her; and that the court in assigning this as his reason for admitting said testimony may have been incorrect, but even his assigning an incorrect reason would not make the evidence inadmissible, if it otherwise was admissible. If the evidence was admissible for any legitimate purpose, neither the bill nor the record anywhere shows, or tends to show, that any improper use was made thereof, nor how its introduction was calculated to inflame the minds of the jury, or prejudice appellant's rights, are shown or attempted to be shown.

Evidently the contention of the appellant before the jury, among other things, was that the different members of the Moore family were about the premises or in or about the house at the time of the alleged offense so that they could and would have known what was being done, or that the testimony of the prosecutrix was not to be believed, because different members of the family were about in such way as that the offense would not have been committed at the time and place the prosecutrix testified it was. The record, as the bill, shows that it was proven without objection who constituted the other members of the family, the father and the six children, and the whereabouts of each at this particular time was fully shown so as to account for their not being present or in proximity at the time where the offense was alleged and shown to have been committed. Upon a thorough investigation and consideration of this character of question in the case of Sweeney v. State, 146 S. W. 888, this court held: "The rule, without question, is that either side can introduce any pertinent testimony tending to prove any pertinent issue in the case, or which may do away with, or lessen, the adverse effect of any proper deduction that may be made from evidence that is introduced against him. In the recent work of Standard Ency. of Law & Proc. (vol. 2, p. 773), the correct doctrine is thus laid down: 'On the trial of a criminal case the failure to produce available witnesses, the absence of any evidence willfully omitted, forms a predicate for any legitimate deduction for or against the defendant, where the materiality and competency of such evidence appears * * *—citing many authorities sustaining this rule. Among them are cases from the United States (Supreme Court), Alabama, Georgia, Iowa, Kansas, Kentucky, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, North Carolina, Oregon, Texas, and Wisconsin. This same doctrine is also laid down in the recent work of 5 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law & Practice, p. 333, in this language: "The rule prevailing in civil cases, under which counsel may comment on the failure of the adverse party to produce evidence apparently accessible to him or witnesses having knowledge of the facts in issue, is likewise applicable in criminal cases. Counsel may comment on the failure of the state or defendant to produce such witnesses or evidence"—citing substantially the authorities as the other work quoted above cites. In the case of Graves v. United States, 150 U. S. 118, 14 Sup. Ct. 40, 37 L. Ed. 1021, the Supreme Court of the United States, through Mr. Justice Brown, said: "The rule, even in criminal cases, is that, if a party has it peculiarly within his power to produce witnesses whose testimony would elucidate the transaction, the fact that he does not do it creates the presumption that the testimony, if produced, would be unfavorable."

The record in this case, we think, demonstrates the application of the above rules thereto. As stated above, the state's theory was to account for the whereabouts of each member of prosecutrix's family at the time the alleged offense was committed for the purpose of showing that they were not in sight or hearing so as to have known, or seen, what was being done, and thereby tend to prevent a successful attack of the testimony of the prosecutrix on that theory. It was therefore very important, we think, for the state to show where the mother was; for, of all members of the family, the most natural and reasonable thing was, if she was living, for her to have been in or about the house and the premises, so that, if the offense was even attempted to have been committed, she would have known or heard of it at the time, and by her mere presence, if not otherwise, have prevented it. As a further illustration of this, the appellant had the state to admit that Essie Moore, one of the prosecutrix's sisters, had been duly subpoenaed to attend the trial of this case and that she was not present and in attendance thereon; that the state then showed it did not know why she was not in attendance; that she had been present at the former trials in Scurry and Haskell counties of other parties charged with rape upon this same girl. Evidently this was for the purpose of having the jury to consider, and it was doubtless commented upon by appellant's attorney in argument to the jury that the state had another witness who was not present at the trial who would and doubtless could have shed some light upon the case for the state, and, by not having her present, the jury should and would consider is as a circumstance against the state. So, doubtless, if the state had not accounted for the mother of the prosecutrix at the time by showing that she was dead, the same use of her absence would have been made by appellant's attorneys, and could have been made by the jury. Of all members of the family, under the circumstances, it was more necessary to account for the absence of the mother than any other member. In our opinion the evidence was admissible, and the court did not commit error in permitting the proof to be made. Sweeney v. State, 146 S. W. 883; subdivision 8, White's C. C. P. p. 659, and cases there cited.

[6] Doubtless, if any improper use of the testimony had been attempted by the state in argument before the jury, or otherwise, the court with, or perhaps without, any objection would have stopped and prevented this. Neither the bill nor record shows that any improper use was attempted of it, nor is it shown that it in any way inflamed the minds of the jury or prejudiced the rights of appellant. Even "the admission of illegal testimony will not constitute reversible error, unless some injury is shown or reasonably made to appear." Hooper v. State, 29 Tex. App. 616, 16 S. W. 655; Coyle v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 607, 21 S. W. 765; Tweedle v. State, 29 Tex. App. 590, 16 S. W. 544.

[7, 8] By another bill it is shown that the court limited the defendant to three witnesses for the purpose of proving that the reputation of prosecutrix in the community in which she lived was bad for virtue and chastity, he offering to place ten additional witnesses on the stand to make that proof; that the state's counsel contended before the court in the presence of the jury that such evidence was no defense, because the prosecutrix had already stated that she had other acts of sexual intercourse, which position of the state's counsel was sustained by the court. The court in allowing this bill qualified it by stating that he permitted four witnesses to the general reputation of the prosecutrix to be placed on the stand, one failing to qualify; that the court thought this sufficient, in view of the fact that prosecutrix admitted that she had carnal intercourse with four different men before this act with appellant. This shows no reversible error by the court. The only purpose for which such testimony is admissible in a rape case is where the alleged raped person is a woman more than 15 years of age at the time, and solely for the purpose of consideration by the jury to determine whether or not she consented to the act. Our statute on the subject makes it rape for a man to have sexual intercourse with a girl under 15 years of age with her express consent, and the decisions hold that even where she has solicited and brought about the act. P. O. art. 1063; Robertson v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 494, 102 S. W. 1130, and many other cases might be cited, but we deem it unnecessary. So that the evidence in this case that the reputation of the prosecutrix was that of a lewd person, when it is conclusively shown that she was under 15 years of age at the time the act occurred, was not admissible for the purpose of affecting her credibility; but, even if it was, it was a conceded fact and not contested by the state, in fact, apparently asserted by the state, that she was this character of woman, and the additional evidence of other witnesses could not have made the fact clearer or more certain. Hence, in any event, the court did not err in this particular.

The only other question necessary to discuss and decide is what is raised by the third bill of exceptions. We quote that in full, omitting solely the style of the case and court at the head, and the signature of the judge at the end. It is: "Be it remembered that on this the 30th day of March, A. D. 1912, the defendant in the above entitled and numbered cause presented to this court his bill of exceptions No. 8, which in the opinion of the court not being a correct bill and not fairly presenting the matters therein set forth, the court herewith prepares and files this bill of exceptions, setting forth the matters and things as they occurred, in lieu of said bill of exceptions No. 8 presented to him by the defendant as aforesaid, the court bill of exceptions being as follows: Be it remembered that on the trial of the above styled and numbered cause in said court on the 7th and 8th days of March, A. D. 1912, the following proceedings were had, to wit: On said 8th day of March, A. D. 1912, while the defendant's witness H. P. Welborn was on the stand, counsel for the defendant M. E. Rosser, Esq., propounded to said witness in substance the following question: 'Were you present at Haskell, Texas, in December, 1911, at the trial of Charley Jones for the offense of rape on the prosecutrix, Etta Moore, in which he was acquitted?' To which counsel for the state objected, and made the remark 'that, if counsel for the defendant is ignorant of the law, he did not wish him to be fined,' and ask that he be required to stay within the law, and the court sustained the objection of the counsel for the state to said question, for the reason that in the trial of the state of Texas v. Charley Jones tried at Haskell, Tex., in which the said Charley Jones was tried for rape upon the prosecutrix in this case, the said Charley Jones was acquitted. There were four several indictments presented in the district court of Scurry county, Texas, charging different parties with rape upon said prosecutrix, Etta Moore, all charged to have been by different persons and on different occasions, one of the defendants under said indictments being the said Charley Jones, and one being Knox Kearse, the defendant in this case, and the said cases having no relation to each other, and the court being of the opinion that counsel for the defense in this case was merely trying to get before the jury the fact that in the trial of the case of the State of Texas versus Charley Jones at Haskell for rape upon the said prosecutrix in this case, that the said Charley Jones was acquitted, and that the same was not admissible for any purpose, and shed no light upon the facts in this case and had no bearing upon the facts in this case, sustained said objection of the state. That, after the court had sustained said objection of the state, a colloquy ensued between counsel for the defense and counsel for the state, and counsel for the defense, there being four of them, insisted on asking the question again, whereupon the court remarked that if counsel asked the question again that he would fine him in the sum of $50. The counsel for the defense then asked the court to withdraw the jury that he might make his objections and take his exceptions to the ruling of the court as aforesaid, which the court declined to do as such matters would necessarily delay the trial, the court at that time stating to counsel for the defense that they could put any objections they wanted to in their bill of exceptions; and afterward, during an intermission or recess in the trial of the case, the court told L. H. McCrea, one of the counsel for the defense, that he could put any objection in his bill that he wished, which the said L. H. McCrea stated was all right and all that they wanted, but that he believed the testimony was admissible. And afterward, to wit, at Snyder, Tex., when the said bill of exceptions of the defendant was presented to the court by Hardy Boyd, one of the counsel for the defense, the court then told the said Hardy Boyd that he could not approve the said bill of exceptions in the shape it was in, or the form in which he had it, and refused to approve same, but that, if he would prepare same and put in any objections to the ruling of the court that he wished to in said case, he could do so, and that he could set out any objections that he wished to the ruling of the court, which said counsel declined to do. Thereupon, the court refused to approve said bill of exceptions, and herewith filed this his bill of exceptions as the true and correct bill of exceptions in this case, and the same is ordered filed by the district clerk of Fisher county, Tex., as part of the record in this cause." On oral argument before this court in the submission of this case, it was stated by appellant's counsel, as we understood him, that the court refused to permit appellant to state what he wanted to prove by this witness Welborn which was the testimony of the prosecutrix in the trial of the Charley Jones case, which had occurred prior to this trial. It is due to the attorney who made this statement in oral argument to state he did not represent appellant in the court below and doubtless was not present and did not hear what then occurred.

[9] It is, and must necessarily be, the law that this court can look only to the authenticated record before it in considering any case on appeal, or any question raised or presented therein. We cannot under any circumstances look to the oral assertions of appellants or their attorneys in oral argument before this court. If this was not true, this court would in many cases be flooded by oral statements of attorneys and the parties for both sides of what occurred and what didn't occur, and what was said and what was not said in the trial court. If such were the case, this court would be converted into a trial court and have to have witnesses summoned, hear testimony, and pass upon the weight to be given thereto, and the credibility of the witnesses. And it would not be a Court of Appeals, as it exclusively is, and so fixed by the law.

We do not mean to be understood to imply a lack of faith in such statements by counsel in this case or any other. We are merely discussing what this court is confined to in considering the cases on appeal before it, and questions raised and presented by the record therein.

[10] The only reference to this matter, in any ground of the motion for new trial is the following: "(7) The court erred upon the trial of this cause wherein the defendant had placed the witness H. P. Welborn on the stand as a witness in his behalf when letting counsel M. E. Rosser propound to witness the following question: 'Were you present at Haskell, Tex., on December, 1911, and heard the trial of Charley Jones for the offense of rape with the prosecutrix, Etta Moore, in which he was acquitted,' in which private prosecutor, C. P. Woodruff, objected, in substance, 'that, if counsel for the defendant is ignorant of the law, we do not wish him fined, otherwise we ask the court to fine him and which the court remarked and reprimanded counsel that, if such a question was propounded again, he would fine counsel $50,' and whereupon co-counsel for defendant, L. H. McCrea, endeavored to present to the court the theory upon which said evidence would be admissible and in which the court refused to hear, and ordered counsel to be seated, which remarks and action of the court were calculated to mislead the jury in believing that the court might be biased or leaning to the state and to give undue prominence to the remarks of private prosecutor, and to belittle the attorneys for the defendant in the eyes of the jury, as shown by bill of exceptions No. 3, filed in the records of this cause." As we understood appellant's counsel in oral argument, he contended that the court below refused to permit appellant's attorney to tell the court at the time what they expected to prove by the witness Welborn as to what the prosecuting witness, Etta Moore, had testified on the trial of the Charley Jones case. This bill does not so state and nowhere so intimates, and neither does the motion for new trial. Neither is it anywhere so made to appear either directly or indirectly by the record elsewhere or anywhere. The bill expressly states that when the question was asked, and the court sustained the objection thereto, the appellant's attorneys attempted to ask it again, and the court refused to even permit them to do that. The bill then shows that the appellant's attorneys asked the court to withdraw the jury, not that he might state what the testimony he expected to prove would be, but "that he might make his objections and take his exceptions to the ruling of the court." The court declined to do this, then stating to the counsel that they could put any objections which they wanted to in their bill of exceptions, and that afterwards, during an intermission or recess of the trial, the court told one of appellant's counsel that he could put any objection in his bill that he wished, and that the counsel stated in reply that it "was all right," and all they wanted; that again, when another one of appellant's counsel presented his bill covering this matter to him, he was informed by the court that he could not approve it in the shape it was and refused to approve it, "but that, if he would prepare same and put in any objections to the ruling of the court that he wished to in said case, he could do so, and that he could set up any objections that he wished to the ruling of the court, which said counsel declined to do. Thereupon, the court prepared this bill and filed it in lieu of the one which had been presented to him, instead of the incorrect one which had been presented to him and which he refused. Again, we find in the record, statement of facts, that the official court stenographer who took down on the trial all of the testimony in the said Charley Jones case was present on this trial, and, introduced by appellant, testified that he was such official stenographer; that he did as such take down all the testimony in the Jones case, and had his notes with him, produced and identified them and then, without any objection whatever, by the state, reproduced such part of the testimony of Etta Moore in the Jones case, and read it in this, at the instance of the appellant herein, as he called for, reading it in full by question and answer.

So that we conclude from all this and the record as a whole that appellant's attorneys must have been in error in contending orally before this court that the lower court refused to permit appellant to tell what he expected to prove by the witness Welborn as to what said state's witness Etta Moore testified on the trial of the Charley Jones case.

[11] But, instead, that what appellant's attorneys sought to get before the jury in putting Welborn on the stand was to inject into the evidence, as shown by his questions and the attempted repetition thereof, that Jones was acquitted by the jury in his case. That such could be done no one could contend, and the court was correct in suppressing the injection of such testimony in this case, even if some temper and threat of a fine for so doing was shown and made.

[12] Art. 744, C. C. P., prescribes that on the trial of any criminal action the defendant, by himself or counsel, may tender his bill of exceptions to any decision, opinion, order, or charge of the court or other proceedings in the case; and the judge shall sign such bill of exceptions, under the rules prescribed in civil suits, in order that such decision, opinion, order, or charge may be revised upon appeal. There is no other statutory provision in our Criminal Codes, on this subject, so that we go to the Civil Code to determine what shall be done in cases arising as did this case. R. S. art. 2058 (1360), prescribes: "Whenever, in the progress of a cause, either party is dissatisfied with any ruling, opinion, or other action of the court, he may except thereto at the time the same is made, or announced, and at his request, time shall be given to embody such exception in a written bill." R. S. art. 2063 (1365), makes it the duty of the party taking any such bill to reduce it to writing and present it to the judge for his allowance and signature. The next article requires the judge to submit such bill to the adverse party or his counsel, if in attendance on the court, and, if found to be correct, to sign it without delay, and file it with the clerk. Then the succeeding articles of the statute are as follows:

"Art. 2065 (1367). If found incorrect. Should the judge find such bill of exceptions to be incorrect, he shall suggest to the party, or his counsel who drew it, such corrections as he may deem necessary therein; and if they are agreed to, he shall make such corrections and sign the same and file it with the clerk.

"Art. 2066. (1368) On disagreement, judge to make out bill, etc.—Should the party not agree to such corrections, the judge shall return the bill of exceptions to him with his refusal indorsed thereon, and shall make out and sign and file with the clerk such a bill of exceptions as will, in his opinion, present the ruling of the court in that behalf as it actually occurred.

"Art. 2067. (1369) Bystanders bill, how obtained. Should the party be dissatisfied with the bill of exceptions filed by the judge, as provided in the preceding article, he may, upon procuring the signatures of three respectable bystanders, citizens of this state, attesting the correctness of the bill of exceptions as presented by him, have the same filed as part of the record of the cause; and the truth of the matter in reference thereto may be controverted and maintained by affidavits, not exceeding five in number on each side, to be filed with the papers of the cause, within ten days after the filing of such bill of exceptions, and to be considered as a part of the record relating thereto. When the court refuses to sign a correct bill of exceptions, such proceedings may be had in the court of civil appeals, as is prescribed in article 1607."

In our opinion the said bill No. 3, above quoted, shows that the judge substantially, if not literally, complied with this law and his duty. The appellant in no way shown by the record contested by affidavit or otherwise the correctness of the judge's bill, or of any of the facts and circumstances stated by him as having occurred. But, on the contrary, as we take it, his counsel were satisfied with the bill as prepared by the judge. Under the circumstances, it will not meet the question to say that the bystanders would not have known, and could not have known, what they expected to prove by the witness. They, the attorneys, could, at least, have made their affidavits of what this was, if it was other or different from what the judge states in the bill. Again (R. S. art. 1607 [1014]) the statute referred to in article 2067, above quoted, expressly states: "And the court (appellate court) shall admit as part of the record to be examined by them in the trial of a cause, every bill of exceptions not signed by the judge trying the cause below, upon its appearing to the satisfaction of the court (appellate court) that the facts are fairly stated therein; that said bill was prepared in accordance with the law governing the preparation of such bills and that the judge trying the cause refused to sign the same; and the truth of any such bill of exceptions shall be determined by the court (appellate court) on the copies of the affidavits required by law to be made in such case, such copies to be copied in, and to form a part of the record transmitted to the Court of Civil Appeals (or Criminal Appeals)." The record nowhere and in no way shows that any such affidavit was filed in the lower court, and none such is contained in the record before us.

[13] It has always been held by this and the civil courts that, as the statute requires, it would be proper for the court, when an objection is made and a bill of exceptions is taken, to stop the trial a sufficient length of time to then and there prepare, sign, and approve such bill. The general practice, however, in the trial courts is not to do this. But it has also always been held that even when this is not done and the party is afterwards given his bill in full, the mere fact that the court did not suspend the trial and give it to him when first taken would not be reversible error, and no case has been reversed, so far as we know, because the court did not stop the trial, and then and there give the party a bill of exceptions.

We therefore hold as this matter is presented to us that the appellant has no cause of complaint that would justify this court to reverse this cause.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

LITTLE v. JAMES McCORD CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 28, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 12, 1912.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—DANGEROUS PREMISES—ATTRACTIVE TO CHILDREN.

One who leaves unguarded dangerous machinery usually attractive to children is liable for injuries to a child attracted to the machinery, though he is there without express permission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 84; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—NEGLIGENCE—QUESTIONS FOR JURY.

Where an owner of explosives, consisting of Roman candles, skyrockets, and other explosives made to amuse children on holiday occasions, placed them on the premises of a third person to which children, either as licensees or trespassers, had for a long time resorted, he owed to such children the legal duty of guarding the explosives, and where he failed to do so, and a child was injured by an explosion while playing with one of the explosives, the question of his guilt of actionable negligence was for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—INJURIES TO CHILDREN—PROXIMATE CAUSE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether the negligence of an owner of explosives, who placed them on the premises of a third person to which children resorted, was the proximate cause of an injury to a child, caused by an explosive exploding while the child handled it, held under the evidence for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Explosives, Cent. Dig. §§ 4, 5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 136*)—DANGEROUS PREMISES—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Whether a child, injured by an explosion of an explosive left by the owner on the premises of a third person, was guilty of contributory negligence in handling the explosive at the time of the explosion, held under the evidence for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 277-358; Dec. Dig. § 136.*]

On Motion for Rehearing.

5. EXPLOSIVES (§ 8*)—DANGEROUS PREMISES—LIABILITY.

Where an owner of explosives placed them on the premises of a third person, and children visited the premises in search of pecans without permission from any one, and while on the premises for that purpose discovered the explosives and then left and subsequently returned for the sole purpose of examining and playing with the explosives, and a child was injured in consequence of an explosion, the owner of the explosives could not escape liability on the ground that the pecans furnished the chief attraction which induced the children to visit the premises.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County; Jas. W. Swayne, Judge.

Action by Fred Little, by next friend, against the James McCord Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

McLean & Carlock, of Ft. Worth, for appellant. Slay, Simon & Wynn, of Ft. Worth, for appellee.

HODGES, J. Fred Little, a minor, by his next friend sued the James McCord Company for personal injuries. The petition alleges that the James McCord Company is a private corporation and owns a building called a "magazine" situated on a lot in the city of Ft. Worth, in which are stored skyrockets, firecrackers, Roman candles, dynamite caps, and other explosives; that in November, 1910, defendant carried from its magazine and deposited in an open lot a large quantity of those explosives; that the lot where this material was deposited was a pecan grove near a public highway and possessed peculiar attractions to children of tender years and was a place where such children were accustomed to resort. It was further alleged that the plaintiff was a boy 12 years of age, and was attracted to the place where those explosives had been left scattered upon the ground, and was prompted by his childish impulses to appropriate some of them; that in attempting to break one of the pieces on a rock it exploded with great violence and blew off his right hand. It is claimed that appellee was negligent in depositing dangerous and attractive explosives at a place where young children were accustomed to resort. In addition to a general denial, the defendant pleaded that the premises where the explosives were deposited were private property, and that the plaintiff was trespassing at the time he entered thereon and carried away the material which caused his injury. It is further alleged that he failed to exercise ordinary care in handling the explosive. Both the plaintiff and the defendant introduced testimony, and at the conclusion the jury were peremptorily instructed to return a verdict for the defendant. From the judgment rendered in accordance with that verdict this appeal is prosecuted.

The only assignment of error is one which assails the action of the court in directing the verdict for the defendant. There appears to be no dispute in the testimony about the fact that appellant was injured in the manner and by the agency alleged; neither is there any controversy as to the fact that the appellee owned the magazine and the explosives, and that its agents had previously carried them out of the building and deposited the box in which they were contained in an open lot where they were accessible to any one who might wish to appropriate them. The evidence showed that the lot upon which the magazine was situated belonged to the Collins estate and was under the management and control of Judge C. K. Bell, the administrator of that estate. It also appears that the lot was a strip of land about 180 feet wide and much longer, lying adjacent to one of the highways of the city and in a vicinity containing some private residences. The appellee did not have any interest in the lot, and its magazine was kept there by permission of the administrator. A negro named William Cowen occupied a residence upon the lot, with his family, and was charged with the duty of looking after the property and keeping off trespassers. There were quite a number of pecan trees situated on this lot, and it required some effort to prevent trespassers from depredating thereon during the season when pecans were falling. The premises were inclosed with a wire fence, and were entered through a gate situated near the house occupied by Cowen. Notices showing that the premises were posted were to be seen at different points over the fence and near the gate. Under one of the large pecan trees was a swing such as are used by children at play, which had been placed there some time during the year preceding appellant's injury. In November, 1910, and prior to the day when the appellant was injured, the appellee had its magazine cleared of old material which was considered worthless for the market. One of the employes testified that in cleaning out the magazine a large wooden box filled with this rubbish was carried out about a hundred feet and dumped upon the ground near one of those pecan trees. Another of appellee's employes testified that on previous occasions when the magazine was cleaned out it was the practice to burn the old material but that was not done on this occasion because of the high wind prevailing at the time and the danger of communicating fire to other objects. The appellant, Fred Little, testified in substance that the accident occurred on Monday, November 28, 1910, and that he was 12 years old in the preceding September. On the Sunday before the accident he, in company with some other boys near his age, went to this lot for the purpose of getting pecans. They were standing on the outside of the fence when Jess Cowen, the son of William Cowen, invited them to come inside. They entered through the gate, which at the time was partly open, and after gathering pecans started home. The Cowen boy then called their attention to this material, which had been placed near one of the pecan trees by the agents of the appellee. He testified that this rubbish was about 50 feet from the gate and within about 25 feet of the swing previously mentioned. The box was open, and the material was scattered around upon the ground. There was quite a lot of it. They took a few articles which they called "sparklers," something attached to a piece of wire which when ignited would emit sparks but made no noise. Some of these he carried home with him. He returned about 2 o'clock the same afternoon. His father, mother, uncle, and aunt were with him. On the following Monday he attended school, and while there he and several other boys agreed to again visit this pile of explosives and get some of them. They were dismissed from school about 3 o'clock, and immediately repaired to the grove for that purpose. They picked up some of the material and started home. Appellant says that he carried some in his cap—had about 10 or 12 boxes of what he called "dynamite caps." He had never seen anything like that before. They had melted and run together. He had seen the little ones, but not those which had coagulated. They all started home; and after reaching a point about a quarter of a mile distant he undertook to break one of those which had melted and run together, for the purpose of giving a piece of it to one of the other boys, when it exploded with great force and blew off his right hand. He undertook to break it upon a rock, and stated that he had no idea that there was any danger in doing so. He admitted that he knew the grounds were posted, and that he had seen the sign. A chemist who testified upon the trial stated that he had examined the explosives which were shown to be similar to the one that caused the injury, and found that they contained a mixture of potassium chlorate and sulphur mixed with sand; that when the sand is struck there is a certain amount of friction, or heat, generated, causing the sulphur to unite with the oxygen, producing combustion; that it was the friction and striking that caused the explosion. It appears from other portions of the testimony that these explosives had previously been a part of the appellee's stock of goods, and for some reason had become melted, or partially dissolved by water, and had run together, so that numbers of them were sometimes coagulated into a single mass. There was other testimony sufficient to show that boys in large numbers frequented this lot in search of pecans; that sometimes they were ordered out by Cowen or members of his family, and at other times they were not molested. Cowen's testimony justified the inference that he was willing for some of the boys who resided in the neighborhood to come on the premises and gather pecans after he had supplied Judge Bell and himself. In one portion of his testimony Cowen stated that it was impossible to keep the boys away; that they "came there in droves."

[1, 2] In order to establish a legal liability in a case like this, it is necessary that the evidence be sufficient to support a finding by the jury that the defendant owed the plaintiff a legal duty and had negligently failed to perform it. In the case of Dobbins v. Railway Co., 91 Tex. 60, 41 S. W. 62, 38 L. R. A. 573, 66 Am. St. Rep. 856, an effort was made to hold the defendant liable for the death of a small child that was drowned in a pond of water caused by the construction of the railroad. The facts were held insufficient; the court concluding as a matter of law that an ordinary pond of water was not so unusually attractive to children as to impose upon the owner of the premises any duty to guard against its use by them. In disposing of the case, Judge Denman used the following language: "The common law imposes no duty upon the owner to use care to keep his property in such condition that persons going thereon without his invitation may not be injured. In considering the question as to whether a duty exists, there is no distinction between a case where an infant is injured and one where the injury is to an adult, though where the duty is imposed the law may exact more vigilance in its discharge as to the former." But in the well-known "turntable cases" it is held that the owner cannot escape liability for a resulting injury if he places on his premises and leaves unguarded dangerous machinery unusually attractive to children, even though the injured child was there without express permission. Railway Co. v. Morgan, 92 Tex. 102, 46 S. W. 28. There is no sound reason for restricting that rule to injuries resulting from unguarded turntables. It is not because the object which furnished the attraction and caused the injury is a turntable, and the owner of the premises a railroad corporation, that the duty of exercising due care to save children from their own indiscretion is imposed in such cases; but the rule is regarded as a salutary requirement which should be enforced for the protection of the lives and limbs of those too young to be held responsible, under all conditions, for their own lack of judgment. Human life and personal safety are the most important objects of governmental protection, and the policy of imposing civil liability upon those whose carelessness or indifference may cause the loss of either is one of the most effective means of inspiring a proper degree of diligence to avoid injurious or fatal accidents resulting from exposure to dangerous agencies and hazardous situations. There was evidence offered upon the trial of this case sufficient to warrant the jury in finding the following facts: That a box containing dangerous explosives was taken by agents of the appellee from its magazine and dumped upon the ground in a lot which was at the time under the management and control of a third party; that this lot, though inclosed and posted, was frequently visited by children, some of whom went there by invitation from the occupants, and a large number of others either as licensees or trespassers; that the chief attraction which caused children to resort to that place was the large number of pecan trees growing thereon, and a desire to gather nuts during the pecan season; that this attraction was so strong that those in charge of the premises were unable to keep children away. If an ordinary turntable may be looked upon as such an unusually attractive object as to impose upon owners the duty of guarding against its use by children, we see no good reason why Roman candles, skyrockets and other explosives made for the purpose of amusing children at Christmas times and on holiday occasions should not also be so regarded. Hence the jury would have been justified in this case in concluding that the defendant had placed upon this lot, to which large numbers of children resorted, dangerous explosives unusually attractive to them. It would seem that these facts are sufficient to show the existence of the legal duty before referred to, and a failure in its performance. Whether or not this failure was the result of negligence on the part of the defendant is an issue of fact which might, under the evidence, have been determined against the appellee.

We have so far inquired into the sufficiency of the evidence to support a finding in favor of the plaintiff upon the hypothesis that the defendant was either the owner of the premises or had the legal right to use them as a dumping ground for its waste material. The facts do not entirely justify that inference. The evidence shows that the James McCord Company had merely the permissive right to maintain a magazine for the storage of such explosives upon those premises, and the incidental right of ingress and egress. While there was no objection made to leaving this rubbish upon the premises, the evidence shows that no opportunity was given for any; that the owner and manager had no notice that it was done until after the accident occurred. By discarding this rubbish in the manner shown by the evidence, the appellee extended to all children who might go upon those premises an implied invitation to appropriate as much of it as they saw fit. Whether the children were rightfully there, or were there as trespassers, they violated no rights of the defendant in availing themselves of that privilege.

[3, 4] It is also contended that, even if the defendant be held negligent in leaving the explosive material where it was, its negligence was not the proximate cause of the injury. That issue and the defense of contributory negligence were questions which should, under proper instructions, have been submitted for determination by the jury.

Our conclusion is that the trial court erred in instructing a peremptory verdict for the defendant. The judgment will therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[5] Counsel for appellee insist in their motion for a rehearing that, inasmuch as the evidence conclusively shows that the pecans furnished the chief attraction which induced children to visit that inclosure, there should be no liability attached to the conduct of the appellee in placing other objects thereon which did not furnish any attraction for children to resort to that place. The argument is based upon a misconception of what we think is the underlying principle upon which the liability of the appellee in this case must rest. It is true that the evidence does show that up to the time of the appellant's first visit to that place the pecans were the only attraction, and that on that occasion he went inside only in response to an invitation from Cowen's boy. But it is also true that large numbers of children did visit that grove in search of pecans, and did so without any permission from any one. This created a condition which even the owner of the premises could not wholly ignore in casting away or depositing thereon dangerous objects possessing special or unusual attractions to such children. Certainly the right to so encumber the premises with such dangerous and attractive objects would be still less available to one who had no legal right to so use such premises. The proof in this case does show that, on the occasion when those explosives were obtained and carried away by the appellant and his companions, they were attracted to that place by these objects alone. If the conduct of the appellee in depositing them in that particular place should not here be held as tantamount to an implied invitation to enter the inclosure, it must be due to the fact that appellee had no authority to extend such an invitation. It did, however, extend an invitation, in so far as one may be implied from casting away such toys and playthings, to all children who might be upon those premises from any motive or purpose. There can be no hard and fast rule laid down by the courts for determining common-law liability resulting from personal negligence. Each case must be determined by its own facts. The question presented is: Would a person of ordinary prudence have deposited such objects at such a place under the circumstances detailed by the evidence in this case? We adhere to the holding that the evidence presented a question which the court should have submitted to the jury, and the motion is overruled.

T. C. R. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. El Paso.
Nov. 21, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 732*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SPECIFICATIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

An assignment of error that the court erred in denying a new trial for the reasons in the bill of exceptions, based on errors in the charge, and in granting special charges, cannot be considered, because it fails to specify the grounds of error relied on, as required by Rev. St. 1895, art. 1018, and court rules 24-26 (142 S. W. xii).

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITIONS—REQUISITES.

A proposition following an assignment of error, which only refers to propositions under other assignments of error, violates court rules 30, 33 (142 S. W. xiii), providing that each point under each assignment shall be stated as a proposition, which shall refer to the particular grounds relied on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3000; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITIONS.

Where the proposition subjoined to an assignment of error complaining of a paragraph of the charge copied in the assignment complains of the charge for failure to instruct on matters raised by the evidence, but fails to disclose the evidence, and the only statement following the proposition is a quotation from the petition, the assignment cannot be considered, in view of court rule 31 (142 S. W. xiii), providing that to each proposition there shall be subjoined a statement of the proceedings in the record necessary to support the proposition.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITIONS.

Where the propositions following an assignment of error complaining of the giving of a special requested charge do not point out wherein the charge is erroneous, and the subjoined statements to the propositions do not disclose error, the assignment will not be considered.

Appeal from District Court, Grimes County; S. W. Dean, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Anna Sullivan and others against the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

T. C. Buffington and T. P. Buffington, both of Navasota, for appellants. Baker, Botts, Parker & Garwood and Jno. T. Garrison, all of Houston, and Geo. D. Neal, of Navasota, for appellee.

MCKENZIE, J. Mrs. Anna Sullivan, for herself and minor children, sued the Houston & Texas Central Railroad Company, in the district court of Grimes county, to recover damages for the death of her husband, W. A. Sullivan, alleging that the accident occurred at a bridge, which bridge was constructed over a bar pit at or near the railroad crossing upon the defendant's right of way. The deceased was in his buggy, driving across said bridge, and while crossing the horse which he was driving backed, with the buggy, off of the bridge; the horse falling upon the deceased and inflicting injuries which caused his death. The negligence alleged was that the said bridge, which was constructed by the railroad company on its right of way leading to the crossing, was constructed so that the floor formed a steep incline, and that the bridge was without banisters; that both the incline of the bridge and the lack of banisters rendered said bridge unsafe for travelers in going over same to reach the crossing.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Appellee urges objection to the consideration of each of the appellants' assignments of error. We will treat of these objections in their order, as we consider the respective assignments of error.

[1, 2] Appellants' first assignment of error is as follows: "The court erred in refusing to grant plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, filed by plaintiffs herein on the 15th day of June, A. D. 1911, and in refusing to set aside the verdict and judgment entered in this case. Said motion for a new trial should have been granted, because of the reasons set forth in plaintiffs' bills of exceptions from 1 to 6, being errors in the general charge of the court, and in granting certain special charges asked by the defendant; and because of the errors so committed plaintiffs did not have a fair and impartial trial of this case—the errors so committed being prejudicial to plaintiffs' rights before the jury." To this assignment is the following proposition: "Same proposition, statement, and authorities as under third, fifth, sixth, seventh, and eighth assignments of error." This proposition is not followed by any statement. The assignment of error cannot be considered by the court, because it does not distinctly specify the grounds relied upon, as required by article 1018, Revised Statute of 1895. It appears that the assignment, as well as the proposition, also violates the rules which govern this court. See Rules, 102 Tex. xii, 67 S. W. xi. Rule 24 (102 Tex. xxviii, 67 S. W. xv) requires that the assignment shall distinctly specify the ground relied upon; and it is provided by rule 25 (102 Tex. xxviii, 67 S. W. xv) that, "to be a distinct specification of error, it must point out that part of the proceedings contained in the record in which the error is complained of, in a particular manner, so as to identify it. * * *". And rule 26 (102 Tex. xxviii, 67 S. W. xv) provides that "assignments of error which are expressed only in such general terms as that the court erred in its rulings upon the pleadings, when there are more than one, or in its charge, when there are a number of charges, or the verdict is contrary to law, or to the charge of the court, and the like, without referring to and identifying the proceeding, will not be regarded by the court as a compliance with the statute requiring the grounds to be distinctly specified, and will be considered as a waiver of errors, the same as if no assignment of errors had been attempted to be filed." As to the kind of proposition required, it is provided in rule 30 (102 Tex. xxix, 67 S. W. xvi) that "each point under each assignment shall be stated as a proposition, unless the assignment itself may sufficiently disclose the point, in which event it may be sufficient to copy the assignment." Rule 33 (102 Tex. xxviii, 67 S. W. xvi) provides that "in a proposition relating to error of the court in overruling a motion for a new trial or to arrest the judgment, in which there are several grounds, the particular ground or grounds should be referred to with the appropriate explanation. * * *". As to the required statement which must be subjoined to the proposition, rule 31 (102 Tex. xxviii, 67 S. W. xvi) requires that "to each of said propositions there shall be subjoined a brief statement, in substance, of such proceedings, or part thereof, contained in the record, as will be necessary and sufficient to explain and support the proposition, with a reference to the pages of the record. * * *".

It will be observed from the foregoing that appellants have flagrantly disregarded the statute and the rules of the court in preparing their cause for submission: First. The assignment is not sufficient, in that it fails to distinctly specify the grounds, as required by article 1018, supra, and rules 24, 25, and 26, supra. Second. The proposition following the assignment violates rules 30 and 33, supra, and is insufficient, also, because it only refers the court to propositions to be found under other assignments of error, which is not permissible. San Antonio Foundry Co. v. Drish, 38 Tex. Civ. App. 214, 85 S. W. 440. By reference, however, to the propositions under said assignments, we find as many separate propositions as there are assignments of error, dealing with different subjects. This is not permissible. McAllen v. Raphael, 98 S. W. 760.

We overrule appellants' third assignment of error. The charge of the court as complained of, when taken in connection with the other part of the charge, is quite sufficient, and certainly the jury was not misled thereby.

[3] The fifth assignment of error complains of the eighth paragraph of the general charge of the court, which paragraph is copied in the assignment. The proposition following the assignment does not complain that the charge of the court is incorrect, but rather as omitting to charge upon matters which appellants contend were raised by the evidence. The proposition subjoined to the assignment fails to disclose what this evidence is; and the only statement following the proposition and assignment appears to be a quotation from plaintiffs' petition. Certainly the allegations in the petition cannot be considered by this court as evidence. The statement fails to explain and support the proposition as made, and is therefore in violation of the requirements of rule 31, supra. Nothing is stated under the assignment and proposition in appellants' brief which discloses any error, or that appellants were injured in the manner by the charge; nor does it show that the charge as given did not cover fully all the issues as raised by the evidence. We are not warranted, therefore, in considering further this assignment. Wirtz v. G., H. & S. A. Ry. Co., 132 S. W. 513.

[4] Under the sixth assignment complaint is made to a special charge requested by the defendant and given by the court to the jury. We have examined the two propositions in appellants' brief following the assignment, and neither of said propositions points out wherein the charge is erroneous; nor do the subjoined statements to the propositions disclose error, so far as we are able to determine. The evidence set out in the statement under the second proposition fails to disclose harmful error in the charge; and certainly we would not be required to go to the record and there search for some proof which would render the charge complained of inapplicable. We are of opinion, for the reasons as given, that this assignment should not be further considered.

The eighth assignment of error, complaining of a special charge given by the court to the jury, is not considered, because the appellants merely refer us to "same proposition as under the sixth assignment of error." This is not permissible. San Antonio Foundry Co. v. Drish, supra. The statement subjoined fails to disclose wherein the charge, as submitted by the court to the jury, was not wholly justified.

Having considered the assignments of error as presented in appellants' brief, and finding no error which would require a reversal of this cause, we are of opinion that the case should be, in all things, affirmed.

Affirmed.

CONTINENTAL LUMBER & TIE CO. v. WILROY.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Galveston. Oct. 22, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Nov. 21, 1912.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 26*) — DISCRETION OF COURT.

Defendant caused depositions to be taken, which were duly returned to the district clerk on November 18, 1910, during the November term of court. About May 8, 1911, defendant's counsel discovered that the depositions could not be found in the district clerk's office, and wired to the notary taking them, who informed counsel that the depositions had been mailed to the clerk as instructed, whereupon defendant applied for a continuance for want of such depositions, stating the facts. A previous continuance had been granted for another cause. The depositions were merely cumulative of evidence given somewhat fully at trial. Held, in view of counsel's delay in not inquiring whether the depositions had been returned, that there was no abuse of discretion in overruling the application for a continuance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 74-93; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

2. CONTINUANCE (§ 51*) — SECOND APPLICATION.

It is within the sound discretion of the court to grant or refuse a second application for a continuance, which is not strictly a statutory application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 69, 79, 85, 87, 88, 118, 123, 130, 132, 135, 141, 147; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

On Motion for Rehearing.

3. COURTS (§ 116*)—RECORDS—JURISDICTION—IN VACATION.

An order of the judge, made in vacation, after trial and adjournment of court, incorporating certain depositions in the record, was without authority and ineffectual for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Courts, Cent. Dig. §§ 369-373; Dec. Dig. § 116.*]

4. CONTINUANCE (§ 26*)—DILIGENCE.

If defendant's counsel were advised by letter in November, 1910, from the notary public, who took depositions for use at trial, that the depositions had been taken and mailed to the clerk of court, counsel could assume that the depositions were on file, and were not guilty of a lack of diligence in not inquiring until the time of trial, in May, 1911, as to whether the depositions were on file, so as to preclude them from moving for a continuance because of their loss, first discovered at the trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 74-93; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 671*) — PRESENTATION BELOW.

An appellate court is only required to pass upon the action of the trial court as shown by the record, so that, in determining whether an application for a continuance was properly overruled, it can only consider the facts stated in the application, as shown by the trial court's record.

Appeal from District Court, Angelina County.

Action by Joe Wilroy against the Continental Lumber & Tie Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Mantooth & Collins, of Lufkin, and Lane, Wolters & Storey, of Houston, for appellant. W. J. Townsend, Jr., of Lufkin, for appellee.

REESE, J. This suit was instituted in the district court by Joe Wilroy against the Continental Lumber & Tie Company to recover a debt alleged to be owing to plaintiff by defendant, being the contract price for a lot of ties sold by plaintiff to defendant. The defense was that a large portion of the ties were not first-class ties, as were contracted for. A trial with a jury resulted in a judgment for plaintiff for $1,121.97, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] There are three assignments of error in the brief of appellant, all presenting the same question, to wit, the error in overruling appellant's application for continuance. No question is raised on the facts by the assignments. As appears from the bill of exceptions, the application for continuance was the second application made by appellant. The facts pertinent to the question, as shown by the bill of exceptions and the record, are as follows: The suit was instituted by filing the original petition on the 19th day of February, 1910. It does not appear when service was had on defendant; but it filed its original answer, presenting a valid and meritorious defense, on May 5, 1910. The terms of court in the county began on the first Mondays in May and November, respectively. It does not appear why the case was continued at either the first or second terms; but at one or the other of them the case was continued on the application of the defendant, as shown by the fact that the application for continuance under consideration, made at the May term, 1911, was its second application. In June, 1910, appellant had an inspection made of the ties by William Blair and A. T. Thompson at Clifton, Ariz., to which point they had been shipped, and in June, 1910, at the same time, it had certain photographs taken of some of the ties. About the 12th of November, 1910, appellant filed interrogatories to Blair, Thompson, and Dunlap, and had their depositions taken in answer thereto. The depositions were duly returned to the district clerk on November 16, 1910, which must have been during the November term of the court. About May 8, 1911, counsel for appellant discovered that these depositions could not be found in the district clerk's office, and on that day they wired to the officer to whom the commission had been sent, inquiring whether the depositions had been returned. The telegram states that the case was then on call. In reply to this message the officer wired that the depositions had been mailed as instructed. The case being called for trial, appellant made application in the usual form for continuance for want of these depositions, stating the facts about their taking and return, and attaching to the application, as part thereof, a copy of the answers, which we presume had been procured from the officer, who stated in his message that he had such copy. The testimony was material to the defense set up in the answer. The photographs were attached to Dunlap's deposition. The application was made and overruled on May 12, 1911. After the adjournment of the May term of court the depositions were found in a box in the district clerk's office, unopened. After stating the facts with regard to the taking, return, and loss of the depositions, the application states in the usual form that it was not made for delay, and that the testimony could not be procured from any other source. It is shown by the depositions of these witnesses that George A. Wagstaff and George M. Coale were present when the inspection referred to in Arizona was made, and participated therein; Coale being an officer of appellant, and Wagstaff a tie inspector for the railway company to whom the ties had been contracted to be sold. On the trial Wagstaff testified by depositions; his testimony being substantially the same as that of Blair and Thompson. Dunlap seems to have testified only as to the photographs taken by him. Coale appeared in person and testified for appellant on the trial, at considerable length and very fully, and in substance to the same effect as Blair and Thompson.

[2] The above are the material facts to be gathered from the record. The application being the second one, and not strictly a statutory application, it was within the sound discretion of the court to grant or refuse it. We think the record shows such want of diligence on the part of appellant as justifies the action of the court. At least, we cannot say that his action was such an abuse of his discretion as would authorize this court to reverse the judgment, in the circumstances stated. It will be seen that appellant made no inquiry as to the return of the deposition from November 16th, when they were returned and filed, until the case was called for trial on May 8, 1911. They had not even been opened. It seems to us that the most ordinary diligence, in the circumstances, the case having been once continued on its application, required appellant to learn whether these depositions had been taken and returned, at least after the lapse of a reasonable time for doing so. If such inquiry had been seasonably made, it would have disclosed the loss of the depositions in ample time for appellant to have again filed interrogatories and taken the depositions. If it be urged that the missing photographs could not have been again procured, that is no answer, because the continuance, if granted, could not enable appellant to do so. While we cannot agree with appellee that the mere fact that the testimony is merely cumulative of that of Wagstaff and Coale, and several other witnesses who testified for appellant as to the character of the ties, would of itself justify the overruling of the application, in case proper diligence had been shown, still this fact must also be taken into consideration in determining whether there has been an abuse, or a proper exercise, of discretion on the part of the trial court.

We are of the opinion that the assignments of error present no grounds for reversal, and the judgment is therefore affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

[3] On motion for rehearing appellant insists strenuously that the opinion in this case imposes upon attorneys duties entirely too onerous, and that it would require of them, in the exercise of proper diligence, to keep track, by daily inquiry of the clerk, of important papers filed in the case. If this be the effect of the opinion, it is clearly wrong; and if we thought that it was susceptible of such construction, it would be promptly withdrawn, and this motion granted. It is not necessary here to restate the facts as they were made to appear to the trial court in the motion for a continuance. We may say here that, as the depositions were not found until after the notice for continuance had been overruled, the case tried, and the court adjourned, there is no way that we know of by which this fact could be incorporated in the record or considered by us on this appeal. The order of the judge, made in vacation, directing the depositions, together with the fact with regard to their having been found, to be incorporated in the record, was made without authority. It is not an order of the court.

[4] But, aside from this, counsel for appellant, in this motion for a rehearing, show that in fact the notary who took these depositions advised them by a letter of date November 12, 1910, which was the day the depositions were taken, and which letter was promptly received by them, that the depositions had been taken, and had been that day mailed to the clerk. The letter, which is appended to the motion, also states that copies of the answers are inclosed. This puts an entirely different aspect upon the question of the diligence of counsel. Having been advised that the depositions had been taken and returned, and having copies of the answers, counsel for appellant could safely assume that they were on file with the papers of the case, and their failure to inquire for them, in these circumstances, until they were needed on the trial, was the exercise of proper diligence. Certainly an attorney, who has once informed himself that depositions have been taken and filed, has a right to assume that they will be safely kept by the clerk, and is not required by subsequent inquiry to keep himself informed whether the papers have been lost or mislaid, unless there be some special circumstance, not present in this case, to call for such inquiry. Now this is the case made by the motion for rehearing. Appellants had a copy of the answers, and therefore did not need to cause the depositions to be opened until needed at the trial, unless there was some informality in their taking and return, which could only be discovered by inspection. But no such thing appears to be present here.

[5] But can these facts, now shown for the first time, avail appellants? We are called upon to pass upon the action of the trial court. The appellee is required to respond to such errors as are assigned, upon the record as presented. If the trial court erred in overruling the application for continuance, a new trial should be granted. But how can we say that the trial court erred, unless such error is shown by the record in that court. The case presented by the application for continuance is shown by the opinion. No reference is made to the fact that appellant's counsel had been advised by the notary on November 12th that the depositions had been taken and returned, and that a copy of the answers had been then sent to them; but, on the contrary, the application has attached to it the telegram received from the notary on May 8th, when the case was on call, in reply to a telegram from counsel to the notary, making inquiry as to whether the depositions had ever been taken and returned. It is stated in the motion filed May 12, 1911, that "defendant has reason to believe and does believe that the depositions of said witnesses were taken on the 12th day of November, 1910, at Clifton, Ariz., and duly returned into this court." There is attached to the motion the following telegrams:

"May 8, 1911.

"To T. B. Inglis, Clifton, Ariz.: Did you return depositions to Lufkin, Texas, in case Joe Wilroy v. Continental Lumber & Tie Company. Attorneys there report they have not been received. Case on call. Please answer immediately."

"Your wire received depositions in case of Wilroy versus Continental Company mailed to Lufkin, Texas, as you instructed have duplicate on file if you want it.

"T. B. Inglis."

There is no reference in the application to the most important fact, as showing diligence on the part of appellant's counsel, that they were relying upon the information conveyed to them by the letter of November 12, 1910, that depositions had been taken and returned, and a copy of the answers then received by them. There was sufficient time from the date of the telegrams of May 8, 1911, to the date of the application, May 12, 1911, for the notary to have sent to appellant's counsel the copy of the answers which he then advised them he had.

It was a reasonable conclusion—in fact, the only reasonable conclusion—to be drawn from the facts stated in the application for continuance that after mailing the interrogatories and commission to the notary, about November 12, 1910, appellant made no further inquiry even to learn whether the interrogatories had been received by the notary, or whether they had been taken and returned, until six months later, when the case was actually on call for trial. This is the case presented to the trial court, and to this court, by the record on submission, and by the briefs. The actual facts, as presented by the motion for rehearing, may—in fact they do, in our opinion—exonerate appellant's counsel from any charge of negligence, or want of diligence, in their failure to sooner learn of the loss of the depositions in the clerk's office. But these facts are presented for the first time on this motion for rehearing. How can we say that, in the light of these facts, the trial court erred in overruling the application for continuance, or that this court erred in its former holding? It is not fair to the trial court, nor to appellee. If these facts had been properly urged in the motion for continuance, we must assume that the continuance would have been granted, which would have resulted in a delay of six months in the trial. Is it fair to appellee that he should be made to bear the additional burden of a further delay of 18 months, occasioned by the failure of appellant to set up these facts, now urged, in the application for continuance? We think not. We have gone into this matter at what may appear to be unnecessary length, in view of the entirely erroneous construction placed upon our opinion by counsel for appellant. The motion for rehearing is overruled.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Galveston. Nov. 9, 1912.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 135*)—JURISDICTION—AMOUNT IN CONTROVERSY—PLEADING.

A petition in a suit to restrain an execution sale under a justice's judgment, which alleged that the amount in controversy was beyond the jurisdiction of the justice, in that the suit was based on 20 notes of $10 each and 10 per cent. on the principal and interest as attorney's fees, and which averred that a credit of $45 had been allowed, but which did not state the date of the credit, or when the debtor was entitled to it, did not show that the justice was without jurisdiction, where, if the credit accrued near the time of the filing of the suit, the principal and attorney's fees exceeded the jurisdiction of the justice; while if the right to the credit accrued and was allowed at the date of the notes, or within a year thereafter, the amount due, excluding interest, was within the jurisdiction of the justice.

2. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 135*)—ERRONEOUS JUDGMENT—REMEDY.

Where a defendant in justice's court made no defense, though he knew for more than a year before the judgment that the action was pending, and he did not show any excuse for failing to appeal or obtain relief by certiorari, injunction did not lie to restrain an execution sale under the judgment.

3. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 84*)—WAIVER OF WANT OF SERVICE OF SUMMONS—APPEARANCE.

An appearance by defendant in justice's court for the purpose of obtaining a continuance, and actually obtaining a continuance, is a waiver of the issuance and service of citation on him.

4. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§§ 73, 74*)—JURISDICTION—ABSENCE OF REGULAR JUSTICE.

Where the regular justice of the peace was sick, a justice of the peace in the same precinct could, as authorized by Sayles' Ann. Civ.

St. 1897, art. 1566, perform the duties of the office, provided he was the nearest justice.

5. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 135*)—EXECUTION—ISSUANCE—DIRECTIONS FOR RETURN.

Under Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1657-1659, providing that writs of execution issued on justice's judgment shall be returnable in 60 days from date of issuance, a writ of execution, after the lapse of time in which it is made returnable by law, is of no force; and the right of an officer, by virtue of the writ, to take and sell property ceases from the date the writ is returnable.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; W. H. Pope, Judge.

Action by S. D. Chance against W. L. Pace and another. From a judgment of dismissal, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

O'Fiel & O'Fiel, of Beaumont, for appellant. J. D. Campbell, of Beaumont, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. Appellant presented to Hon. W. H. Pope, judge of the district court of Jefferson county, his petition for a writ of injunction to restrain the appellees from making sale of a piano belonging to him under an order of sale issued out of the justice court of said county. The court granted a temporary restraining order, and set the case down for hearing at a future date. On the hearing the judge sustained appellees' general demurrer to plaintiff's petition and dismissed his suit, and from the judgment of dismissal plaintiff has appealed.

Plaintiff alleged the following grounds for the issuance of the writ: (1) That the court of H. E. Showers, justice of the peace, in which the judgment, under which the order of sale was issued, was rendered, was without jurisdiction, because the amount of the notes sued on was beyond the jurisdiction of the justice court, and the value of the piano foreclosed upon was greater than $200 at the date of the judgment, and that therefore the judgment was void; (2) that plaintiff had not been served with citation and had no notice of the pendency of the suit against him, but that if he had been served or had such notice the justice of the peace had promised him to continue the case from term to term, in order that plaintiff might prepare his defenses, and that judgment was finally rendered against him by default, without his being notified that such a judgment would be asked; (3) that the judgment of the justice court was not rendered by H. E. Showers, the regular justice of the peace of the court in which the suit was filed, but by another justice of the peace who was holding court for said Showers at the time of the latter's sickness and inability to preside over his court; and (4) that the order of sale by virtue of which the piano was seized by the constable was at the time of the seizure functus officio.

It appears from the allegations of the petition that appellee, W. L. Pace, on April 7, 1909, filed suit in the court of H. E. Showers, justice of the peace of precinct No. 1 of Jefferson county, against appellant on 20 promissory notes for $10 each, bearing interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum from date, viz., August 17, 1905, and 10 per cent. additional on the principal and interest as attorney's fees, less a credit of $45. Just when this credit was entered does not appear. The case was continued from term to term until the 17th day of May, 1910, when judgment by default was rendered in plaintiff's favor for the amount of his debt, and for foreclosure of his mortgage lien on a piano, by G. M. Oliver, who was also a justice of the peace of precinct No. 1, and who was sitting in Justice Showers' court during the time the latter was sick and unable to discharge the duties of his office. On April 28, 1911, nearly a year after rendition of the judgment, the plaintiff in the justice court suit sued out an order of sale, which was placed in the hands of James Evins, a constable of Hardin county, where the piano then was, and this writ was not levied nor the piano seized under it until about the 29th day of September, 1911, about five months after the issuance of the order of sale.

[1] We think the allegations of the petition are not sufficient to show that the justice court did not have jurisdiction to render judgment for the amount of the notes and attorney's fees. True it is alleged in general terms that the amount was beyond its jurisdiction, but in alleging the specific facts upon which appellant relies to show this the facts stated do not bear out the general allegation that the justice court was without jurisdiction. Had the pleader stopped after alleging that plaintiff's suit was upon 20 notes of $10 each, and 10 per cent. on the principal and interest as attorney's fees, his petition would have shown, prima facie, that the amount sued for was beyond the jurisdiction of the justice court. But he alleged, further, that a credit of $45 had been allowed, without stating the date when appellant became entitled to the credit, or when it was in fact given. It will be noted that the notes were dated August 17, 1905, and at the time of the judgment nearly five years' interest had accrued. A simple calculation will prove that, if the right to the credit accrued at or near the time the suit was filed, then the principal and attorney's fees together amounted to a sum beyond the jurisdiction of the court; but if the right to the credit accrued and was allowed at the date of the notes, or within a year thereafter, the amount then due, excluding the interest, would be within the jurisdiction of the justice court. In the absence, then, of an allegation showing when the payment was made which entitled the appellant to the credit, we think the petition is insufficient to show that the amount sued for was beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

[2] But, regardless of the matter above discussed, we think the court did not err in refusing to grant the writ of injunction, on the ground that the justice court was without jurisdiction, either because the amount of plaintiff's demand, or the value of the piano foreclosed upon, was beyond its jurisdiction. There was no allegation in the petition for injunction to show that from the record in the justice court it affirmatively appeared that the subject-matter of the litigation was not within the jurisdiction of that court, but it does so appear that the appellant failed to make any defense to appellee's demand, although he knew for more than 12 months before the judgment was rendered that the suit was pending, and at his instance had been continued from term to term, and the petition is silent in the matter of showing any excuse whatever for failing to avail himself of the legal remedy of appeal or certiorari to vacate it. True he alleges that at the time of applying for the injunction he had no remedy at law, either by way of appeal or certiorari, but this allegation falls far short of a legal excuse for not having availed himself of his legal remedy within the time provided by law. We understand the law to be that, even if the judgment was void because of matters arising dehors the record, an injunction will not lie if the party complaining has not availed himself of his legal remedy to vacate the judgment by appeal or certiorari. Railway v. Ware, 74 Tex. 49, 11 S. W. 918; Tucker v. Williams, 56 S. W. 586.

[3] The allegation that appellant had not been served with citation and did not know of the pendency of the suit against him is contradicted by the further allegation that he did know of the pendency of the suit, and that the suit had been continued from term to term by the justice of the peace at his special instance and request. Even if he had not been served with citation, we think his frequent appearance for the purpose of obtaining the continuance was a waiver of the issuance and service of citation upon him.

[4] There is no merit in the allegation that the judgment was void because rendered by a justice of the peace other than the regular justice of the court in which the suit was filed. The petition shows that the regular justice of the peace was sick and unable to discharge the duties of his office, and that G. M. Oliver, a justice of the peace in the same precinct, held court for him and rendered the judgment in question. Article 1566, Sayles' Civil Statutes, provides: " * * * Whenever the justice of the peace of any precinct shall be absent, or unable or unwilling to perform the duties of his office, the nearest justice of the peace in the county may perform the duties of the office until such * * * absence, inability or unwillingness shall cease." There was no allegation that G. M. Oliver was not the nearest justice of the peace.

[5] But we think that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer, because the petition sufficiently alleged that the writ under and by virtue of which the piano was seized was at the time of the seizure functus officio. It was alleged that the writ was issued on April 28, 1911, and the levy thereof and the seizure of the piano was on the 29th day of September, 1911, five months after the date of its issuance. The statute requires all such writs to be returnable in 60 days from date of issuance. Sayles' Civil Statutes, articles 1657, 1658, 1659. It is well settled that such writs, after the lapse of the time in which they are made returnable by law, are of no force and effect (Reagan v. Evans, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 35, 21 S. W. 429), and that the right of the constable, by virtue of such a writ, to take and sell property ceases from the date the writ was returnable. Harris v. Ellis, 30 Tex. 6, 94 Am. Dec. 296; Hester v. Duprey, 46 Tex. 627; Young v. Smith, 23 Tex. 600, 76 Am. Dec. 81.

[6] It follows that from the allegations of the petition, which, being tested by a general demurrer, must be taken as true, that at the date of the levy upon and seizure of the piano by the constable the writ upon which he assumed to act was of no force and effect, and his acts in the premises were unauthorized, and that a sale of the piano thereunder would be void. We think, therefore, that the sale of the piano under such void writ should have been enjoined, and that the court erred in sustaining the general demurrer to this ground for relief. For the error indicated, the judgment of the court is reversed and the cause remanded.

Reversed and remanded.

HICKS v. MURPHY et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 20, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 409*)—ANSWER—FORM—MOTION TO DISSOLVE INJUNCTION.

A verified pleading containing allegations intended as denials and a prayer for dissolution of the injunction and general relief, in the absence of objection below, as to form, will be held sufficient as an answer, although styled a "motion to dissolve injunction."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1375-1383, 1386; Dec. Dig. § 409.*]

2. INJUNCTION (§ 118*)—INJUNCTION AGAINST SALE—PETITION.

A petition to enjoin a substituted trustee from selling land which states that such trustee did not have authority under the trust deed, which was a conclusion, and pleads no facts from which it could be determined whether the deed of trust gave him authority, was insufficient; a power to sell being strictly construed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. §§ 223-242; Dec. Dig. § 118.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1039*)—PLEADING—INSUFFICIENCY.

A plaintiff is not entitled to a reversal for insufficiency of the answer where the petition did not state a cause of action, and the answer did not supply its defects.

4. INJUNCTION (§ 148*) — "COLLECTION OF MONEY"—REFUNDING BONDS.

An injunction restraining a substituted trustee under a deed of trust from selling the land, but saying nothing about the collection of the notes for which the deed of trust was security, was not one restraining the "collection of money" within Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 3008, requiring a refunding bond in such cases.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County; J. L. Camp, Judge.

Action by E. G. Hicks against J. E. Murphy and another. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 150 S. W. 955.

MOURSUND, J. This is an appeal from an interlocutory order dissolving a temporary injunction, which restrained C. W. Kuykendall from selling certain lands as substitute trustee under a deed of trust. There is no statement of facts in the record, and we are confined to the consideration of questions arising upon the pleading.

Appellant's first contention is that the court had no authority to dissolve the temporary injunction because no answer was filed, but merely a motion to dissolve. The instrument is styled, "Motion to Dissolve Injunction," and is so referred to by the court. It begins as follows: "Now come J. E. Murphy and C. W. Kuykendall, the defendants herein, and, moving the court to dissolve and vacate the injunction issued upon the defendants herein, would show to the court." Then follow the allegations intended as denials of the material allegations of the petition, and the prayer for dissolution of the injunction and for general relief. It is verified by the oath of one of the defendants. No exceptions were filed to the form of this instrument, nor any question raised in the lower court in regard to its sufficiency as an answer, but issue was joined and evidence introduced as shown by the judgment of the court.

[1] In the case of Smith v. Palo Pinto County, 128 S. W. 1193, the court held it was unnecessary to file a separate motion to dissolve the injunction; that the prayer in the answer for such relief was sufficient. In that case the pleading was styled an answer. In this case it was styled a motion to dissolve, but there was no difference in substance, and, in the absence of objection in the lower court, we hold the instrument filed in this case sufficient as an answer. Nor do we agree with appellant's contention that the case of Dawson v. Baldrige, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 124, 118 S. W. 593, is authority for a contrary holding. In that case the court considered a verified motion to dissolve as an answer, but held that it was not an answer such as equity requires, in that it did not contain a full and unequivocal denial of all the material allegations of plaintiffs' petition.

[2] Appellant's second contention is that, if the motion to dissolve be considered as an answer, then that same does not deny all the material allegations of the petition, and leaves sufficient uncontroverted to entitle appellant to the injunction. He says the petition alleges that Mrs. Herriott, who held the two notes payable to defendant Murphy, as collateral to secure the payment of his note to her for $1,500, did not join said Murphy in the selection and designation of Kuykendall as substitute trustee, and that the deed of trust under which the sale was sought to be made by Kuykendall contained the usual power of sale, and the usual stipulation providing for the substitution of trustees in case the original trustee should die, become disqualified, or be unable to act, etc. We find the petition alleges that the two notes payable to defendant Murphy, one for $4,500 and the other for $4,477, secured by a deed of trust on the land in McMullen county, Tex., sought to be sold by Kuykendall, are held by Mrs. Herriott as collateral to secure the payment of Murphy's note to her for $1,500; that neither she nor any authorized agent of hers ever made any request for the sale of the land under the deed of trust; and that Murphy acted wholly without right or authority under the terms of the deed of trust when he attempted to appoint Kuykendall as a substitute trustee under the terms of said instrument, and when he requested Kuykendall to advertise and sell the land to satisfy said two notes, and for said reasons the attempt of said Kuykendall to sell said land was in violation of law and of plaintiff's rights as the owner of the land. We find no allegation setting out or describing the provision, if any, contained in said deed of trust with respect to the appointment of a substitute trustee. We do not know from the perusal of the petition whether any request by Mrs. Herriott was required before the original trustee could sell, nor do we know what provision was made for the appointment of a substitute trustee. True, the petition sets out the conclusion of the pleader that Murphy acted wholly without authority or right under the terms of said deed of trust when he attempted to appoint Kuykendall as substitute trustee, and requested him to sell the land. "The petition for an injunction should state all and negative all, which is necessary to establish a right." Moss v. Whitson, 130 S. W. 1035; Gillis v. Rosenheimer, 64 Tex. 243; City of Paris v. Sturgeon, 50 Tex. Civ. App. 522, 110 S. W. 459; Cotulla v. Burswell, 22 Tex. Civ. App. 329, 54 S. W. 614. It is necessary to allege such facts as show a want of authority. The conclusion of the pleader is not sufficient. Moss v. Whitson, supra. There are no facts pleaded by plaintiff from which we can determine whether or not the deed of trust authorized Murphy, even though he had parted with the title to the notes, to appoint a substitute trustee, and request him to proceed with the discharge of his duties as such trustee. Our law prescribes no form for deeds of trust, nor does it stipulate that a sale of notes secured by such an instrument carries with it the power to appoint a substitute trustee. The power to sell is strictly construed, and the deed of trust might give the power to appoint a substitute trustee solely to the payee of the notes. We conclude that the allegations of the petition are insufficient to authorize an injunction on the ground of the failure of Mrs. Herriott to appoint or join in the appointment of the substitute trustee and to request him to sell. It is therefore only necessary to determine whether the allegations of the answer aid those of the petition so as to make a case for plaintiff.

[3] The answer denies that the defendant Murphy had no right to foreclose the notes and deed of trust, or that Mrs. Herriott did not know of his foreclosure of said notes, and says he had an arrangement with her through her authorized agent, C. P. Stafford, allowing and permitting him to foreclose upon said land for the notes described in plaintiffs' petition, and that he had an agreement in writing, placed of record in McMullen county, Tex., on April 20, 1912, showing his right to proceed and foreclose said notes, and that for all the purposes of this foreclosure he is the owner and holder of said notes, the same having been turned over to his attorney, C. A. Davies, by C. P. Stafford, agent of Mrs. Herriott, and the said C. P. Stafford having authorized C. A. Davies to act for and in his behalf in protecting him in the said foreclosure. We find no admission in this answer that the deed of trust required Mrs. Herriott to appoint a substitute trustee, nor that it required her to make request for sale before such sale could be made. It denies that Murphy had no right to foreclose the notes and deed of trust, then sets up an agreement, concerning the terms of which we are left in the dark, and states the conclusion of the pleader that said agreement is sufficient to vest the title to the notes in Murphy for the purpose of foreclosure. This answer in our opinion would not be sufficient if the petition showed the provisions of the deed of trust to be such that the legal holder of the notes had to appoint the substitute trustee and that such appointment had to be made in writing, because such power is strictly construed, and appellant would be entitled to have the sale made in strict compliance with the terms of the deed of trust. The answer, however, is not such an admission as supplies the allegations wanting in the petition, and we hold that appellant is not entitled to a reversal upon his second contention.

[4] Appellant's third contention is that the temporary injunction dissolved below was one restraining the collection of money within the meaning of article 3008, Sayles' Civ. Stat., and a refunding bond should have been required of appellees. The prayer was for an injunction restraining each of the defendants from selling or further attempting to sell under the terms of said deed of trust any part of the lands described. The writ of injunction copied in the record was strictly in accordance with the prayer, except that it was directed only to defendant Kuykendall. Appellant failed to ask that the defendants be restrained from negotiating or collecting the notes, and the injunction granted does not prohibit Murphy from suing Womack, the maker of the notes, to collect same, nor, if Mrs. Herriott is the legal owner and holder as contended by appellant, would it prevent her from appointing a substitute trustee, and having the land sold under the deed of trust to satisfy the notes. The refunding bond required by statute is required to be in double the sum enjoined, and the same cannot be required unless the collection of some sum is enjoined, and the same is stated with such certainty that the amount of the bond can be fixed.

We conclude the court did not err in failing to exact a refunding bond as a condition precedent to dissolving the injunction.

We find no error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 32*)—CARE REQUIRED AS TO LICENSEE.

owed the duty only of using ordinary care in the management and running of the train, and to whom it was not liable for negligence caused by the defective condition of its track, since a licensee must accept the premises or property of another upon which he enters for his own purposes as they are.

Appeal from District Court, Jefferson County; L. B. Hightower, Jr., Judge.

Action by Phil Gresham against the Kirby Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Oliver J. Todd, of Beaumont, and Andrews, Ball & Streetman, of Houston, for appellant. Blain & Howth and M. G. Adams, all of Beaumont, for appellee.

PLEASANTS, C. J. This suit was brought by appellee against appellant to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of appellant. Plaintiff's petition alleges, in substance, that on or about the 25th of March, 1910, plaintiff was in the employment of defendant as a woodcutter or sawyer; that he was employed to cut or saw logs in the woods several miles from the town of Buna where the defendant operates a lumber mill; that it was at the date mentioned, and had long been, the custom of defendant's employes who worked in the woods to ride to and from their work on defendant's trains and cars; that such custom was known to and acquiesced in by the defendant and was for the mutual benefit and profit of defendant and its said employes; that in pursuance of said custom, and with the consent and under the direction of defendant and its authorized agents, plaintiff, on the date before mentioned, after having finished his day's work in the woods, got upon a flat car or trailer of a train composed of an engine, flatcar or trailer, and log cars loaded with logs, for the purpose of returning to his home at Buna, and while riding upon said train it was negligently derailed and wrecked and plaintiff was thereby injured.

The acts of negligence charged in the petition are as follows: (a) A failure to provide a reasonably safe track, in that (1) the rails thereof were not spiked and attached and fastened in any manner to the ties, or were not spiked and fastened with reasonable security for a distance of several feet or about five ties, and (2) the track and roadbed were curved and rested on a wet, boggy, and muddy foundation, which caused and permitted the track to sink and to be low and depressed, especially on one side; (b) the running and use of said engine, which was too heavy and dangerous under all the circumstances for said defective and curved part of the track; (c) the running of said engine without air or other brakes with which to control the speed thereof down a steep hill immediately before passing said defective part of the track, by reason of which incline and hill, the said engine and cars attained a speed high and dangerous, under all the circumstances and conditions.

The defendant's answer consisted of: (a) A general demurrer; (b) a general denial; (c) pleas of contributory negligence and assumed risk; (d) a special plea, in substance, that the log train was not provided or fitted up for plaintiff or other employes to ride upon, but that the defendant had provided regular trains for the purpose, and that plaintiff was not expected, required, or invited to ride upon it, nor was it necessary for him so to do, and that it was against the rules, order, and wishes of the defendant for him so to do, and that he was riding upon it solely for his own convenience and pleasure, and that the defendant owed him no duty with respect to the matters complained of by him; (e) a special plea, in substance, that the defendant had made and promulgated rules prohibiting riding on its log trains, and that the plaintiff was riding on the log train in violation of said rules; and (f) a special plea, in substance, that the plaintiff voluntarily and without necessity selected the log train as a means of returning from his work, which train, while being run over the temporary switch track upon which the accident occurred, was a notoriously dangerous means of transportation, for the sole purpose of convenience to himself in getting to his destination earlier, in preference to waiting until later in the afternoon and riding in on the regular train provided by the defendant to carry employes from their work, which regular train was run only over the permanent main line track and was a safe means of transportation, and by such voluntary choice on his part was precluded from recovering.

The trial in the court below with a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $9,500.

The evidence shows that plaintiff was injured at the time and place alleged in his petition as a result of the derailment of a log train owned and operated by appellant and upon which he was riding in from his work in the woods to his home in the town of Buna. At the time of his injury he was employed by appellant to saw logs in the forest. He furnished his own tools and was paid according to the number of feet of logs sawed by him. He was not required to work any specific time. He and the other employes who composed the sawing crew were only expected to saw enough logs to keep the loading crew engaged, and they quit work at any hour in the day that they found they had sawed the logs that were necessary to keep the loaders busy.

The appellant company is organized and chartered for the purpose of manufacturing lumber and is not a common carrier or railroad company. It operates a lumber mill at Buna and owns and maintains a tram railroad which it operates in connection with said mill for the purpose of hauling logs from the woods or forest to the mill. The main line of this road extends from Buna to a point in the woods called the corral, a distance of about four miles. Near the corral a switch track branches off to the right of the main track and extends into the woods for a distance of a mile and one half. This switch track is known as the "loading switch." Another switch track, known as the "skidder switch," branches off to the left of the main track from a point near the corral. These switch tracks are intended for temporary use only and are removed from time to time as the timber is cut from along their line. The loading switch, upon which the injury to plaintiff occurred, had been in use a month or two. This track was poorly constructed, in that the rails were not securely fastened to the ties, and the foundation or bed of the track upon which the ties rested was soft and boggy. These defects in the track caused the derailment of the train and the consequent injury to plaintiff. The appellant company furnished and ran a train every working day consisting of an engine and caboose, or an engine and a flat car, from Buna to the corral and back. The employes of the company who worked in the woods were carried back and forth on this train which left Buna at a certain hour every morning and returned from the corral every evening about 6 o'clock. The hands quit work in the woods usually about 5:30 p. m. The engine which was used on the loading switch for the purpose of hauling in the cars of logs whenever a sufficient number of cars were loaded also had a flat car or trailer attached thereto. A trailer was used in all log trains and was necessary to connect the engine with the loaded log cars because of the projection of the logs over the ends of log cars. The trailers generally used for this purpose were skeleton flat cars without flooring. The starting of the log trains from where the logs were loaded was at no regular time. Whenever a sufficient number of cars were loaded, the engine and trailer which did the switching on this track would couple onto them and take them out to the main line or on to the mill at Buna. Because of the danger in riding upon these trains of loaded log cars, appellant promulgated a rule forbidding its employes, other than those engaged in the operation of such trains, from riding thereon. There is much testimony tending to show that the appellant made reasonable efforts to enforce this rule; but there is sufficient testimony to sustain the finding of the jury that appellant did not use ordinary care in this respect, that the rule was habitually violated with the knowledge and acquiescence of appellant, and its enforcement, in effect, abandoned. All the evidence shows that these log trains were not provided or intended for the transportation of the employes from the woods, and appellant was under no contract or agreement, either express or implied, to transport its employes thereon. It was in no way to the benefit or advantage of appellant for its employes to ride upon said trains, but employes rode thereon solely for their own convenience and to save walking the distance from the place they were at work along the switch track back to the corral at the end of the main track, from which place appellant, as before stated, had provided a train to carry them to Buna which train left the corral regularly every evening about 6 o'clock. When the log train did not stop at the corral, the employes by riding on said train reached Buna some time earlier in the evening than the regular train from the corral reached that place, and for this reason they frequently rode on the log train.

The evidence sustains the finding of the jury that the plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence and did not assume the risk of injury, if such injury was caused by the negligence of defendant in the performance of any duty it owed the plaintiff. The only grounds of negligence submitted to the jury were the alleged defects in the construction and maintenance of appellant's track. The undisputed evidence shows that the track was in the condition alleged in the petition, and this was the proximate cause of the derailment of the train and the consequent injury to plaintiff. The evidence also sustains the verdict of the jury as to the amount of damages sustained by the plaintiff.

Under an appropriate assignment of error, the appellant complains of the refusal of the trial court to instruct the jury to find a verdict in its favor as requested by it. It is contended by appellant that this instruction should have been given because the undisputed evidence shows that the log train upon which appellee was riding at the time he received his injuries was not provided by the appellant for its employes to ride on either to or from their work, and plaintiff in riding thereon upon the occasion in question was so riding solely for his own convenience and benefit, and not for the convenience or benefit of appellant; that it was wholly unnecessary for him to ride on said train, and he was not required or invited either expressly or impliedly so to do; that plaintiff was at most only a licensee upon said train, and as such the defendant owed him no duty to keep its track or roadbed or other premises in a reasonably safe condition, and the only negligence alleged or proven against appellant was its failure to use ordinary care to properly construct and maintain its track and roadbed in a reasonably safe condition, no active negligence on appellant's part being either alleged or proven.

[1] If appellee was riding upon appellant's log train without any invitation or any contract on the part of appellant, either expressed or implied, but with the consent or acquiescence of appellant, he was a mere licensee, and the only duty which appellant owed him was to use ordinary care in the management and running of the train, and it was not liable for any injury caused him by the defective condition of its track. In the case of Railway Co. v. Spivey, 97 Tex. 143, 76 S. W. 748, our Supreme Court, in stating the duty of a railway company to a licensee riding upon its cars, says: "If he used the cars as a licensee, it was at his own risk, for he must accept them and the track over which they pass in the condition in which he found them. The company was under no obligation to arrange its yards, tracks, and schedules to suit his convenience, or to secure his safety while riding on its freight trains."

The general rule that a licensee must accept the premises or property of another upon which he enters for purposes of his own and without being invited thereon by the owner is sustained by all the authorities. Oil Co. v. Morton, 70 Tex. 400, 7 S. W. 756, 8 Am. St. Rep. 611.

It is sometimes difficult to determine from the facts of the particular case whether the person injured upon the premises of another is there by the implied invitation of the owner or is a mere licensee. Mr. White, in his book, Personal Injuries on Railroads, says: "In ascertaining the relation which an injured person bears to the owner of premises where the injury was received, it is generally held to be a reliable test, in determining the duty owing by the owner, to inquire whether or not the injured person at the time of the injury had business relations with the owner of the premises which would render his presence of mutual aid to the two, or whether his presence was for his own convenience or on business with others than the owner of the premises. In the absence of some relation which inures to the mutual benefit of the owner of the premises and the injured person, or to the former alone, there is generally held to be no implied invitation on the part of the owner. Benson v. Traction Co. [77 Md. 535] 28 Atl. 973 [20 L. R. A. 714, 39 Am. St. Rep.

436]; Plummer v. Dill [156 Mass. 426] 31 N. E. 128 [32 Am. St. Rep. 463]."

In the case of Bennett v. Railway Co., 102 U. S. 577, 26 L. Ed. 235, the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Harlan, says: "It is sometimes difficult to determine whether the circumstances make a case of 'invitation' in the technical sense of that word, as used in a large number of adjudged cases, or only a case of mere license. 'The principle,' says Mr. Campbell, in his treatise on Negligence, 'appears to be that invitation is inferred where there is a common interest or mutual aid, while a license is inferred where the object is the mere pleasure or benefit of the person using it.'"

[2] Under this test the undisputed evidence in this case shows that appellee was only a licensee on appellant's train at the time he was injured. There was no possible benefit or advantage to appellant in his riding in on the log train, and appellee in his testimony says, in effect, that he took the log train because by so doing he could reach home earlier. On the evening of his injury he and a number of other sawyers got on this train at the suggestion of their foreman, and appellee says that he did not know that the employes had been forbidden to ride thereon; but he must have known from the character of the train and the fact that it did not run on any regular time that it was not provided by appellant for the purpose of taking the hands in from the woods. He testifies that he could not tell how many times he walked from his place of work to the corral and took the regular train there, or how many times he rode in on the log train. There is no testimony tending to show that appellant derived any benefit or advantage from its employes riding on the log train, or that it was under any obligation, express or implied, to carry them on said train.

We think it clear from the undisputed evidence that appellee was only a licensee on the train, and, under the authorities before cited, appellant owed him no duty in respect to the condition of its track and roadbed. This was the only ground of negligence submitted to the jury, and there is no evidence showing any negligence in operation of the train. It follows that appellant is not liable for the injury to appellee, and the trial court should have so instructed the jury.

Such being our conclusion, it is unnecessary for us to pass upon the remaining assignments of error presented in appellant's brief.

For the reason indicated, we are of opinion that the judgment of the court below should be reversed, and judgment here rendered in favor of appellant, and it has been so ordered.

Reversed and rendered.

3. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 172*) — RAILROAD LAND GRANT — TIME EFFECTIVE.

The grant of a right of way through the public lands, by special charter in 1873 (Sp. Laws 1873, c. 208), to the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company became effective in present, and not after the first 25 miles were built, if completed within three years, and the completion of 30 miles every two years thereafter until completed, as provided by section 12 of the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 523-543; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 82*) — RIGHT OF WAY — ABANDONMENT — EVIDENCE.

In trespass to try title to a strip granted to plaintiff as a railroad right of way, evidence as to the necessity of using the land for switches was admissible for plaintiff on the issue of abandonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 213-219; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 318*) — DECLARATIONS — LETTERS.

In trespass to try title between two railroad companies, letters passing between defendant's officials, relating to the land in controversy, were not admissible, not binding plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1193-1200; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 244*) — ADMISSIONS — BY AGENTS.

Agreements or concessions by plaintiff's superintendents with reference to another part of its right of way than that in controversy, though a part of the same section, would not bind plaintiff, so as to be admissible in evidence in trespass to try title between it and another railroad company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 916-936; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 317*)—ADMISSIBILITY.

It was error to permit a witness to testify to the contents of a letter which was not itself admissible in evidence, as not binding the other party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1174-1192; Dec. Dig. § 317.*]

8. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 39*)—EVIDENCE—OTHER TRANSACTIONS.

Evidence relating to an interlocking agreement between plaintiff and defendant railroad companies as to a crossing not touching the land in controversy was not admissible in trespass to try title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Cent. Dig. § 54; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

9. ESTOPPEL (§ 93*)—KNOWLEDGE.

Evidence that plaintiff railroad company did not object when defendant's track was laid across the land in controversy was not admissible to create an estoppel by silence against plaintiff in trespass to try title, if plaintiff's officials did not know at the time that it owned the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. §§ 264-275; Dec. Dig. § 93.*]

10. EVIDENCE (§ 65*)—PRESUMPTIONS—KNOWLEDGE OF SPECIAL STATUTES.

A special statute granting a right of way to a railroad company through the public lands of the state is a public law, so as to be constructive notice to another railroad company of the extent of the rights of the grantee; every one being presumed to know the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

11. EVIDENCE (§ 65*)—PRESUMPTIONS—KNOWLEDGE OF LAW.

There is a pseudo-presumption that every one is presumed to know the law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 85; Dec. Dig. § 65.*]

12. ESTOPPEL (§ 97*)—ESTOPPEL BY DEED—PERSONS BOUND—PARTIES.

Any act by plaintiff, pursuant to an agreement between itself and another railroad company, could not be taken advantage of as an estoppel by defendant railroad company, which was not a party thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Estoppel, Cent. Dig. § 289; Dec. Dig. § 97.*]

13. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 40*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

In trespass to try title to a tract claimed by plaintiff railroad company as a part of its right of way, a deed from plaintiff to defendant company, transferring another part of its right of way, was not admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 55-61; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

14. PUBLIC LANDS (§ 172*)—RAILROAD LAND GRANTS—FORFEITURE.

The failure of the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company, which was granted a right of way over the public lands by its special charter in 1873 (Sp. Laws 1873, c. 208), to file maps of its right of way with the Commissioner of the General Land Office within six months after organization, as required by section 15 of the charter, was not a forfeiture of its rights; the charter containing no conditions of forfeiture, and the state not having sought to compel a forfeiture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 523-543; Dec. Dig. § 172.*]

Appeal from District Court, Potter County; J. N. Browning, Judge.

Action by the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company against the Southern Kansas Railway Company of Texas and another. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Spoonts, Thompson & Barwise, of Ft. Worth, and Turner & Wharton, of Amarillo, for appellant. Madden, Trulove & Kimbrough, of Amarillo, and Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, for appellees.

HALL, J. This suit was instituted by the Ft. Worth & Denver City Railway Company, in the district court of Potter county, against the Southern Kansas Railway Company of Texas and the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company to recover a strip of land lying immediately south of plaintiff's main track across section 156, block, 2, A. B. & M. surveys, in Potter county, Tex. The strip of land in question is 50 feet wide and 750 feet long; the northern line thereof being 50 feet south of and parallel with the center of plaintiff's main track, and its southern line being 100 feet south of the center of said track. Plaintiff's petition is in the form of trespass to try title, and this is followed by a second count, pleading specially its title, in which it set forth a history of the granting of its special charter in 1873 (Sp. Laws 1873, c. 208), its compliance with the requirements of its charter, and further alleging that since the completion of its road the town of Amarillo had grown to be a city of over 10,000 inhabitants, and that the land in controversy, which is a part of the town of Amarillo, is now needed for the construction of switch and storage tracks, and for the proper conduct of plaintiff's business as a common carrier.

The defendants answered by general demurrer, general denial, plea of not guilty, and pleaded the statutes of limitation of three, four, five, and ten years, set up valuable improvements, and by special answer attacked plaintiff's right to the land in controversy, because of plaintiff's failure to comply with the requirements of its charter. Plaintiff filed a supplemental petition, attacking the special answer of the defendants, and a special exception, which was overruled. There was a trial before a jury, and after the evidence was all in the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find in favor of defendants, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment rendered upon such findings.

Plaintiff's assignments of error do not comply with rules 24 and 25 for the Courts of Civil Appeals (142 S. W. xi); but, by reason of the fact that at the time the appeal herein was perfected said rules had not been printed and generally distributed, we are not inclined to heed the objections of appellees to the sufficiency of the assignments as heretofore announced by us in the case of Davidson v. Patton, 149 S. W. 757.

[1] Our attention is also directed to the form of appellees' brief, wherein they first submit four "counterpropositions to all of appellant's assignments." This is manifestly a violation of the rules, but we waive the informality and give both briefs full consideration. The principal questions presented for our consideration are these: (1) Does the grant contained in appellant's charter in the following words, "That the right of way, to be held to the extent of 200 feet in width, is hereby granted to said railway company, through the public lands of Texas," etc., sufficiently designate the property therein sought to be granted, or is it void for uncertainty? (2) If sufficiently certain, was the grant effective in present, or was it intended to take effect in the future, after the first section of 25 miles of the road was built, if completed within three years from the passage of the act, and an additional 30 miles every two years thereafter until completed through the state, as provided in section 12 of the act, and did the effectiveness of the grant further depend upon compliance with section 15 of the act, which is: "That within six months after the organization of the company incorporated by this act, it shall be the duty of said company to file with the Commissioner of the General Land Office of the state plans and maps, showing the line upon which it is intended to construct said road."

[2, 3] We are cited to numerous authorities in the briefs bearing upon these issues, and after a careful review of them all we have concluded that the grant of the right of way was sufficiently certain in its terms, and that it took effect in present, and in support of our conclusion quote as follows: "It is claimed that the deed to the right of way was void because of the indefiniteness of the description. The road, at the date of the deed, had been located across the Pearson survey, and was a thing in existence. The conveyance of the right of way evidently had reference to the road as it existed, and conveyed the right to occupy a strip of land 200 feet wide along its line. But, had the situation been otherwise, the deed was sufficient, and would have authorized the railway company to cross the land with its road, selecting its own route. The easement conveyed is the right of way 200 feet wide across the James Pearson survey, and it is contended that this entitled the company to occupy and use for its purposes, not necessarily all of the strip 200 feet wide, but only so much thereof as was essential to the purposes for which the right was obtained, i. e., a convenient passage across the land in a proper performance of its duties by the company. But the conveyance is of a right of way 200 feet wide over a larger tract, and not simply a right of way over a strip of land 200 feet wide. The grant defines the extent of the right of way, and the court cannot restrict it to narrower limits, though it should be of the opinion that so much was not needed for the purposes intended. The right of the railway company, such as it is, is, as between it and its grantor, the same over every part of the land designated in the grant." Olive v. Sabin & E. T. Railway Co., 11 Tex. Civ. App. 208, 33 S. W. 139. The deed conveying the right of way in the above-quoted case conveyed the "right of way 200 feet wide over and upon" the said Pearson survey.

As further bearing upon the question of the necessity of identifying the land upon the ground at the date of the charter and the particularity of its designation, we call attention to article 6482, Rev. Stat. 1911 (Sayles' Civ. Stat. art. 4423): "Every such corporation shall have the right of way for its line of road through and over any lands belonging to this state." And it is further provided in article 6484, Rev. Stat. 1911 (Sayles' Civ. Stat. 4425): "Such corporation shall have the right to lay out its road not exceeding 200 feet in width and to construct the same." This is a general grant to any and all railway corporations desiring to construct a railway through any public domain of the state. Prior to its enactment, as said by Gill, J., in Ayres v. G., C. & S. F. Ry. Co., 39 Tex. Civ. App. 561, 88 S. W. 436: "A grant of a charter to construct a railroad carries with it, either directly or inferentially, a grant of right of way through and over such tracts on its route as were yet a part of the public domain." Further quoting from T. C. Ry. Co. v. Bowman, 97 Tex. 420, 79 S. W. 296, Gill, J., said: "The general laws which had been enacted regulating railways theretofore seem to have assumed, rather than to have expressly declared, the existence of the right over the lands of the state; for the provisions for the acquisition of such right by purchase or condemnation apply only to private property. The general law passed in 1876 [Laws 1876, c. 97] for the chartering of railway corporations omitted any express provision as to right of way upon lands belonging to the state, but, as before, regulated the acquisition of such rights over private property by agreement or condemnation." Justice Williams, after this comment upon the state of the law, proceeds to show that the absence of any provision for the acquisition of right of way over public properties pervaded all general legislation on the subject until the Revision of 1879. Rev. St. 1879, c. 8. While it is not expressly held, nor was it necessary to be decided in the case cited, it is inferentially held that prior to the passage of the act a charter, authorizing the construction of a railway through a country held in part by private ownership and in part by the state, the general laws providing for acquisition of right of way was from private owners, but leaving the company powerless against the lands of the state, impliedly granted the right to construct through and over the public domain. The grant is so necessary to the exercise of the general powers conferred, it is inevitably carried by the general terms of the grant. This is in accord with the elementary rule of construction that a power necessary to the exercise of a power already granted will be implied. We are of the opinion, therefore, that by its charter the Great Northern Company acquired the right to enter upon and appropriate so much of the public domain over which its route was projected as was necessary for its right of way, not to exceed the prescribed width, and that having done so the width actually appropriated was not affected by the subsequent grant and by the state of the Lang survey. By the description in the grant the grantees had actual notice of the railway company's existence and its powers and the fact that the Wilson Lang grant had been located along its line. They took subject to the rights acquired by the company. A land certificate issued by the Commissioner of the General Land Office for 640 or any number of acres of land, as a general rule, authorizes the holder thereof to locate the same wherever the holder thereof can find unappropriated public domain of the class designated in the certificate, and, although the cases are numerous where land certificates and the two articles quoted above from the general railway law of the state have been considered by the courts, in none of the cases are we able to find where the articles of the statutes relating to railroads or special acts of the Legislature granting lands have been questioned by reason of uncertainty; nor are we cited to any case declaring any railroad right of way, under such statutes, void by reason of such uncertainty.

In Bybee v. O. & C. R. Co., 139 U. S. 663, 11 Sup. Ct. 641, 35 L. Ed. 305, the question was considered which is raised by the appellees in this case, and it was there held that lands granted by Congress to aid in the construction of railroads do not revert, after condition broken, until a forfeiture has been asserted by the United States, and that a person subsequently acquiring any part of the public lands over which a railway company had been granted a right of way by Congress took such land subject to the prior right of the railway company, and used this language: "The distinction between a right of way over the public lands and lands granted in aid of construction of the road is important in this connection. As to the latter, the rights of settlers or others, who acquire lands by purchase or occupation between the passage of the act and the actual location and identification of the lands, are preserved unimpaired, while the grant of the right of way is subject to no such condition; and in the construction given by this court to a similar grant, in St. Joseph & D. C. Ry. Co. v. Baldwin, 103 U. S. 426, at page 430 [26 L. Ed. 578], a person subsequently acquiring any part of such right of way takes it subject to the prior right of the railroad company. As remarked by the court in that case: 'If the company could be compelled to purchase its way over any section that might be occupied in advance of its location, very serious obstacles would be often imposed to the progress of the road. For any such loss of lands by settlement or reservation, other lands are given; but for the loss of the right of way by this means, no compensation is provided, nor could any be given by the substitution of another route.'" In that case, by section 8 of the act of Congress (Act July 23, 1866, c. 212, 14 Stat. 210), there was granted to the O. & C. Railroad Company the right of way through the public lands to the extent of 100 feet in width on each side of said railroad where it might pass over public lands, including all necessary grounds for stations, etc.; and by section 6 of the act the companies were required to file their assent to the act within one year, and to complete the first 20 miles within two years, etc. Jones v. Erie & W. V. Ry. Co., 144 Pa. 629, 23 Atl. 251, is authority for our holding in this case that, in the absence of any designation of the boundaries of the plaintiff's right of way, the presumption is that it extends 100 feet on each side of the center of the main line of appellant's track as it has been constructed since the date of its grant in 1873, and that it is presumed to take the full width granted. To the same effect is Campbell v. Ind. & V. Ry. Co., 110 Ind. 490, 11 N. E. 482; Gaston v. Gainesville & D. Elec. Ry. Co., 120 Ga. 516, 48 S. E. 188; Kindred v. U. P. R. R. Co., 168 Fed. 648, 94 C. C. A. 112; P. & R. Ry. Co. v. Obert, 109 Pa. 193, 1 Atl. 398; Prather v. W. U. Telegraph Co., 89 Ind. 501; N. P. Ry. Co. v. Smith, 171 U. S. 261, 18 Sup. Ct. 794, 43 L. Ed. 157. While the evidence is not perfectly clear upon the point, we think the record shows that plaintiff's line of road had been surveyed and staked across section 156 prior to the time the section was awarded to Lester, under whom appellees claim. This, however, becomes a matter of secondary importance under the view we take of the case.

[4] The proposition under appellant's first assignment of error is that the land in controversy belonged to the plaintiff, and by reason of the growth of Amarillo it has become necessary to use this land for switches and storage tracks, and consequently the court erred in refusing to permit plaintiff to prove the necessity existing for the use of said land. This assignment is sustained, as the evidence was admissible upon the issue of abandonment.

The second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments of error are based upon the action of the court in admitting in evidence a statement of facts agreed to, together with certain letters attached thereto, and will be considered together. Counsel for appellant and appellees entered into an agreed statement of facts in order to save time and expense of establishing the facts, which statement it was understood should not be introduced, unless objections made thereto by appellant should be overruled by the trial judge. This agreement related to a different tract of land lying west of the tract in controversy, but which was also 50 feet in width, and the northerly line of which was 50 feet south of the center of plaintiff's main track. It appears that plaintiff and its attorneys and officials had no knowledge of the extent of plaintiff's right of way, but were laboring under the impression that said right of way across section 156 was only 100 feet in width, and that during this time, on the 16th day of April, 1898, appellees secured a deed from the then owners of that particular portion of section 156 abutting upon plaintiff's right of way, which conveyed the particular strip of land referred to in the agreement in question. This is expressed in the agreement; and it is further shown that plaintiff, in 1897, constructed a siding, the south rail of which is along the north line of, and a few inches over on, the particular strip referred to in the agreement, and in rearranging its telegraph poles around its new depot, in 1897, a few posts were placed about eight feet over on said strip, where they remained until after appellee the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company secured its deed thereto on the 16th day of April, 1898. After securing the deed the said Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company constructed its track along said strip, when, for the first time, the question as to the ownership thereof and the location of the true dividing line between plaintiff and said strip was raised. That the matter was brought to the attention of J. V. Goode, the then superintendent of appellant, who had a conference with one Faulkner, the general manager of the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company, when it was by them discussed. After which the work of the Pecos & Northern Texas in the construction of its track and sidings along said strip proceeded. The Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company also constructed on said strip toolhouse, coalhouse, and express office, as well as a platform and passageway across the strip to appellant's depot, and held peaceable and undisputed possession thereof, without any knowledge upon its part, except such as may be imputed by law, until about the 15th day of August, 1902, when its agent observed that the Waters Pierce Oil Company had begun to place storage tanks on the north edge of said strip, and upon inquiry was informed by the agent of the oil company that the then superintendent of appellant, Mr. Scott, had given his permission for such construction, which resulted in another conference between the officials of appellant and appellee the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company as to their respective rights. Said agreement further states that in April, 1898, A. B. Spencer, the station agent of appellant at Amarillo, suggested the purchase of said strip, which was done on the 15th day of June, 1901. The letters referred to are dated May 26, 1906, written by Faulkner, the general manager of appellee, to J. W. Terry, its general attorney, and from said Faulkner to a Mr. Mudge, another official of appellee railway company. Appellant insists that the letters and the agreement should not have been admitted in evidence, because they related to a wholly distinct and separate tract of land from that involved in the suit, and therefore no action on the part of the plaintiff with reference to said former controversy could be binding in this suit.

Appellant further insists that the agreed statement is inadmissible as an estoppel, because none of the representations or admissions claimed to have been made by plaintiff's officials could have been relied upon by appellees, or could have induced any action on the part of defendants with reference to the land involved in this suit, causing them to change their position for the worse; that the law of estoppel does not apply because appellant's superintendents were ignorant of the true location of the boundary lines of plaintiff's right of way, and any representations or admissions made by them were through mistake, even though they had been authorized to make such admissions. It further insists that no authority was shown on the part of its superintendents to make any admissions or statements, and, as such action was not within the apparent scope of their authority, appellant should not be bound thereby. It further insists, under these assignments, that appellant is not estopped from asserting title to the tract in question in this suit, as neither of the superintendents were apprised of the true state of the title. Appellant further insists that appellee's general manager, Faulkner, had equal means with appellant's superintendent, Goode, of ascertaining the true state of the title which plaintiff had to the land under consideration at that time, because plaintiff's charter containing the grant was a public law, of which every one must take notice; consequently, even though it be held that Superintendent Goode was charged with notice by reason of this being a public law, the same rule charged Faulkner with notice, and the law of estoppel does not apply.

[5, 6] The letters, being correspondence between appellee's officials, were clearly not admissible and could not bind the appellant, who had no notice of them, even though they related to the tract of land in issue in this suit; and we think it is equally clear that any representations, agreements, or concessions made by appellant's superintendents, Goode and Scott, with reference to another and different part of its right of way, could not be extended so as to bind appellant railway company with reference to any other portion of its right of way obtained under its charter, even though it should be a part of the same section of land. The agreement in question should not have been admitted in evidence.

[7, 8] The eighth assignment of error complains of the action of the court in permitting the witness Avery Turner, an official of defendants, to detail the contents of a letter written by one Cotter, still another superintendent of appellant railway. The letter itself was not admissible, and to permit the witness to state: "His letter of June 27th was his permission for the crossing. We established the point of crossing by the location of the line after I received Mr. Cotter's letter and his permission"—was stating, in effect, the contents of the letter itself, and this assignment is sustained. The testimony and letter were further inadmissible, for the reason that it related to an interlocking agreement made between the superintendents of the two roads, and that the crossing in no way touched the land in controversy.

[9] Under the ninth assignment of error, appellant insists that the court erred in admitting, over the objection of plaintiff, the testimony of the witness Avery Turner to the effect that plaintiff made no objection when the appellee Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company's track was laid across the land in controversy. The evident purpose of this testimony was to create an estoppel against plaintiff by silence on its part when it was its duty to speak. It is plain from the record that at the time of the construction of the track by the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company across the land in question appellant's officials had no actual knowledge of the fact that appellant owned the land, and under such conditions estoppel by silence does not apply. Burns v. True, 5 Tex. Civ. App. 74, 24 S. W. 338; Stanley v. Schwalby, 85 Tex. 348, 19 S. W. 264; Pierce v. Texas Rice Development Co., 52 Tex. Civ. App. 205, 114 S. W. 857.

[10, 11] It is true that the right of way was granted by special act of the Legislature, but the act is also a public law, and was notice to the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company of the extent of appellant's rights. As a matter of fact, the officials of all the roads were ignorant of the provisions of the charter granting a right of way 200 feet in width across the section; but, since there is a pseudo-presumption that "every one is presumed to know the law," when the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company built its siding across the land, it must be held to have done so with full knowledge of the special act, and must be governed by the rules applicable to such condition. So appellant is not estopped by its failure to object to appellees doing something which both constructively and presumptively knew could not legally be done. In Preston et al. v. S. & M. T. Ry. Co., 70 Tex. 375, 7 S. W. 825, it is held that where a railroad company enters on land and constructs its road over it, without acquiring a legal right so to do, the materials used in its construction do not become the property of the landowner, but the company may remove them, and will not be liable as for a conversion.

[12] The Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company was not a party to the interlocking switch agreement, but it seems from the record that this agreement was made by appellant and the Southern Kansas Railway Company of Texas; and therefore any act on the part of appellant with reference to that agreement could not be taken advantage of as an estoppel by the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company. It follows that the testimony of the witness Avery Turner on this point should have been excluded, and this assignment is sustained.

For the reasons stated in passing upon the ninth assignment, the tenth assignment is also sustained, and the testimony should have been excluded.

[13] The court admitted in evidence, over the objection of plaintiff, the deed from plaintiff to the Pecos & Northern Texas Railway Company, dated the 7th day of August, 1908, transferring a part of its right of way beginning on the western boundary of section No. 156 and which was no part of the land involved in this suit. This was error, and the eleventh assignment is sustained.

[14] It is insisted by the twelfth assignment that the court erred in refusing to give the peremptory instruction requested by plaintiff, requiring the jury to return a verdict in favor of plaintiff. This assignment is overruled. In our opinion, as heretofore stated, the right of the appellant railway company to its right of way across section 156 was not lost by its failure to locate and build its road across said section until 1887, and to file its map with the Commissioner of the General Land Office, in compliance with section 15 of the charter. The special charter granted by the Legislature contains no condition of forfeiture, and no suit had been filed by the state to enforce a forfeiture by reason of appellant's failure to comply with its above-named conditions. Houston & T. C. Ry. Co. v. State of Texas, 170 U. S. 243, 18 Sup. Ct. 610, 42 L. Ed. 1023; Bybee v. O. & C. Ry. Co., 139 U. S. 663, 11 Sup. Ct. 641, 35 L. Ed. 305; McAdam v. Lumber Co., 57 Wash. 407, 107 Pac. 187.

The thirteenth and fourteenth assignments are overruled, as, in our opinion, the issues of fact should have been submitted to the jury.

The fifteenth assignment is sustained, since the evidence shows that the Southern Kansas Railway Company of Texas was not entitled to judgment for any part of the land in controversy; that its line of road terminated at the northern boundary of the land in controversy; and that it could not be held to be in possession of any part thereof.

The sixteenth and seventeenth assignments are overruled.

For the errors pointed out, the judgment is reversed and the cause remanded.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 374*)—APPEAL BOND—NECESSITY.

If one brings action in her individual capacity and as administratrix, while she cannot appeal in her individual capacity without giving a bond, she by express provision of Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 1408, does not have to give bond on appeal in her capacity as administratrix.

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK—EVIDENCE.

Whether a car inspector, who, after cars had been pushed against others to make a coupling, went between those first there to inspect them, assumed the risk of the switching crew repeating this without notice to him, the first attempt having been unsuccessful, held under the evidence a question for the jury.

Appeal from District Court, Bowie County; P. A. Turner, Judge.

Action by Mrs. Lillie B. Casey, individually and as administratrix, against the Texarkana & Ft. Smith Railway Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Between 5 and 6 o'clock on the morning of December 23, 1909, Ben F. Casey, while engaged in the discharge of duties he owed to appellee as one of its car inspectors, suffered injuries resulting in his death a few hours thereafterwards. He left surviving him his wife and several children. On the theory that the injuries were caused by the negligence of other employés of appellee, this suit was brought to recover damages occasioned by his death. At the time Casey was injured, appellee was engaged in interstate commerce, and Casey was employed by it in such commerce; and it is conceded that whether appellee is liable or not for the damages sought to be recovered must be determined with reference to the provisions of the act of Congress of April 22, 1906, usually referred to as the "Federal Employer's Liability Act" (Act April 22, 1906, c. 149, 35 Stat. 65 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1322]). By the terms of that act, in a case like this one is, the right of action for damages recoverable is exclusively in the personal representative of the deceased, for the benefit of his surviving widow and children. It appears from the allegations in the petition that this suit was prosecuted by Mrs. Lillie B. Casey, deceased's widow, in her own right and as temporary administratrix of his estate. She alleged that "on the 17th day of May, 1911, she was duly appointed by the county court of Bowie county, Tex., administratrix of the estate of Ben F. Casey, deceased, without bond, and was granted by said court the power to prosecute any and all suits for the recovery of damages for the death of the said Ben F. Casey," and further alleged as follows: "That up until the 17th day of May, 1911, there had never been any administration upon the estate of the said Ben F. Casey, deceased, and that there had never been any necessity for any administration upon the estate of the said Ben F. Casey, unless such administration is necessary to the prosecution of the suit for damages which are entitled to be recovered for the benefit of his surviving widow and children. Plaintiff alleges that ever since the death of the said Ben F. Casey she has been acting as his personal representative in the capacity of surviving wife until May 17, 1911; that on May 17, 1911, plaintiff, Lillie B. Casey, was duly appointed and duly qualified as temporary administratrix of the estate of said Ben F. Casey by the county judge of Bowie county, Tex., and such temporary administration has been duly continued ever since, and plaintiff now and ever since has been such administratrix; that the said Casey left no will, and the debts, if any, owing by him at the time of his death, did not make an administration upon his estate necessary." In its answer to the suit appellee, among other things, alleged that Mrs. Casey "has no legal capacity to maintain this suit as the administratrix or personal representative of the estate of Ben F. Casey, deceased; that the alleged appointment of the said Mrs. Lillie B. Casey as such administratrix by the county court of Bowie county was and is void; but that, if mistaken as to this, said appointment has long since expired; and that she is not now, either the administratrix of said estate or the personal representative of the said Ben F. Casey, deceased." This plea was verified by the affidavit of one of appellee's counsel, to the effect "that the facts set forth in the above and foregoing plea are true to the best of my knowledge and belief." It does not appear from the record that any effort was made by appellee to have the issue it attempted to make by this plea determined, nor that it was determined, by the court. After the testimony had been heard, the court peremptorily instructed the jury to find for appellee. In accordance with such a finding, a judgment was rendered "that the plaintiff, Mrs. Lillie B. Casey, prosecuting this action in her own right and as personal representative of Ben F. Casey, deceased, that is, as administratrix of the estate of Ben F. Casey, deceased, for the benefit of herself and also for the benefit of * * * the children of said Ben F. Casey, deceased, take nothing by reason of said cause of action alleged, and that the defendant, the Texarkana & Ft. Smith Railway Company, be and is hereby discharged, to go hence without day, and that said defendant do have and recover of and from the plaintiffs in the capacity in which their action is and has been prosecuted by them, as aforesaid, all costs herein incurred." It appears that "the plaintiff, Mrs. Lillie B. Casey et al.," excepted to the judgment and gave notice of an appeal to this court.

WILLSON, C. J. (after stating the facts as above). [1, 2] Before determining the appeal on its merits, we will dispose of the motion made by appellee to dismiss it, on the ground, supported by the record, that it is being prosecuted without an appeal bond. So far as it should be construed to be an appeal by Mrs. Casey in her capacity as an individual, the motion should be sustained, for in that capacity she is not entitled, without first making and filing a bond, to prosecute an appeal; but, so far as it is an appeal by her as administratrix, the motion should be overruled, for in that capacity she is entitled, without making a bond, to prosecute an appeal. Sayles' Stat. art. 1408. From the allegations in the petition and recitals in the judgment, set out in the statement, we think it appears that she prosecuted the suit as administratrix and as such is prosecuting the appeal. It may be that she had not executed a bond as temporary administratrix, and therefore had not so qualified as to be authorized to act as such in the prosecution of the suit. Whether she had executed a bond or not was a question of fact to be determined in the first instance by the court below. It was not determined there. In the attitude the matter is presented to us, if the question should be said ever to have been made, as it must have been, if at all, by a plea verified by affidavit (Sayles' Stat. art. 1265; Graham v. McCarty, 69 Tex. 323, 7 S. W. 342), we think it should be treated here as having been waived by the failure of appellee to have it determined by the court below and to assign error on it (Grand Lodge v. Stumpf, 24 Tex. Civ. App. 309, 58 S. W. 840; Blum v. Strong, 71 Tex. 329, 6 S. W. 167; Railway Co. v. Harlan, 62 S. W. 972).

The motion will be overruled so far as it applies to the appeal of Mrs. Casey as administratrix, and will be sustained so far as it applies to an appeal by her in her individual capacity.

[3, 4] Referring now to the merits of the appeal, we are of the opinion that the court below erred in peremptorily instructing the jury to find for appellee. The main track in appellee's yards in Texarkana, Tex., extended north and south. A short distance east of and parallel with that track was another, known as "track No. 1," and a short distance west of and parallel with said main track was another, known as "long house track." Both No. 1 and long house tracks were connected by switches to the main track. Between 5 and 6 o'clock, and when it was still dark, on the morning of December 23, 1908, freight train No. 74, from points in Louisiana, destined to points in Arkansas, reached appellee's said yards and was placed on track No. 1. Immediately thereafterwards Casey and an assistant began to inspect the cars constituting that train. On completing the inspection thereof Casey, having in the meantime been informed by Hiams, foreman of the switching crew, that 12 empty coal cars then on long house track were to be carried on as a part of train No. 74, soon to proceed north, in the discharge of his duty went to and commenced inspecting said coal cars. While he was engaged in this work, the switching crew cut the train on track No. 1, carrying 16 cars forming a part of same north on the main track, "kicked" two of the number south on said main track, and then pushed the other fourteen onto long house track, propelling them against the coal cars for the purpose of coupling thereto. The cars failed to couple when the attempt was first made. As a result of the collision, the coal cars rolled south about 15 feet on long house track, where they stopped. The fourteen cars out of train No. 74 were then again shoved south, against the coal cars, colliding with and pushing the latter several car lengths further south. Between the time when the collision occurred between the coal cars and the cars out of train No. 74, in the effort first made to effect the coupling, and the time when the second collision occurred, Casey, in the discharge of his duty, had gone between two of the coal cars. As a result of the second collision he was hit by the cars, and knocked down, and suffered the injuries which caused his death. Negligence on the part of Casey contributing to the injury he suffered not being a bar to a right in his administratrix to recover damages for his death, the questions controlling on the issue as to liability on the part of appellee were: (1) Did the testimony make a question for the jury as to whether the switching crew were guilty of negligence or not in shoving the cars out of train No. 74 against the coal cars in the second attempt to make a coupling, without first warning Casey of their intention to do so? (2) Did the testimony make a question for the jury as to whether Casey had assumed the risk of such conduct on the part of the switching crew or not? We think both questions should be answered in the affirmative. There was testimony showing that appellee had promulgated a rule requiring car inspectors, if they did not wish cars they were inspecting to be moved while they were inspecting same, to place blue lights at the ends thereof, and prohibiting other employees from removing lights so placed and from coupling to or moving cars so protected. There also was evidence from which a jury might have found that the rule was not construed by appellee's employees as applying to cars designated, as the coal cars were, as "pick ups," meaning thereby, it seems, cars temporarily placed on a side track to be carried out by incoming trains, and that it was never observed as to such cars. There was testimony authorizing a jury to find that the switching crew knew, or should have known, that Casey was engaged in inspecting the coal cars at the time they pushed the other cars against them, and authorizing a finding that they knew, or should have known, that in inspecting the coal cars Casey might go between them. There was testimony which would have authorized a finding by the jury that it was not customary for the switching crew to propel other cars against cars which they knew to be undergoing inspection. Sturdevant, a member of the switching crew, testified: "As to our custom to couple onto cars in that yard while an inspector was doing the work of inspection, we do not do it if we know the inspector is around it. * * * I never coupled into any cars that had to be inspected to become part of a train, while inspectors were performing the work of inspection. It wasn't customary to my knowledge. * * * It is customary to wait until the inspector had finished the work of inspection when we were notified by the inspector, or when we knew he was doing the work of inspection. I never knew of a blue light on a car unless an inspector was doing some work on it." While the testimony of Iiams, foreman of the switching crew, and of Bently, a member of that crew, indicated that Casey was advised by Iiams, before he (Casey) began the inspection of the coal cars, that cars out of train No. 74 would be pushed onto long house track against the coal cars, and that the latter would be shoved south thereon fourteen car lengths, Sturdevant testified, with reference to what Iiams said to Casey: "I heard Iiams tell him (Casey) that we were going to throw two bad orders—going to pull those sixteen out and throw two bad orders on the main line and shove the balance of the cut in on top of the coal cars on long house. I can't say whether he said anything about doubling over." From this testimony we think a jury might have found that the switching crew, having shoved "the balance of the cut in on top of the coal cars," should have anticipated that Casey might believe, as his declaration made after he received the injuries, testified to by Bently, that he "thought the boys were through," indicated he did, that the coal cars would not be further moved while he was inspecting them. If a jury might have found that reasonably prudent persons engaged in the work the switching crew were engaged in should have anticipated that Casey might so conclude and go between the coal cars as he did, we see no reason why they might not have further found that, in making the second attempt to couple the cars, the switching crew were guilty of negligence. And on the same testimony we see no reason why a jury might not have found that the risk resulting from their negligence was not assumed by Casey. We think the testimony presented issues for determination by the jury, and that the court erred in refusing to submit the case to them. Therefore the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Galveston.
Nov. 9, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. MORTGAGES (§ 330*)—FORECLOSURE BY EXERCISE OF POWER OF SALE—NOTICE TO MORTGAGOR—STATUTES.

Acts 1889, c. 118 (Rev. St. 1895, art. 2369), provided that notice of a sale of real estate under a trust deed should be given "as now required in judicial sales." The statute as to judicial sales in force at the time when the act of 1889 was enacted did not require personal service of notice on the defendant in execution. The act adopting the Revised Statutes in 1895 (Final Title, § 19), and also the act adopting the Revised Statutes in 1911 (Final Title, § 16), provided that the provisions of the Revised Statutes, so far as they are substantially the same as the statutes in force at the time when the Revised Statutes shall go into effect, shall be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments. The Revised Statutes of 1911 continued as article 3759 article 2369 of the Revised Statutes of 1895 in its exact language. Held, that a sale by a trustee in a deed of trust made in 1911 is to be governed by the act of 1889, rather than by a subsequent statute requiring service of notice on the defendant in execution, and hence no service on the mortgagor is necessary, especially in view of Acts 1903, c. 77 (article 3757, Rev. Civ. St. 1911), relating to sales under execution, and providing that nothing therein contained shall affect the method of advertising land under powers conferred by any deed of trust or other contract lien.

2. BILLS AND NOTES (§ 139*)—CONTRACTS—CONSIDERATION—EXTENSIONS.

A payment of part of the interest due on a note is no consideration for an extension of time.

3. ESTOPPEL (§ 78*)—INVALID CONTRACT—DEFAULT IN PAYMENT OF INTEREST—OPTION TO DECLARE ENTIRE NOTE DUE.

Though a payment of a portion of the interest due on a note was no consideration for an agreement to extend time of payment if such agreement induced the maker to relax his efforts to procure money, which he could otherwise have procured, and thus avoided the exercise of an option by the holder to declare the note due for nonpayment of interest, the holder would be estopped to exercise such option at that time.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Charles E. Ashe, Judge.

Suit by W. C. Corbett and another to enjoin J. J. Sweeney and others from selling lands. From an order dissolving a temporary injunction, the plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Woods, Graham & Harris, of Houston, for appellants. Fisher, Sears & Campbell, of Houston, for appellees.

REESE, J. This is an appeal from an order of Hon. Chas. E. Ashe, district judge, dissolving a temporary writ of injunction theretofore issued at the suit of W. C. Corbett and wife, Ella Corbett, enjoining the defendants J. J. Sweeney, William Giles, and George J. Mellinger from selling certain lands under a deed of trust executed by said Corbett to secure the payment of a promissory note executed by him to Sweeney for $22,500. Temporary injunction was issued upon the order of the district judge September 5, 1912. Defendants filed motion to dissolve, and afterwards a further amended motion setting out in full their grounds therefor, which is, in fact, an answer to plaintiffs' petition, and is sworn to. Upon hearing of the motion to dissolve evidence was introduced by both parties, and upon the conclusion the motion to dissolve was granted. From the order dissolving the injunction this appeal is prosecuted. It appears that the Union Land Company, claiming to be owner of the land, filed a plea in intervention and also prayed for injunction. In so far as the order dissolving the temporary injunction affects such intervener, there is no appeal by it, and it will not be necessary to refer farther to this branch of the case.

The undisputed facts as they are shown by the pleadings and evidence are as follows:

On May 30, 1911, W. C. Corbett executed to J. J. Sweeney his certain promissory note for $22,500 for money borrowed by him from Sweeney, being a consolidation of several smaller loans previously made. The note was payable to Sweeney or order three years after date, with interest at the rate of 9 per cent. per annum payable semiannually, and contained a provision that upon failure to pay any installment of interest when due, or to pay the taxes on the land embraced in the deed of trust given to secure the same, the holder of the note at his option might declare the same due, principal and interest, and proceed to enforce collection by sale under the deed of trust. The note also provided for attorney's fees of $3,000 in case it was not paid at maturity, and was placed in the hands of an attorney for collection. At the same time Corbett executed a deed of trust upon the lands described in the petition to secure the note referred to, naming William Giles as trustee, and containing a provision that, upon failure, refusal, or inability to act as such, the legal owner and holder of the note was authorized to appoint a substitute with the same powers conferred upon the original trustee. The deed of trust authorized a sale of the land, if the note was not paid when due, either upon its face or by reason of the failure to pay any installment of interest or the taxes on the land as they accrued. This note was for value and before due regularly transferred by Sweeney to William Giles. Giles declined and refused to act as trustee in the deed of trust, and, as legal owner and holder of the note, regularly appointed George J. Mellinger substitute trustee, in accordance with the provisions of the trust deed, and on or about the — day of July, 1912, there being then two semi-annual installments of interest due and unpaid, amounting to $2,025, except the sum of $500 paid thereon, and the taxes for 1911, the said Giles declared the note due, in accordance with its terms, and called upon the substitute trustee to sell the property embraced in the deed of trust for the satisfaction thereof, whereupon the said Mellinger duly proceeded to advertise the property for sale on the first Monday in August, 1912, at the courthouse door of Harris county; the land being located in said county. Notice was given of such sale by publication in a newspaper published in Harris county, as provided in the deed of trust, for the length of time provided, but such sale was stopped by this injunction. No personal notice was given to Corbett as provided for sales of real estate under execution.

The grounds for injunction set up in the petition, and relied upon by appellant on this appeal, are substantially as follows: (1) That written notice of such sale had not been given to appellant as required in case of sales under execution. (2) That the land covered by the deed of trust is the separate estate of Mrs. Ella Corbett, wife of W. C. Corbett, and one of the plaintiffs, and that this fact was known to Sweeney before he took the deed of trust, and to Giles before the transfer of the notes and trust deed to him. (3) That 200 acres of the land is and was at the time of the execution of the trust deed the homestead of plaintiffs, which fact was also known to Sweeney and Giles. (4) That on June 5th Corbett had paid to Giles $500 in consideration of which Giles had agreed and promised to extend the time of payment of the interest due on the note for ninety days. (5) That defendants are claiming $3,000 as attorney's fees and $3,000 as trustee's commissions for making such sale, and that said attorney's fees are an outrageous and extortionate charge.

It was alleged that the property was of the value of $90,000, and that it would be sacrificed at such sale if it was allowed to be sold, and that said W. C. Corbett had tendered the interest due on the note, which defendants refused to receive. Defendants by their sworn answer denied specifically and in detail each of the material allegations of fact of the petition. They denied that the $500 was paid by Corbett to Giles upon any agreement for extension, but alleged that it was simply paid upon the interest on May 30th, when the second installment was due, with a promise by Corbett to pay the balance in a few days. The answer denies that the property is the separate property of Mrs. Corbett, or that any part thereof is the homestead of plaintiffs, alleging that the land stood upon the public records in the name of W. C. Corbett and was acquired by him during the marriage, and denying that it was paid for with the separate means of Mrs. Corbett, alleged that if it was, neither Sweeney, when he took the deed of trust, nor Giles, when he acquired the note, had any notice or knowledge of any claim or interest of Mrs. Corbett therein as her separate estate. The facts going to show that no part of the land was the homestead of plaintiffs, but that their homestead was upon certain lots in the city of Houston, were fully set out, in connection with the specific denial of the homestead claim. It was alleged that the note provided for the payment of $3,000 attorney's fees, that the same had been placed in the hands of an attorney for collection, and that defendants had agreed to pay them said amount and that the amount was reasonable. The case was heard upon the pleadings and evidence, which is very full, filling 128 pages of a statement of facts. There is no specific assignment of error, nor briefs, but since the oral argument upon submission, on the suggestion of the court, each party has filed a brief written statement. That of appellants is confined to the first ground for the injunction, as above set out, to wit, that written notice of such sale was not given by the trustee as required in case of sales under execution. We think this question is settled by the decision of the Supreme Court in Fischer v. Simon, 95 Tex. 234, 66 S. W. 447.

[1] It is insisted by appellant that since the adoption of the Revised Statutes of 1911 a different construction of the particular provision in question in article 3759 of that revision is required, and that Fischer v. Simon is not applicable. Article 3759 in the revision of 1911 is in the exact language of article 2369 of the revision of 1895, and of the original act of March 21, 1889. The Revised Statutes of 1911 contain the same provision as that contained in section 19, General Provisions of Revised Statutes of 1895 (section 16, General Provision, R. S. 1911), to wit: "The provisions of the Revised Statutes, so far as they are substantially the same as the statutes of this state in force at the time when the Revised Statutes shall go into effect, or of the common law in force at said time, shall be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments of the same." What is said by the Supreme Court in the case cited is exactly applicable to a case arising since the adoption of the Revised Statutes of 1911. It was not necessary that the trustee give to appellant Corbett written notice of the sale, as is required in case of sale under execution. This is, we think, further emphasized by the provisions of the act of 1903, c. 77, relating to sales under execution, which is as follows: "But nothing herein shall affect the method of advertising land under powers conferred by any deed of trust or other contract lien." Article 3757, R. S. 1911.

tion, as to the agreement, upon payment of the $500, to extend the time of payment then due for 90 days, it is urged by appellee that such agreement, if made, was without consideration as appears from plaintiff's petition, and was nudum pactum—citing Helms v. Crane, 4 Tex. Civ. App. 89, 23 S. W. 392; Yeary v. Smith, 45 Tex. 71. Inasmuch as two installments of interest were due, the payment of a part thereof furnished no consideration for the promise. Still, if, relying upon such promise, appellant Corbett relaxed his efforts to procure the money, which otherwise he could and would have procured in time to have avoided the exercise of the option by appellee Giles to declare the notes due, we are inclined to think that such action would have worked an equitable estoppel upon Giles to declare the notes due at that time. This, however, is not material in view of the specific denial.

[4] As to the other grounds for the injunction, the specific denial by the answer, especially as it was supported by abundance of evidence on the hearing, left it largely in the discretion of the trial court whether the temporary injunction should be dissolved or continued to the hearing. 1 Joyce on Injunctions, §§ 307, 308. It is not necessary to refer to the voluminous testimony on the hearing further than to say that while there are sharp conflicts upon the material facts, the judge hearing the motion had the witnesses before him, and was in a better position than this court to judge of their credibility, and the weight of their testimony. It was amply sufficient to authorize the conclusion that there is no merit in the application for the temporary injunction. As we have seen, he is vested in such cases with a large discretion, and we cannot say that he erred in granting the motion to dissolve. If in fact the property is the separate estate of Mrs. Corbett, or if 200 acres thereof was at the date of the execution of the deed of trust the homestead of appellants, the sale under the trust deed will not affect their rights growing out of these facts.

[5] In the matter of attorney's fees and commissions of the trustee, if they are not a proper charge, the law affords appellants ample protection without enjoining the entire sale. Appellants would have occupied a better position in a court of equity if they had paid or offered to pay the debt and interest and sought only relief against a sale for these alleged extortionate fees and commissions. They have no right to stop the sale for the entire debt on the ground that part of it is not due. Railway Co. v. Presidio County, 53 Tex. 522; Rosenberg v. Weeks, 67 Tex. 584, 4 S. W. 899.

We conclude that the judge did not err in granting the motion to dissolve, and the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 201*)—FELLOW SERVANTS—CONCURRENT NEGLIGENCE OF MASTER AND FELLOW SERVANT.

Where the master's negligence in failing to guard dangerous machinery is the proximate cause of injury, he is not relieved from liability by the fact that plaintiff's fellow servant was negligent in operating the machine.

3. TRIAL (§ 260*)—REQUESTS FOR INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTION OWNER GAVE.

Where the main charge in a servant's action for injuries affirmatively required the jury to find both that the failure to provide safeguards was negligence and that such failure was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury, the court was not required to further present the issue of proximate cause by a special charge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 252*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CONFORMITY TO PROOF.

There must be some proof that rules were promulgated to promote the safety of an inexperienced minor employé, or a specific order given as to the manner in which his work should be carried on, before it is error to refuse to submit an instruction based on contributory negligence for violating such known rules or specific order.

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 270*)—UNGUARDED MACHINERY—EVIDENCE.

In an action for injuries from dangerous unguarded machinery, where a question as to whether it could have been guarded without interfering with its operation was in issue, evidence that a guard was placed over part of it to show that it was practicable to have it so guarded, and that such guard did not interfere with its operation, was competent.

6. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 203*)—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—ASSUMED RISK.

The defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence are fundamentally inconsistent with each other, and the existence of one necessarily excludes the other.

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES AND PROOF.

Where the evidence in a servant's action for injuries raised the issue of contributory negligence, but did not warrant an issue of his assumption of risk, error in submitting that issue conjunctively with the inconsistent issue of contributory negligence was harmless to defendant.

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County.

Action by Eddie Morgan, by next friend, against Armour & Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Eddie Morgan, a boy about 15 years of age, had the entire forefinger of his left hand severed, and the thumb on that hand mashed and broken, causing it to be crooked and stiff, by being caught in the "lifter" of a machine being operated by appellant in a department of its packing plant at North Ft. Worth. The machine is used to place and brad round pieces of tin, called "ears," on tin buckets, and is described as being constructed of a metal frame and in shape like a table. The top is flat and is 24 inches wide, 5 feet long, and 31 inches from the floor. Immediately underneath the top of the frame is a board of iron 6 inches wide; otherwise it is open underneath. The legs are bolted to the floor of the room, and also from each corner of the frame rods are run to the joists of the flooring and securely bolted. There is located a slot, or feeder, in which the pieces of tin, or "ears," are placed, 17 inches higher than the top of the frame and 12 inches outside of it, and on the top and about the center are located two sets of dies. The machinery which operates the driving part of the machine is located underneath the frame. A portion of this machinery underneath is called a "lifter." It is operated by a pedal. The operator presses the pedal with his right foot, and the lifter falls down about $4\frac{1}{2}$ inches and comes up and permits the two dies to come together and brad the ears to the bucket. Four boys are employed to operate the machine; one to press the pedal, one to feed the slot, or ear chute, one to bring buckets to the machine to be eared, and one to carry away and stack same after they are eared. In the course of feeding the ears in the slot, or chute, it is usual for a number of the ears to fall on the floor near and by the machine, and it is required of and made a part of the duties of the feeder of the slot, or ear chute, to pick the ears from the floor. Eddie Morgan was employed by appellant as feeder of the slot, or ear chute. According to the proof made by appellee, the operator of the pedal shut off the motive power from the machine and brought it to a standstill and went to get a drink of water in the other end of the building, telling Eddie that was what he was going to do. While the operator was away and the machinery was not in motion, Eddie got off his stool and knelt on the floor, using his right hand to pick up the ears that had fallen on the floor; his left hand partly resting on the top of the machine. The operator got a drink of water, came back, and suddenly and without warning pressed his foot against the pedal, and the machinery started up. The vibration of the machine in operation immediately jarred Eddie's left hand off the table downward, and it was caught in the stroke of the lifter and injured. There was evidence offered by appellant that Eddie Morgan was sitting on a stool, stooping over picking up ears from the floor while the machine was in motion, and the stool slipped out from under him, and in his effort to catch he involuntarily threw his left hand under the machine, and the lifter caught it. The jury settled this conflict against appellant's contention. The machinery underneath the frame had no fender around it and was not guarded. It was shown that it was practicable and feasible to operate the lifter and machine with a guard or fender.

Appellee pleaded three grounds of negligence, but the court did not submit to the jury but one of the grounds for recovery, which was the second ground in the petition, and that was the failure to safeguard the cogwheels and other machinery under the table. The appellant answered by general denial, and specially pleaded that Eddie Morgan assumed the risks incident to his employment, and that he was injured by reason of his own contributory negligence and by reason of the negligence of a fellow servant.

The evidence warrants the conclusion that the appellant was guilty of negligence in failing to provide guards or fenders to dangerous machinery as pleaded, proximately causing the injury to the minor, and that the minor did not assume the risk and was not guilty of contributory negligence. The evidence warrants the amount of the verdict.

Capps, Cantey, Hanger & Short, and Wm. L. Evans, all of Ft. Worth, for appellant. A. J. Clendenen and Ben M. Terrell, both of Ft. Worth, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The first assignment predicates error upon the refusal of the court to give a peremptory instruction in favor of the appellant. The evidence was sufficient to make an issue, and require the court to submit it to the jury, of negligence vel non in the company in failing to safeguard the dangerous piece of machinery under the frame. The "lifter" was a device made of iron, and in operation rose up and came down in a $4\frac{1}{2}$ -inch stroke, and was without guard or fender. Only boys were employed to work at the machine. For the want of a fender, or guard, the hand of the boy Eddie Morgan was caught and mangled in the "lifter" while he was in the discharge of his duties in its immediate vicinity. The personal negligence of the company was the only ground of negligence that was submitted to the jury. The assignment is overruled.

[2] The third and fourth assignments predicate error upon the refusal of the court to give the special charge authorizing a verdict for appellant upon the finding that the negligence of Tom Driscoll, a fellow servant of Eddie Morgan, occasioned the injury. It was not error to refuse the charge, for the fellow-servant doctrine relieving a master from liability for injuries inflicted was not applicable to the ground that the liability of the company was made to depend by the charge of the court to the jury and under the evidence. The charge of the court only authorized a recovery of damages from appellant upon the finding by the jury of personal negligence of the company in failing to safeguard dangerous machinery, and such negligence being the proximate cause of the injury. The pleaded ground of liability predicated upon the negligent performance of duties by the coworker Driscoll was not submitted to the jury, and therefore was not an issue of liability before the jury. So if the injury to Eddie Morgan was traceable to the personal negligence of the company in failing to safeguard the machinery, as the evidence amply went to show, then the further fact that Driscoll, a coworker in the same common employment, was also negligent in operating the pedal, would not relieve the company of liability. It is the rule that, if the negligence of the master mingles with that of a fellow servant of the injured worker, the master is liable. Railway Co. v. Jones, 133 S. W. 744, and authorities there cited.

[3] The special charge was not required to further present the issue of "proximate cause," for the main charge affirmatively required the jury to find both that the failure to provide safeguards or fenders was negligence on the part of the company, and "that such failure was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury." Before the jury could return a verdict for appellee under this charge, they were required to find under all the evidence that the proximate cause of the injury was the personal negligence of the company.

The refusal by the court to give the special charge as written, complained of in the fifth assignment, does not furnish a reason for the reversal of the judgment. The charge precluded a recovery by the appellee upon the finding that it was a negligent disobedience of the rules of the shop and the instructions given him for Morgan to lean his body over from the stool he was sitting on in order to pick up the "ears" from the floor while the machine was running, if by reason of so doing he was injured. The charge, as seen, grouped together the two facts of violating the rules of the shop and the instructions given Morgan. The testimony in the record bearing at all upon "rules" or upon "instructions given" was that by Eddie Morgan and appellant's foreman. The evidence of Eddie Morgan was that the foreman had previously directed him to pick up from the floor the "ears" that had fallen, but that he was to perform this duty when the machine was not in motion, because if he stopped his work of feeding the ear chute the machine thereby stopped earing buckets. The evidence of the foreman is substantially to the same effect. The foreman testified: "I gave the boy instructions when he went to work there. I told him to feed those ears in the chute, that was his work, that is all he has to do, to keep those ears in the chute so as to supply the machine as they were used up. I had him on a stool while he was doing that. * * * They do drop ears on the floor, they drop lots of them, and they are left there until we get through. After we get through running the machine, we clean up and pick up those ears, but not while we are in operation. The reason we do not do it when it is in operation is because it would stop the machine and all the rest of the machines. It takes three or four persons to keep the machine going. That boy is supposed to stay there and feed the ears while the machine is going; I instructed him to that effect." Eddie Morgan further testified that he did not know of the danger of operation of the machinery, and had received no warning of any danger incident to his work. The only reasonable conclusion from the testimony is that an economical rule of work was devised that an employé was directed to follow. The evidence would not warrant the finding that a specific order was given the boy as to the manner in which the work should be carried on. There is no proof of any "rule of shop" of instructions as to danger of the work devised and promulgated for the safety of the minor employées operating the machine.

[4] It is believed that there must be some proof that rules were devised and promulgated by the master to promote the safety of an inexperienced minor employé, or a specific order given as to the manner in which the work shall be carried on, before there would be error in refusing to submit to the jury an instruction based on contributory negligence for violating such known rules or specific order. The court submitted a question of contributory negligence in the main charge.

[5] Assignments Nos. 6 to 15, inclusive, predicate error upon the admission of certain evidence. After the injury to Eddie Morgan, a guard, or fender, was placed by appellant over the part of the machinery which caused the injury. The appellee proved the fact that a fender, or guard, was placed over that part of the machinery for the purpose of showing that it was practicable and proper to have a guard around such part of the machine to make it safe from the dangers of its operation, and that the guard, or fender, did not interfere with the operation of the machine or any portion of it. Appellant contends that it was error to allow such proof to be made, and cites the McGowan (73 Tex. 355, 11 S. W. 836), and like cases in support of the point. The rule making incompetent evidence of subsequent changes or repairs in the machinery, as laid down in the McGowan Case, was differentiated in the later case of Railway Co. v. Johnston, 78 Tex. 536, 15 S. W. 104. See, also, Railway Co. v. Gay, 88 Tex. 111, 30 S. W. 543. In the Johnston Case, supra, the testimony there was held competent for the purpose for which it was offered and admitted. In the instant case appellees alleged that a guard, or fender, could have been placed over the "lifter" so as to render injury therefrom impossible to the operatives of the machine, without in any way interfering with the operation of the machine or any part of it. Appellant pleaded that the machine in question was of the most approved design, and that it was not practicable, safe, nor proper to have other guards or appliances around it than were on it at the time of the accident. Appellant proved by its foreman that the machine was a new machine of the latest design, modern in every particular, and exactly like those in the most up-to-date tinshops in the country. As there was no allegation, or recovery sought thereupon, that the machinery was defective or out of repair, in view of the record it is believed that the rule laid down in the Johnston Case, supra, proves the question here and makes the testimony competent for the purpose for which it was offered and admitted. The court excluded from its consideration by the jury that part of the evidence in the fifteenth assignment relating to a prior injury of an employé. The assignments are overruled.

The second, sixteenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twentieth-first, and twenty-second assignments are overruled as being without injury authorizing a reversal of the judgment.

[8, 7] By the seventeenth assignment error is predicated in the ninth paragraph of the court's charge, which was to the effect that the jury would return a verdict for appellant if Eddie Morgan knew, or in the performance of his duties about the earing machine would have discovered, the dangers to which he was exposed, and that he failed to exercise ordinary care for his own safety and was injured by reason thereof. The precise point made is that both the issue of assumed risk and of contributory negligence was raised by the evidence and should have been submitted as separate defenses, and that it was error to connect the two defenses by "and" as the court did. The case of Railway Co. v. Conroy, 83 Tex. 214, 18 S. W. 609, is cited by appellant as ruling the point. In the instant case, though, it could not be said that that case rules this one, for both defenses claimed were not raised by the evidence, and as a consequence the objection to the court's charge would afford no ground for reversal, for no injury resulted to appellant. According to the testimony relied on by appellant, the injury was occasioned by Eddie Morgan stooping partly over from the stool to the floor to pick up the "ears," and the stool overturning under him overbalanced him, and in the effort to prevent his falling Morgan involuntarily thrust his hand into the opening of the "lifter" while the same was in motion, causing his hand to be caught and injured. Therefore, if true that Morgan in the course of his employment negligently assumed such a position on the stool as to cause it to turn over, and such negligence led directly or contributed to the injury, then the issue made by the testimony for the jury was one of contributory negligence rather than assumed risk. But if the stool turning under him while performing the duty of picking up "ears" led to his injury and was a risk involved in the performance of his duties, and assuming that he had been instructed and cautioned as to the danger, and the risk was understood, then rather should Eddie Morgan be charged with having assumed the risk. We think, though, the evidence presented the issue of contributory negligence rather than assumed risk. In another paragraph the court submitted the issue of contributory negligence. However, from a consideration of all evidence of both appellee and appellant, we do not think both defenses exist. The defenses of assumption of risk and contributory negligence are fundamentally inconsistent with each other, and the existence of one of them necessarily excludes the other. As the entire testimony in the record does not, we think, warrant an issue of the minor in this case assuming the risk, the error in the charge is harmless.

The judgment is affirmed.

4. DEEDS (§ 165*)—CANCELLATION—GROUNDS.

5. DEEDS (§ 70*)—CANCELLATION—GROUNDS—FRAUD.

The rule that the failure of a grantee to perform covenants binding him to support the grantor for life and pay to her a specified sum, in consideration of which a deed was executed, is not fraud justifying the cancellation of the deed does not apply where the promises are made to defraud and without any intent at the time of performing them; but an instruction authorizing a finding of fraud on such theory is fatally defective, where it ignores the element that, when made, the promises were fraudulent and without any intent of performing them.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Wm. Masterson, Judge.

Action by P. B. Wyatt, administrator of Catherine Williams, deceased, against W. J. Chambers. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. H. Ward, of Houston, for appellant.
A. C. Van Velzer and Fred R. Switzer, both of Houston, for appellee.

HIGGINS, J. Catherine Williams, an aged and ignorant negress, owned and resided upon lots 4 and 5, in block 49, in the Baker addition to the city of Houston, and by general warranty deed, dated October 8, 1907, she conveyed the same to appellant, reciting a consideration of $10 in cash, the payment by Chambers of taxes due the city of Houston, the county of Harris, and the state of Texas, and other valuable considerations in hand paid, the receipt of which was acknowledged. Chambers at once went into possession of the premises, built a residence upon lot 5, in which he and his family lived, and made other improvements. The house in which the negress had lived for many years was moved upon lot 4 and repaired by Chambers, and she continued to live therein until a few days before her death, when she was removed to another place in the city by a niece. She died during the month of July, 1910, and on August 2d of that year this suit was filed to recover said premises by the appellee, as administrator of her estate. A recovery of the premises is sought upon two theories: First, that Catherine Williams only intended to convey lot 5, and that lot 4 had been inserted in the deed without her knowledge or consent, and she had executed the same upon the fraudulent representation and under the belief that lot 5 only was conveyed by the deed; second, that the conveyance was made in consideration of representations and promises by Chambers that he would pay the back taxes due upon the premises, would support and care for the grantor during her lifetime, and would pay her the further sum of $700 in cash; and there is a general allegation that these representations and promises were fraudulent, without particularizing in what the fraud consisted. In the petition it was further alleged that after the conveyance, and until a short time prior to her death, Catherine Williams had worked for Chambers as a servant, and the reasonable value of her service was $3 per week, for which amount a recovery was also sought. Defendant answered by general demurrer, general denial, plea of estoppel predicated upon the theory that immediately after the execution of the deed he went into possession with the full knowledge and consent of Catherine Williams, made permanent and valuable improvements upon the land, exercised control of and asserted his ownership thereof without protest on her part; wherefore he pleaded an estoppel to deny his ownership of the premises. He also pleaded permanent and valuable improvements made upon the premises in good faith, and prayed that he be allowed the value thereof, in the event of a recovery by plaintiff of the land.

[1, 2] As to those assignments relating to the plea of estoppel and the claim for the value of the improvements, it is sufficient to say that if the plaintiff was entitled to recover it was by virtue of fraud practiced by the defendant in obtaining a conveyance of the premises; and, his possession and apparent title being based upon his own fraud, the fact that he went into possession as a result of that fraud, and while wrongfully in possession thereof made such improvements and asserted such ownership, would give him no right to claim the value of his improvements, nor to assert an estoppel. Neither estoppel, nor a claim for valuable improvements made in good faith, could possibly be predicated upon rights which originated in fraud.

[3] Error is assigned to the action of the court in overruling the general demurrer, the proposition advanced being that the petition was insufficient, because appellee did not offer to return the taxes paid upon the property by the appellant. As above stated, appellee was asserting a legal right to recover the premises predicated upon fraud alleged to have been perpetrated by the grantee in obtaining the deed, and, under such circumstances, no equitable right of reimbursement for taxes paid existed in favor of appellant.

Error is assigned to the refusal of the court to give a special charge to the effect that a failure upon part of defendant to pay the cash consideration of $700, in accordance with his agreement, would not alone be sufficient to authorize a recovery; and appellant also complains of paragraph 5 of the court's charge, wherein the jury, in effect, are instructed to find for the plaintiff if they believe from the evidence that it was agreed between Catherine Williams and appellant that appellant was to pay the sum of $700 in cash, the back taxes on the premises, and to provide her with the necessaries of life as long as she lived, and that the said Chambers had failed to keep such promises. These assignments relate to what we conceive to be the controlling question in the case, and will be considered together.

[4] In the paragraph of the court's charge above referred to, the court proceeded upon the theory, and the jury were, in effect, charged, that mere failure upon the part of Chambers to comply with the promises made by him, and in consideration of which the deed was executed, was sufficient to authorize a cancellation of the deed and recovery of the premises. The deed, however, was absolute upon its face, and such agreements were covenants only upon the part of Chambers, and his failure to perform the same would not alone authorize the cancellation of the deed and recovery of the premises. Odom v. Odom, 139 S. W. 900; Mayer v. Swift, 73 Tex. 369, 11 S. W. 378; Byars v. Byars, 11 Tex. Civ. App. 565, 32 S. W. 925; Selari v. Selari, 124 S. W. 997; Rainey v. Chambers, 56 Tex. 17; Beaumont Carriage Co. v. Price, 104 S. W. 499. We do not desire, however, to be construed as holding that appellant was entirely absolved from complying with his contract; upon the contrary, it is well settled that he could be forced to comply with his promises. He is, of course, relieved by the death of Catherine Williams from any further obligation to support her, and it is undisputed that he has paid the taxes which he contracted to pay; but as to the $700, if it remains unpaid, a recovery therefor could be had. Mayer v. Swift, supra; Rainey v. Chambers, supra. And while there exists no express lien to secure its payment, yet he has an implied lien upon the premises, securing the same.

[5] From the authorities cited above, it will be noted that failure to keep a promise to perform some act in the future will not be regarded as fraud in its legal acceptation, although the failure to keep the promise is wholly without excuse; otherwise every breach of contract would amount to fraud, and the practical effect of the portion of the court's charge above referred to was to treat the failure of the defendant to keep his promises such fraud as would vitiate the conveyance. There is a well-recognized exception, however, to this rule, where the representations and promises are made for the purpose of defrauding and deceiving, and without any intention, at the time the same are made, of performing the same. Railway Co. v. Titterington, 84 Tex. 218, 19 S. W. 472, 31 Am. St. Rep. 39; Railway Co. v. Smith, 98 Tex. 553, 86 S. W. 322; Mays v. Cearley, 138 S. W. 165; Ins. Co. v. Seidel, 52 Tex. Civ. App. 278, 113 S. W. 945. If appellee was entitled to recover upon the allegation that fraudulent representations and promises made by Chambers were the consideration for which the deed was executed, it is by virtue of this exception to the general rule, and the court evidently predicated his charge upon the principle enunciated in the cases last cited; but it is fatally defective in entirely ignoring the essential element constituting fraud under such circumstances, which is that at the time the promises were made they must have been fraudulently made for the purpose of deceiving, and without any intention at the time of performing the same.

[6] The second, ninth, tenth, and eleventh assignments question the sufficiency of the testimony to authorize a verdict in favor of the plaintiff, and in view of a retrial we refrain from a discussion thereof. In this connection, however, it may be said appellee seems to be contending that, if lot No. 4 was fraudulently inserted in the deed, it would authorize a recovery of both lots. In this view, however, we do not concur, and are of the opinion that it would only authorize a recovery of 4. It may be well, also, in considering the evidence bearing upon the allegation that the deed for the premises was obtained by fraudulent representations and promises made by the appellant, to call attention to the case of Beaumont Carriage Co. v. Price, supra, from which we quote with approval the following: "It must, however, be made to appear by some testimony, direct or circumstantial, that at the time the party gave the promise there was no intention on his part to perform it. It is clearly not enough to prove the nonperformance; and it will not do to say that from the bare fact of nonperformance it could be inferred that the intent not to perform originally existed, because, if this were allowed, any contemporaneous agreement could be attached to a writing by parol, and the rule of law on this subject would be useless."

[7] The defendant's witness Robert Clark was shown to have been convicted of a felony by his own testimony and admissions, and in the absence of proper objection this can be shown by parol, and we therefore overrule the seventh and eighth assignments.

[8] The fifteenth and sixteenth assignments are submitted as propositions. As such they are multifarious, and are not entitled to consideration, and are not considered.

[9] The seventeenth assignment is overruled, as we are of the opinion that the pleadings are sufficient to support a finding in favor of appellee for wages alleged to be due Catherine Williams for services performed.

For the errors indicated, the cause is reversed and remanded.

Error from District Court, Sabine County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Action by the State of Texas against the Angelina County Lumber Company, and it made W. D. Gordon and another parties. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant, and in its favor against W. D. Gordon and another, the latter bring error. Affirmed.

W. D. Gordon and Thos. J. Baten, both of Beaumont, for plaintiffs in error. Mantooth & Collins, of Lufkin, for defendants in error.

REESE, J. The state of Texas brought suit in the district court of Sabine county against the Angelina County Lumber Company to recover state and county taxes delinquent for many years on a certain tract of land in Sabine county then owned by the Lumber Company, and to establish and foreclose the tax lien. The taxes and penalties amounted to $444.13, which, with the interest due thereon, was sued for. The entire amount due, including interest to the date of trial and charges allowed by law, was $780.54, for which amount judgment was rendered. The defendant filed its answer, alleging that it had bought the land from W. D. Gordon and E. A. Perry, paying therefor the sum of $11,025 and that its said vendors had conveyed the land to it with covenants of general warranty. It was prayed "that the said Gordon and Perry be made parties, that service be had upon them, and that, in case the plaintiff should recover against this defendant for the said taxes, penalties, and costs, or any part thereof, this defendant the Angelina County Lumber Company recover judgment over against said W. D. Gordon and E. A. Perry for such amount as may be recovered against it by plaintiff herein, for all costs of suit, and for such other and further relief, general and special, as your defendant may be entitled to." Copies of this answer and of plaintiff's petition were served upon the said Gordon and Perry, who appeared and answered by general demurrer and general denial. Judgment was rendered in favor of the state against the Angelina County Lumber Company for taxes, interest, penalties, and costs, amounting to $780.54, with foreclosure of tax lien. Judgment was also rendered in favor of the lumber company against Gordon and Mrs. Perry for the same amount. There is no statement of facts, conclusions of fact and law, nor bills of exceptions in the record. The court filed conclusions of fact and law upon hearing the motion of Gordon and Mrs. Perry to correct the record as hereinafter set out.

Before the judgment was rendered, counsel for all of the parties except Gordon appeared, and agreed that the cross-petition of the Lumber Company might be amended by interlining after the figures $444.13, where they occurred in the cross-petition against Gordon and Mrs. Perry, the words "with interest and penalty." The court supposed that these attorneys also represented Gordon, but upon the hearing of his motion to correct the record by erasing these words found as a fact that the interlineation was made without Gordon's knowledge or consent, and was, as to him, improper. The court further found, however, that this amendment by interlineation of the words referred to was immaterial, and refused to disturb the judgment.

[1] Prior to the submission of the case, on motion of appellee, the briefs filed for appellants Gordon and Perry were stricken out. The case was set for submission on the 14th of November, and the briefs were not filed until November 9th. There was no agreement waiving any of the requirements of the statute with regard to filing of briefs. Niday v. Cochran, 48 Tex. Civ. App. 259, 106 S. W. 462. Notwithstanding the absence of briefs, appellant in oral argument contends that the action of the court in allowing the amendment of the cross-petition referred to, particularly as to appellant Gordon, was fundamental error apparent on the face of the record which this court is required to consider without briefs. This amendment is only made to appear by the motion to correct the record and the proceedings thereon. Of course, this pleading as it is copied in the record does not in any way inform us that any amendment was made. It is only by examination of the motion to correct and the court's conclusion thereon that the error can be discovered, if in fact there was any error. If the proceedings in question in fact constituted error, certainly it is not such error apparent of record as we are required to consider without assignment. Houston Oil Co. v. Kimball, 103 Tex. 94, 122 S. W. 533, 124 S. W. 85. We are not certain that we are required to notice even fundamental error, if the judgment was such as the court was empowered to render, in the absence of briefs for appellants, in view of rule 34 (142 S. W. xiii).

[2] We might properly have dismissed the appeal for lack of prosecution without looking into the record at all. We will say, however, that an examination of the record shows that in fact no error apparent upon the record, or otherwise, was committed in the matter complained of.

[3] Appellants complain that without this amendment of the cross-petition judgment could not be rendered against them for more than the taxes without penalty or interest. We have examined this pleading carefully, and our conclusion is that the allegations are sufficient, without the insertion of the words referred to by way of amendment, to authorize the judgment, especially under the prayer for general relief in addition to the prayer for specific relief.

We conclude that, first, there is no error; and, second, that, if there is, it is not such fundamental error apparent on the face of the record as would authorize a reversal of the judgment in the absence of briefs for appellants.

The appeal is without merit. No question is made as to the liability of appellants for the full amount of the judgment. They presented no defense to the action, and do not pretend that they have any.

The judgment is affirmed.

Rulings on evidence will not be reviewed on appeal, where appellant's brief fails to disclose the grounds of objection made at the trial.

2. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 41*)—FINDINGS.

In trespass to try title, evidence held to sustain findings that the numbers of certain surveys in controversy were changed in the Land Office by the commissioner, and that direction was given by him to the surveyor to make similar changes in the field notes to conform them to the land office record.

try title to recover 320 acres of land described as follows: About nine miles southwest from Brownwood, survey No. 4 in the name of the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company, surveyed for the state of Texas, by virtue of certificate No. 3,152, beginning 384 varas S. 45° W. from the west corner of the F. George survey; thence N. 45° E., 950 varas, to the north corner of W. J. Lee's pre-emption; thence S. 45° E., 950 varas; thence N. 45° E., 1,388 varas; thence N. 45° W., 950 varas, to the beginning. Defendant in error answered by general denial, pleas of not guilty, lis pendens, and res adjudicata. The case was tried by the court without the intervention of a jury, and judgment rendered in behalf of defendant in error, from which plaintiffs in error have appealed.

The court filed the following conclusions of fact and law:

"Findings of Fact.

"(1) On March 30, 1881, the Commissioner of the General Land Office issued to the Gulf, Colorado & Santa Fé Railway Company certificate No. 3,152 for 640 acres of land. The certificate provides that lands granted should be located in alternate sections and surveyed in two sections of adjoining and connecting land, one for the state and the other for the company, and that for convenience the surveyor should number the surveys in pencil temporarily, but, when field notes were returned to the land office, the commissioner should number the surveys and report the result to the surveyor, who would fill up blanks in his record for that purpose, and that in dividing surveys fractions of over 320 acres should be counted as a whole section, and that two fractions of less than 320 acres should be regarded as a whole section, and that the even numbers should be reserved for the state and the odd numbers to the company. The following indorsements appear on the face of the certificate: '320 acres patented Nov. 15/83. D. N. Robinson, Chief Clk.' '320 acres patented Dec. 4/84. D. N. Robinson, Clk.'

"(2) By deed dated April 16, 1881, the railway company conveyed the said certificate to Robert Low, which deed was filed in land office April 9, 1883.

"(3) March 26, 1883, Robt. Low made a quitclaim deed to W. B. Cross 'of all my right, title and interest in and to a certain tract or parcel of land situated in Brown county, and this day filed on by me by virtue of certificate No. 3,152, issued to the G. C. & S. F. R. R. Company and more particularly described as beginning at the N. corner of W. J. Lee's pre-emption; thence S. 45° E.; thence N. 45° E.; thence with the lines of the surrounding surveys so as to include all the vacancy; one-half of said land to be located for the state of Texas and one-half for the said Robert Low.' This deed was filed for record in Brown county March 8, 1884.

"(4) On March 25, 1883, the surveyor of Brown county surveyed the body of land embraced in the description in the deed to Cross into two surveys, reciting each to contain 320 acres, each numbered, one (the land in controversy in this suit) as survey No. 3, and the other as survey No. 4. The field notes for the survey so numbered 3 were filed in land office April 9, 1883, and show to have been recorded in surveyor's office of Brown county in vol. B, p. 309, on March 29, 1883. The field notes in land office are indorsed, 'corrected on map of Brown county Septbr. 8/83,' and the survey number was changed in land office to 4, and same change was made in surveyor's records of Brown county. The surveyor's records of Brown county show that the survey number for the other survey (No. 4 as originally numbered by the surveyor) was also changed to 3. The tract that was changed from 4 to 3 by land office was patented to Robert Low, assignee of the Railway Company, on November 15, 1883. The tract that was changed from 3 to 4 (the land in controversy) has never been patented.

"(5) By deed dated —, W. B. Cross conveyed said patented land, survey 3, to W. J. Lee.

"(6) By special warranty deed, dated June 28, 1883, W. B. Cross conveyed said survey No. 4 (the land in controversy) to W. J. Lee, which deed was filed for record in Brown county June 30, 1883.

"(7) By special warranty deed dated November 28, 1893, W. J. Lee conveyed the land in controversy to plaintiffs in this case. This deed was not filed for record till August 22, 1904, and there was no evidence to show that any one except W. J. Lee, who was ever in any way connected with the land, had any knowledge or notice of this deed prior to time it was filed for record.

"(8) On his application to purchase the land in controversy as public school land, dated May 10, 1886, sworn to May 13, 1886, filed in land office June 8, 1886, the land was sold by the state land board to W. J. Lee May 20, 1886. This purchase was forfeited June 26, 1889, for nonpayment of interest for year 1886. The land was sold by the state as public school land to S. H. Hart May 12, 1899, on his application dated March 14, 1899, filed in land office March 15, 1899, at which time the land appeared on the records of land office classified as dry agricultural. By deed dated January 1, 1900, Hart conveyed to T. L. Hickson and the deed with Hickson's substitute obligation and application was filed in land office November 23, 1900. On June 27, 1900, the Hart sale was canceled for abandonment and land awarded to W. J. Lee June 29, 1900, on his application dated June 27, 1900. On November 5, 1900, the said sale to Lee was canceled as erroneous, and the former sale to Hart reinstated.

"(9) Hickson conveyed 100 acres of the land to G. N. Harrison by deed dated December 27, 1907, and conveyed balance to King by deed dated November 28, 1904, and Harrison afterwards conveyed his interest to King, and King conveyed the whole to defendant.

"(10) I find in accordance with defendant's plea of lis pendens and res adjudicata in this cause that on November 20, 1900, W. J. Lee filed a suit in his own name in the district court of Brown county, Tex., against T. L. Hickson, which suit was for the identical land involved in this suit; that said suit was in the usual form of trespass to try title, and was styled 'No. 1763, W. J. Lee v. T. L. Hickson'; that upon a trial of said cause before a jury on January 3, 1903, a verdict was rendered for the defendant T. L. Hickson, upon which judgment was duly rendered and entered, which judgment is now in full force and effect; that W. J. Lee is the father of the plaintiffs herein, Clara Carey and Cumi Baygent; that the deed from said W. J. Lee to Clara Lee (now Carey) and Cumi Lee (now Baygent) the said plaintiffs herein, of date November 28, 1893, under and by which they claim title to said land from him has at all times since its date been in the actual possession and custody of said W. J. Lee, and was in his possession and custody, and unrecorded, during the entire time of the pendency of said suit, and its prosecution by him in his own name; that there is nothing to show that said T. L. Hickson ever knew of the existence of said deed, and that same was not filed for record until August 22, 1904, after the rendition of final judgment in said cause; that the defendant herein T. N. Simmons had no actual knowledge of said deed, and of plaintiff's claim to said land, at the time of his purchase of same.

"Conclusions of Law.

"(1) The land in controversy became school land, but title to same did not pass to W. J. Lee by the deed from Cross to Lee.

"(2) The W. J. Lee purchase from the state in 1886, having been forfeited, and land sold to Hart and that purchase being now in good standing, and held by defendant, he is entitled to the land.

"(3) If the claim of plaintiffs under the W. J. Lee 1886 purchase from the state was not legally canceled by the forfeiture of said sale, then plaintiffs are bound by the judgment in the case of Lee against Hickson, and cannot now claim under the said Lee purchase."

We adopt and approve the foregoing conclusions, with the exception that we do not concur in the third conclusion of law reached by the trial court, which, however, we hold in no way affects the result reached.

Various assignments question the action of the trial court with reference to the introduction of certain evidence.

[1] A careful examination of the brief, however, fails to disclose what grounds of objection are made thereto, for which reason, under the rules prescribed for the preparation of briefs, we are not called upon to pass upon the error assigned. See rules 29 to 31 inclusive. To meet these requirements, the point of objection to the introduction or exclusion of evidence should be fully shown in the brief by the statement.

[2] The fifth, sixth, and seventh assignments, respectively, urge, first, that the court erred in his fourth finding of fact, to the effect that surveys 3 and 4 were changed, in that there was no legal evidence to show that the numbers of surveys 3 and 4 were changed, and further that there was no support in the evidence for the fourth finding that the land patented to Low was originally numbered 4 and changed to 3, and the sixth finding to the effect that the land conveyed to Cross by W. J. Lee was survey 4, instead of survey No. 3. We differ with counsel in this view, because we think the evidence does show that the changes were made in the land office by the commissioner, and that direction was given by him to the surveyor to make similar changes in the field notes of the respective surveys, thereby conforming same to the changes made in the land office, which appears to have been done; and the evidence amply supported the other finding complained of, for which reason we overrule these assignments.

[3] Without discussing the remaining assignments seriatim, we think it sufficient to say that if there be any error the same in our judgment is harmless, for the reason that the record fails to show any title whatever in plaintiffs to the land in controversy, and therefore no other judgment than the one entered could properly have been rendered. This being true, the judgment of the court below must be sustained. See Tucker v. Smith, 68 Tex. 473, 3 S. W. 671; I. & G. N. R. R. Co. v. Moody, 71 Tex. 614, 9 S. W. 465; Railway Co. v. Milmo, 79 Tex. 628, 15 S. W. 475; La Vega v. League, 2 Tex. Civ. App. 252, 21 S. W. 565.

Finding no error in the proceedings of the trial court, its judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

RUCKER v. BARKER.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Austin.
Oct. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 4, 1912.)

1. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 15*)—ARREST BY OFFICER—EMPLOYMENT BY PRIVATE INDIVIDUAL.

Where plaintiff was illegally arrested by a peace officer, who was also employed to preserve the peace by defendant, who was running a tent show, the fact that the person making the arrest was an officer was not sufficient in itself to show that he made the arrest in his official capacity, nor was the fact that the officer was in defendant's employ sufficient in itself to show that he made the arrest as defendant's servant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-67; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 15*)—PUBLIC OFFICER DOING PRIVATE DUTY—LIABILITY OF EMPLOYER.

Defendant, while operating a show and selling medicine in a city, employed a peace officer to keep the peace in and about the show tent. A dispute arising as to a seat plaintiff was occupying, the officer was requested by defendant's wife to "settle it in a nice way." The officer asked plaintiff to vacate the seat, and, on his refusing, had a conversation with defendant, who instructed him to go and settle the dispute, whereupon the officer pulled plaintiff out of the seat, arrested, and incarcerated him for disorderly conduct. Held, that the officer's act in so doing was not in his official capacity, but in the prosecution of defendant's business, and that defendant was therefore liable for the consequences.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-67; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

3. TRIAL (§ 252*)—REQUEST TO CHARGE—ABSTRACT INSTRUCTIONS.

Where an officer, while doing private duty at defendant's show, arrested and incarcerated plaintiff as the result of a dispute over a seat, acting entirely in defendant's service, and not as a peace officer, the court, in an action for false imprisonment, properly refused, as abstract, an instruction that it was the duty of every peace officer to preserve the peace within his jurisdiction, and that, to effect such purpose, he could use all lawful means.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596-612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

4. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 36*)—COMPENSATION—EXCESSIVENESS.

Plaintiff, a young unmarried man of good habits, paid for a reserved seat ticket at defendant's tent show, and, on refusing to surrender it to another patron, was dragged out of the tent by a peace officer, arrested for disorderly conduct, struck over the eye with a pistol or other hard substance, causing a wound, which did not heal for two weeks afterwards, was thrown down by the officer, his clothes torn, taken to the police station in the hoodlum wagon, and locked up with negroes and Mexicans for about two hours. His arrest occurred in the presence of a crowd, a number of whom were friends and acquaintances, and also in the presence of a young lady to whom he was talking. Held, that a verdict allowing $1,000 compensatory damages was not excessive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 113-115; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

5. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 36*)—DAMAGES—EXEMPLARY DAMAGES.

Where, in an action for false imprisonment in causing plaintiff's arrest for disorderly conduct at a tent show, there was evidence of actual malice on defendant's part, in that he thought he recognized plaintiff at the time of his arrest as a person who had previously stolen a seat, it was not error to allow $250 as punitive damages.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 113-115; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

Appeal from District Court, McLennan County; Marshall Surratt, Judge.

Action by Jno. Dyer, by his next friend, A. M. Barker, against H. D. Rucker. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

O. L. Stribling, of Waco, for appellant. Hamilton & Kibler, of Waco, for appellee.

Findings of Fact.

JENKINS, J. John Dyer, by his next friend, A. M. Barker, brought suit against appellant for damages on account of alleged false imprisonment. Appellant was running a tent show and selling medicine in the city of Waco. Appellee, a resident of Waco, 18 years of age, and an electrician, attended appellant's show, and purchased a reserved seat. The price of admission was 10 cents, and reserved seats were 20 cents. The holder of a reserved seat was entitled to sit in a chair in the central portion of the tent, but was not entitled to any particular seat. The appellee took a seat by Mrs. Graves, who told him that she had a friend who wished to occupy that seat, and asked him to move. He did so, moving into the adjoining vacant seat. About this time Mr. Graves appeared with Mrs. Cates, the friend referred to, who took the seat vacated by appellee. Graves stated to appellee that he was occupying his seat, and asked him to move. Appellee replied that the seat was his. Graves said that he had bought it and paid for it. Appellee replied that he had also bought it and paid for it. Appellee was unacquainted with either Graves or his wife. Some words passed between Mrs. Graves and appellee with reference to appellee's moving, and Mrs. Graves told him she had a notion to slap him in the mouth. Appellee replied that that was all right; that he was too much of a gentleman to do anything to a lady. Graves said to his wife, "Don't talk to the fool," and said he would have the seat. He went and informed appellant that appellee was in his seat, and would not give it up. Appellant's wife sent for J. J. Roberts, a deputy constable, who had been employed by appellant to keep the peace while the show was going on, and had been in such employment for about two months. Roberts went with Graves to appellee, and requested appellee to move and give Graves the seat. Appellee re-refused to do so. Roberts then went to appellant, who was some 25 or 30 feet away, and had a talk with him, and summoned one C. M. Crawford to assist him, and they returned to appellee, and Roberts caught him by the collar and pulled him out of the seat. Roberts and Crawford dragged appellee to the door, he struggling and protesting, took him through the door, passing within two feet of appellant, and to the outside of the tent, where they threw him down and then took him to a barn, phoned for the hoodlum wagon, turned him over to the police with instructions to lock him up, and make complaint against him for disturbing the peace.

Appellant defended upon the ground that what Roberts did was done in his official capacity, and not by any order or direction of his, and that appellee was arrested by Roberts for disturbing the peace by swearing, cursing, and using loud language. The court submitted the case to the jury upon special issues; the first and second of which are as follows: "(1) Did the plaintiff immediately before he was arrested by J. J. Roberts on the occasion in question swear or curse or use loud language in the presence of, and in a manner calculated to disturb, the people, or any of them, who were assembled on that occasion? If you should answer the foregoing issue in the affirmative, then you need not answer any of the following special issues, but return your verdict without looking further. If you should answer the foregoing issue in the negative, then you will find from the evidence and answer the following issues:

"(2) Did Roberts arrest plaintiff at the request of or under the direction and instruction of the defendant, or was he when making said arrest acting within the scope of his duties under any employment of him by the defendant in making such arrest, or did he make such arrest of his own volition as a peace officer in what he conceived to be the discharge of his duties as a peace officer? If you should find in answer to the foregoing issue that Roberts arrested plaintiff of his own volition in the discharge of his duties as a peace officer, then you need not find any answers to the following issues; but if you should find that he made such arrest at the request of or under the direction or instruction of defendant, or while acting within the scope of his duties under any employment by the defendant, and that plaintiff did not curse or swear or use loud language as submitted in issue No. 1 above, then in that event you will answer the following issues."

The jury in reply to special issue No. 1 answered, "No." In reply to special issue No. 2, answered: "Yes; we find that Roberts made the arrest by instruction of defendant." The evidence, which will be further discussed in the opinion, is sufficient to sustain these findings of the jury.

Upon the issue of actual damages the jury found for appellee in the sum of $1,000, and upon the issue of punitive damages, found for him $250.

1. Appellant requested the court to instruct the jury to peremptorily return a verdict in his favor, and assigns error upon the refusal of the court so to do, and also upon the refusal of the court to set aside the verdict on motion for a new trial for the reason that the same was not sustained by the evidence.

[1] The fact that Roberts was an officer is not sufficient in itself to show that he made the arrest in his official capacity; nor is the fact that he was in the employment of appellant sufficient in itself to show that he made such arrest as the servant of appellant. As an officer it was his duty to preserve the peace, and it is immaterial that he was paid for his services by appellant. The facts in reference to his employment are that appellant, when he first opened his show, phoned to the chief of police to send an officer to his show to preserve the peace. The chief of police replied that he would not require an officer to be at his show at night unless appellant would pay for such services, and thereupon appellant agreed to and did pay $10 a week, and Roberts was assigned to duty at appellant's tent.

[2] As such officer it was his right and his duty to arrest any one who committed a breach of the peace, but it was not his duty as such officer to determine who were entitled to seats, or to any particular seat. Such may have been his duty as the servant or employé of appellant. Both Roberts and appellant testified that appellant did not instruct him to arrest appellee. When Roberts first appeared at the summons of appellant's wife, appellant told him that there was a dispute over there as to a seat, and for him to go and settle it in a nice way. After Roberts had gone to appellee and appellee refused to vacate the seat, Roberts returned to appellant and they had a talk. The details of this conversation are not given, further than that appellant told Roberts to go and settle the dispute. Now, it was no part of Roberts' duty as an officer to settle this dispute, and the only authority which he had to do so was that which he derived from appellant. How did appellant expect him to settle the dispute? Appellee had positively refused to vacate the seat. There would seem to be but one way for Roberts to settle it, and that was the way in which he did settle it, namely, by taking appellee by the collar and dragging him out of the seat; and appellant must reasonably have anticipated that Roberts would forcibly remove appellee, if he decided that he was not entitled to the seat. Under such circumstances, it is not material that appellant did not instruct Roberts to forcibly remove appellee. Wood, in speaking of the liability of the master for the acts of the servant, lays down the rule as follows: "The simple test is whether they were acts within the scope of his employment, not whether they were done while prosecuting the master's business, but whether they were done by the servant in furtherance thereof, and were such as may fairly be said to have been authorized by him. By 'authorized' is not meant authority expressly conferred, but whether the acts were such as were incident to the performance of the duties intrusted to him by the master, even though in opposition to his express and positive orders." Wood on Master and Servant, § 307. Here the act was done while prosecuting the master's business—that is to say, in settling the dispute as to who was entitled to the seat—and forcibly removing appellee from the seat was incident to the performance of the duty intrusted to him by appellant. "The master can never escape liability for the abuse of authority by the servant. Therefore the question always is whether there was any authority, express or implied, on the part of the servant to do the act." Id. § 309; Railway Co. v. Warner, 19 Tex. Civ. App. 463, 49 S. W. 254; Railway Co. v. Dean, 98 Tex. 517, 85 S. W. 1135-1137; Railway Co. v. Parsons, 102 Tex. 157, 113 S. W. 914, 132 Am. St. Rep. 857; Eichengreen v. Railway Co., 96 Tenn. 229, 34 S. W. 221, 31 L. R. A. 702, 54 Am. St. Rep. 833.

[3] 2. The court did not err in refusing the following special instruction: "It is the duty of every peace officer to preserve the peace within his jurisdiction, and to effect this purpose he shall use all lawful means. He shall, in every case where he is authorized by the provisions of the Penal Code, interfere, without warrant, to prevent or suppress crime." This is a mere abstract proposition of the issue submitted to the jury in special instructions above set out. No point was made in the case that the arrest was without warrant. Nor did the court err in refusing to give other special instructions requested by appellant for like reasons. Moore v. Pierson, 93 S. W. 1009; Coal Co. v. Coal Co., 44 Tex. Civ. App. 369, 99 S. W. 411.

[4] 3. Appellant assigns error on the overruling of his motion for a new trial on the ground that the actual damages found by the jury were excessive. Appellee's testimony fully sustains the amount of actual damages found by the jury. It appears that he was a young man of good habits, had never been arrested before; that he was arrested in the presence of a crowd, a number of whom were friends and acquaintances, and in the presence of a young lady to whom he was talking at the time, and who the testimony strongly indicates was his sweetheart. He testified that he was dragged to the door, a distance of 30 or 40 feet, by Roberts and Crawford, whom Roberts had summoned to assist him; that he was struck over the eye with a pistol or some hard substance, making a contused wound on his forehead which could be seen for two weeks afterwards; that he was thrown down on the outside, and Roberts' knee placed on his chest and his clothes torn, and that he was put in the hoodlum wagon and carried to the police station, and locked up with negroes and Mexicans for about two hours; that, when he was first seized by Roberts, he asked the privilege of explaining the situation, and that Roberts said, "Explain nothing."

[5] 4. Appellant contends that the testimony is wholly insufficient to warrant a verdict and judgment for exemplary damages. It appears from the evidence that all that occurred in the tent occurred in the presence of appellant; that he made no objection and made no inquiry as to the merits of the case, from which facts the jury might be justified in inferring legal malice. Gold v. Campbell, 54 Tex. Civ. App. 269, 117 S. W. 468. There is one portion of appellant's testimony which tends to show actual malice. In reply to the question as to why he did not interfere in the treatment of appellee, he stated that Roberts was protecting his patrons. He was then asked if appellee was not one of his patrons. He said yes, but that there were good patrons and bad patrons, and that he considered appellee a bad patron, for the reason that on the night before a stranger had approached him and told him that there was a young man there who had bought a circus ticket (a ten cent ticket) and was occupying a reserved seat, and that he pointed out appellee as the party, and that he approached appellee and asked him if he had paid for his seat, and that he said that he had, and that, if appellant was not satisfied, he would pay for it again, from which he inferred that appellee was stealing a seat, and that he recognized appellee at the time of his arrest as the party referred to. While appellee denied this occurrence, yet it might fairly be inferred that appellant thought that he was the man who had stolen the seat, and that he had actual ill will against him. We do not think that the remarks of appellee's counsel in his closing speech require a reversal of this case.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the trial court is affirmed.

PRESNALL et al. v. STOCKYARDS NAT. BANK.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 21, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1912.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 134*)—BANK DEPOSIT—BANK'S RIGHT OF SET-OFF.

Where, at the time a garnishment was served on defendant bank, it held for the debtor a balance of $777.89 to the credit of his general account, the fact that the debtor was a nonresident of the state and was indebted to the bank on notes not due did not authorize the bank to credit such balance on the indebtedness as against the plaintiff in garnishment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 353-374; Dec. Dig. § 134.*]

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 29*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT—PERSONAL PROPERTY—EQUITY OF REDEMPTION.

Where a debtor's equity of redemption in mortgaged cattle was pledged to a bank for a loan, and such equity when liquidated by a sale of the cattle amounted to less than the amount due the bank, it was not subject to a prior garnishment against the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 47, 50, 74, 98, 100; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

3. CORPORATIONS (§ 174*) — "SHARES OF STOCK."

"Shares of stock" in a corporation are the aliquot parts of the corporation's capital, and merely give to the owner the right to a share of the profits of the corporation while a going concern and in its assets in case of dissolution. They give the owners no right in the property of the company as such, and the share certificates are a mere symbol or evidence of property, standing on the same footing as other muniments of title.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-652; Dec. Dig. § 174.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, pp. 6477-6480.]

4. GARNISHMENT (§ 27*)—CORPORATE STOCK—SERVICE.

Rev. Civ. St. 1911, art. 3745, provides that the shares of stock in a corporation are subject to levy and sale under execution. Article 3742 provides that the levy is made by leaving a notice with any officer of the company, and article 296 declares that the "share or interest of the defendant" in a corporation shall be subject to garnishment. Held, that the interest of the stockholder subject to garnishment was his rights in the corporation as distinguished from his share certificate, and hence, where a stockholder assigned his certificate to a bank as security for a loan, his corporate interest could not be subjected to garnishment by serving garnishment notice on an officer of the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 45, 46; Dec. Dig. § 27.*]

5. GARNISHMENT (§ 191*) — GARNISHEE — HEARING—COSTS AND ATTORNEY'S FEES.

Where a garnishee answered setting up title in itself to property of the debtor in its hands, it became a party litigant and, on being cast, was not entitled to costs and attorney's fees.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Garnishment, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-379; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

Appeal from District Court, Tarrant County.

Garnishment proceedings by P. A. Presnall and others against the Stockyards National Bank, garnishee. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

The appellants, P. A. Presnall and S. B. Mossner, obtained a judgment in the district court of Nueces county against Hugh Rogers for the sum of $1,921.90 with 10 per cent. interest. An execution was issued on May 28, 1908, and returned nulla bona. Thereafter, on January 16, 1909, the appellants applied for a writ of garnishment, which was issued and served on the Stockyards National Bank of Ft. Worth on January 20, 1909. The garnishee made answer on July 5, 1909, in which the garnishee denied any indebtedness to Hugh Rogers, but alleged that Hugh Rogers owed it two notes; one note being for $2,500, on which $900 had been paid, and which was secured by certificate of shares of stock of the Barse Commission Company of the value of $2,000, and the other note being for $2,000, on which had been paid $777, and which was secured by a transfer to the bank of Rogers' equity of redemption in certain live stock owned by Nalls & Rogers on Royer Ranch in Murray county, Okl. Appellants filed a controverting affidavit charging that Rogers had on deposit in the bank at the time the writ of garnishment was served the sum of $777.89, and that the bank held as collateral security certificate of shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company owned by Rogers of the value of $2,000 and an assignment of Rogers' equity of redemption in a mortgage on 2,000 head of cattle and 130 head of horses; and alleging that Rogers, since the writ of garnishment was served, had fully paid off and discharged the garnishee's notes without the application of the collateral security to the payment of the debt, and that the garnishee had voluntarily released and surrendered and delivered to Rogers, after service of the writ, his certificate of shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company, and that the garnishee had permitted the cattle to be sold by Rogers; and praying that the garnishee be made liable to appellants for the cash deposit and the value of the certificate of shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company, or so much as was necessary to satisfy the appellants' debt. The garnishee in reply admitted that at the time the writ of garnishment was served Rogers had on deposit in the bank the sum of $777.89, but alleged that Rogers was indebted to the bank at the time of the service of the writ on a $2,000 note, and that he was a nonresident of the state and had no property in Texas except that deposited with the bank, and that, as a consequence, and after the writ was served, the sum of the deposit was by the garnishee applied on the note as a credit; and further that Rogers had refused to pay his indebtedness unless the garnishee would first surrender the certificate of shares of stock held as collateral, and that by agreement with Rogers to pay his debt to the bank it surrendered to him the certificate of shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company. The cause was tried to the court without a jury, and judgment was entered in favor of the garnishee and also allowing it to recover of appellants $250 as attorney's fees.

The testimony in the record admits that when the writ of garnishment was served Rogers had a general deposit in the Stockyards National Bank of $777.89. Rogers wa-indebted to the bank in the two notes mentioned in the pleading, neither of which had matured when the writ was served. One note was secured by an assignment of Rogers' equity of redemption in certain mortgaged live stock in the possession of Rogers in Oklahoma, and the other by a certificate for 20 shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company indorsed in blank. At the time the writ of garnishment was served, Rogers was a citizen of Oklahoma, and without property in Texas save that mentioned in the possession of the garnishee. The Barse Commission Company was a Missouri corporation, but had secured a permit under the laws of Texas to do business in Texas, and was at the time and has since been doing business in Texas. The certificate of shares of stock in the commission company held by the bank as collateral belonged to Rogers, and was, it was agreed, at the time of the delivery to the garnishee, and has been ever since, of the value of $2,000. Rogers was not due the bank anything except the notes. Immediately after the service of the writ the bank applied the $777.89, without Rogers' authority, as a payment on the $2,000 note. After service of the writ, and after maturity of both notes, Rogers paid to the bank the balances due on both of the notes, upon condition that the bank deliver to him the certificate of shares of stock of the Barse Commission Company held by it; and the bank agreed to, and did, release and deliver the certificate of shares of stock, together with the canceled notes to Rogers. At the time the bank took the assignment of the equity of Rogers in the live stock in Oklahoma, the live stock was heavily mortgaged in Oklahoma. Rogers himself sold the live stock, and after paying the mortgage there was left from the proceeds of the sale of the same the sum of $501.75. This sum of $501.75 was the value of his assigned equity, and was applied by Rogers on the note held by the Stockyards National Bank.

Slay, Simon & Wynn, of Ft. Worth, for appellants. Wm. J. Berne, of Ft. Worth, for appellee.

LEVY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] By proper assignments of error the appellants contend that the court erred in rendering judgment for the garnishee, for the garnishee admitted that it held money and effects of the defendant Rogers at the time the writ was served, and by the undisputed evidence not showing any legal or equitable defense which entitled it as against the appellants to hold such money and effects. The several matters of contest were a general deposit in the bank of $777.89, an assignment of an equity of redemption in mortgaged cattle, and a certificate for 20 shares of stock in the Barse Commission Company, a private corporation. It is an admitted fact that, when the writ of garnishment was served

Hugh Rogers, the defendant in the original judgment theretofore obtained by plaintiffs had standing to his credit in the garnishee bank on general deposit the sum of $777.89. As against the right of the appellants to subject the deposit to garnishment, the garnishee set up and made the claim that it had the right to apply, and did so, the deposit as a credit payment on a note for $2,000 previously executed to it by Rogers, because Rogers was a nonresident of Texas and without property in this state save that in the possession of the bank. Rogers' note to the bank was not due at the time the writ was served nor at the time of the answer. Immediately upon the service of the writ of garnishment, the bank, through its president, transferred and applied, without authority of Rogers, the deposit as a credit on the Rogers note. It being an admitted fact that the defendant Rogers had on general deposit in the bank when the writ was served the sum of $777.89, it would appear that the bank was indebted to the defendant in that sum at the time of the service of the writ. The appellants' garnishment lien attached when the garnishment writ was served on the bank, and as a consequence the appellants would be entitled to have the sum paid to them, unless the garnishee had a superior right or claim to it. As against the appellants' lien, the garnishee only predicates the right to hold the deposit debt to partly satisfy its unmatured note upon equitable grounds. The garnishee relies, as the record admits, on the bare fact that the defendant was a nonresident of this state. Rogers was, it appears, a nonresident of this state, and was at the time the note was made to the bank. The bare fact that the defendant was a nonresident of this state would not of itself afford a valid equitable ground for subordinating the appellants' legal lien to the garnishee's claim for set-off of the deposit as a credit on its note not due. If the garnishee's debt had been due and Rogers had been insolvent, or if Rogers had been insolvent in connection with the fact of nonresidence, such special circumstances might have formed the basis for invoking equity; but no such equity is relied on in the pleading or proof. Appellants' contention should be sustained that they were entitled to have judgment for the debt of $777.89.

[2] As to the equity of Rogers in the mortgaged cattle assigned to the bank as collateral security to the $2,000 note, the court, we think, correctly rendered judgment for the garnishee; and the ruling is sustained. It is an admitted fact that the assignment was subject to prior liens, and that the cattle were sold by Rogers, and that out of the proceeds of the sale of the cattle there was coming to Rogers, over and above the mortgage debt, the sum of $501.75 which was shown to be the value of the equity. Rogers testified, and it appears an admitted fact, that he applied this $501.75 on June 4, 1909, which date was prior to the garnishee's answer, on the note as a credit payment, and the bank received it as such. Assuming for the moment that the assignment of the equity to the bank as security for the note was a subject-matter of garnishment, the garnishment would hold to appellants only the balance or surplus of the value of the equity after the debt of the bank it was pledged to secure was paid out of it. Carter v. Bush, 79 Tex. 31, 15 S. W. 167; Mensing v. Engelke, 67 Tex. 537, 4 S. W. 202. It being an admitted fact that there had been a sale of the cattle, and the equity reduced to money and applied as a credit on the note, and there was no surplus remaining, before the answer of the garnishee, the garnishee was entitled to judgment, for it was conclusively shown that there was no excess in the value of the property over the amount it was pledged to secure to be subjected to garnishment.

The next point involves the liability of the bank as the possessor at the time of the garnishment of the certificate for 20 shares in the Barse Commission Company assigned and deposited with it by Rogers as security for the $2,500 note. In the determination of the question it is merely assumed, without deciding the point, that the Barse Commission Company, the corporation issuing the certificate, has become so completely a resident of this state by coming into this state under its laws to do business, as that its stock may be garnished or levied upon in the mode prescribed by the statute. The question as to what classes of property or indebtedness may be reached by garnishment necessarily must depend upon the statute authorizing the issuance of the writ, as the remedy by garnishment is statutory. The statute makes shares of stock in any joint-stock or incorporated company a subject-matter of levy and sale under execution. Article 3745, R. S. The levy is made by leaving a notice with any officer of the company. Article 3742, R. S. With respect to shares in a corporation, under the garnishment statute it is the "share or interest of the defendant in such company" that is made of a garnishable character and subjected to sale under execution. Article 296, R. S.

pable of manual delivery. Considering that the share, or interest, of the owner in the corporation, is an incorporeal right, then the nature of a share certificate issued by the corporation, as here in controversy, is merely the symbol, or paper evidence, of property, and stands on a similar footing with that of other muniments of title. 2 Thompson on Corp. § 2348; Burrall v. Railway Co., 75 N. Y. 211.

[4] Following the principle that a share certificate is merely the written evidence of the existence of shares and the ownership of them, then a levy of execution upon the certificate would not be, it is evident, equivalent to a levy on the share or interest of the owner in the corporation, any more than the levy on a bill of lading would be a levy on the goods therein described, or a levy on a chattel mortgage instrument itself would be a levy on the chattels mortgaged. It would be a valid levy only to the extent that such naked paper has a commercial value, and no further. Bearing in mind, therefore, that by a "share of stock" and "share" in a corporation, as used in the statute, is meant an intangible interest or right, in legal contemplation, of the owner in the corporation property or fund, and that a share certificate is merely written evidence of the existence and ownership of the share or interest of such owner, it is believed that the owner's stock or share in the corporation is not reached under the statute by either a levy of execution or garnishment upon a share certificate as such issued by the corporation. It is especially provided by the statute that, in order for the creditor to reach the shares or interest of any owner of shares or interest in any corporation by garnishment, the garnishment shall be served upon the incorporated company itself. Article 296, R. S. Under this mode of procedure given by statute, it was intended, we think, to regard the stock, for the purpose of garnishment proceeding, as being in the possession of the corporation itself. So it would follow that, if the corporation itself is deemed and regarded in law as being in possession of the share or right of the owner, the bank here could not be held to have any property or effects, beyond the value of the naked paper, of Rogers in the corporation, in its possession. There is no claim by pleading or proof here that the certificate itself as a naked piece of paper was of value; therefore no liability on that point is here involved. According to many authorities, it is announced that certificates of stock in the hands of a third person cannot be subjected to the debts of the owner by garnishment served on such third person. See Winslow v. Fletcher, 53 Conn. 390, 4 Atl. 250, 55 Am. Rep. 122; Cooke v. Hollett, 119 Mass. 148; Armour Bros. v. Bank, 113 Mo. 12, 20 S. W. 690, 35 Am. St. Rep. 691; Bank v. Williams, 112 Mich. 564, 71 N. W. 150; Price v. Brady, 21

Tex. 614; 2 Cook on Corp. § 491. Coming to the conclusion, as we have, that the bank could not be here held liable in garnishment, judgment was properly rendered for it, we think, by the court on this particular controversy.

It is quite common to deal with a certificate of stock as did Rogers and the bank here. In such transactions a purchaser under foreclosure undoubtedly acquires the equitable title to the stock in the corporation by reason of the assignment and power of sale, and such purchaser has a right to call upon the corporation to clothe him also with the legal title by permitting a transfer to himself on its books, and to demand a new certificate in his own name. 2 Thompson on Corp. § 2394. But it must be understood that the question here involved is not whether the bank or its assign is clothed in equity with all the rights of Rogers as against Rogers, but whether the garnishment of the certificate for shares as such was a valid seizure of the shares or stock of Rogers in the corporation.

As the court erred in not rendering judgment for appellants for the $777.89, the judgment must be reversed, and, as the facts are admitted, be here rendered for appellants against the garnishee for that sum with legal interest from the date of the trial below.

[5] As the garnishee by its answer became itself a litigant with appellants, the attorney's fees must be denied, and as well the costs of the court below and of appeal will be taxed against the garnishee. Moursund v. Preiss, 84 Tex. 554, 19 S. W. 775; article 307, R. S.

CONLEY et al. v. DAUGHTERS OF THE REPUBLIC OF TEXAS.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. San Antonio. Nov. 13, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing, Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. STATES (§ 88*)—PROPERTY—STATUTES—"CARE AND CUSTODY."

Acts Jan. 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), which provided that upon the state's receipt of title to the so-called "Alamo property" the Governor should deliver it, together with the Alamo church property already owned by the state, to the custody and care of the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, a private corporation, to be maintained by them in good order and repair without charge to the state, and to be remodeled only upon plans adopted by the corporation and approved by the Governor, and that all the property should be subject to future legislation, by the use of the words "care and custody" placed the corporation in the exclusive and absolute control within the conditions prescribed by the act; the "care and custody" of persons or property carrying the idea of exclusive possession.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 159*)—REPEAL—IMPLICATION.

Repeals by implication are not favored by the courts, and a statute will not be held to repeal an existing one unless there is irreconcilable repugnancy between them, or unless there is an evident design on the part of the Legislature to supersede all prior legislation in connection with the subject-matter and to enact a complete law in regard to it.

3. STATES (§ 88*)—DISPOSITION OF PROPERTY—STATUTES—REPEAL.

Act Jan. 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), which gave to the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, a private corporation, the exclusive care and custody of the Alamo property owned by the state, charged with its repair and maintenance, was not repealed by an item in the appropriation act of 1911 (Acts 32d Leg. c. 3), which provided "for the improvement of the Alamo property belonging to the state of Texas, * * * to be expended under the direction of the superintendent of public buildings and grounds upon the approval of the Governor, $5,000," the latter provision being in harmony with the existing law and merely supplementary thereto, so that before the appropriation could be used the plans therefor ought to be made by the corporation and approved by the Governor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

4. INJUNCTION (§ 85*)—TRESPASS TO PROPERTY—RIGHT OF ACTION—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

A private corporation given the exclusive care, custody, and possession of the so-called "Alamo property," owned by the state, by legislative consent, charged with its repair and maintenance, had the right and duty to protect its possession from a trespasser by action to enjoin the trespass.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

5. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 26*)—LEGISLATIVE DEPARTMENT—SCOPE OF POWERS.

Within constitutional limits the power of the Legislature in the enactment of laws is supreme.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Constitutional Law, Cent. Dig. § 30; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

6. STATES (§ 88*)—CUSTODY OF PROPERTY—CONSTITUTIONALITY OF STATUTE.

The superintendency of public buildings is a legislative office which may have its powers increased or restricted or be abolished by the Legislature, and Act Jan. 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), which gave the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, a private corporation, the exclusive care and custody of the so-called "Alamo property," charged with its care and maintenance for historical and patriotic purposes, was constitutional.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

7. STATES (§ 191*)—ACTIONS—RIGHT OF "SUIT AGAINST STATE."

State officers, who without legislative authority or sanction trespass upon state property given by express enactment into the exclusive possession of a private corporation, do not represent the state, and may be sued as any other trespassers upon the rights of possession would be sued: a suit against them not being a suit against the state.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 7, p. 6778; vol. 8, p. 7809.]

8. CORPORATIONS (§ 499*)—CORPORATE POWERS—CAPACITY TO SUE AND BE SUED.

A private corporation, in the absence of charter or statutory provisions to the contrary, has the same capacity to sue and be sued as a natural person; the power to sue and be sued are among its incidental and implied powers which need not be expressly conferred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1910, 1911, 1913-1919, 2030; Dec. Dig. § 499.*]

9. INJUNCTION (§ 35*)—PREVENTION OF TRESPASS—SUIT BY CORPORATION—CONDITIONS PRECEDENT.

A private corporation, vested by the Legislature with the exclusive possession and control of property belonging to the state, to sustain a suit to enjoin a trespass need not show express statutory authority, since the statute carried with it the grant of every power needed to carry its purpose into effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Injunction, Cent. Dig. § 77; Dec. Dig. § 35.*]

10. CORPORATIONS (§ 519*)—CIVIL ACTION—PRESUMPTION—SUIT AUTHORIZED BY CORPORATION.

A suit by a corporation sanctioned by its president and other officers will be presumed to have been authorized by the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2085, 2088-2093; Dec. Dig. § 519.*]

11. STATES (§ 88*)—CONTROL OF PUBLIC PROPERTY—EXECUTION OF CORPORATE PURPOSES.

It was not a condition precedent to suit to enjoin a trespass to real property owned by the state and given by it into the exclusive possession and control of plaintiff, a private corporation, that plaintiff should allege or prove that it was executing the charge reposed in it; that being a matter only between it and the state, to be inquired into by the Legislature.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

12. PERPETUITIES (§ 4*)—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CUSTODY OF STATE PROPERTY.

Act Jan. 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), which gave to a private corporation the exclusive possession and control of the so-called "Alamo property," belonging to the state, charged with its repair and maintenance for historical and patriotic purposes, and provided that "all of said property being subject to future legislation of the state of Texas," did not violate Const. art. 1, § 26, which declares that perpetuities are contrary to the genius of free government and shall never be allowed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Perpetuities, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-44; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

13. MONOPOLIES (§ 3*)—CONSTITUTIONAL AND STATUTORY PROVISIONS—CUSTODY OF PUBLIC PROPERTY.

A "monopoly," in the sense forbidden by Const. art. 1, § 26, consists in the ownership or control of so large a part of the market supply of a given commodity as to stifle competition, restrict the freedom of commerce, and give the monopolies control over prices; and hence Act Jan. 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), which granted to a private corporation property owned by the state charged with its repair and maintenance for historical and patriotic purposes, subject to future legislation, did not violate the constitutional provision, since it was but the assumption of a burden which deprived no citizen of any privilege or right and brought no financial gain to the corporation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Monopolies, Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 5, pp. 4570-4574.]

14. CORPORATIONS (§ 28*)—INCORPORATION AND ORGANIZATION—"DE FACTO CORPORATION."

Although a private corporation may not have complied with all the statutory requirements, it is a "de facto corporation."

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 2, pp. 1841-1843.]

15. CORPORATIONS (§ 29*)—INCORPORATION AND ORGANIZATION—VALIDITY—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

The corporate existence of a private corporation cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 77-79, 2504; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

16. CORPORATIONS (§ 513*)—ACTIONS—NECESSITY FOR ALLEGING AUTHORITY TO BRING SUIT.

It is not necessary in a suit by a private corporation to allege that the suit is authorized by the board of directors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2017-2027, 2031-2034, 2036-2045; Dec. Dig. § 513.*]

17. INJUNCTION (§ 46*)—TRESPASS TO REAL PROPERTY—GROUNDS.

A private corporation vested by legislative enactment with the exclusive possession and control of property belonging to the state, charged with its care and maintenance, on showing that its possession had been invaded and injured by state officers, was entitled to an injunction restraining the trespass.

On Motion for Rehearing.

18. STATUTES (§ 150, New, vol. 2 Key-No. Series) — REPEAL — CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

Const. art. 3, § 35, which provides that "no bill (except general appropriation bills, which may embrace the various subjects and accounts for and on which moneys are appropriated) shall contain more than one subject which shall be expressed in its title," does not authorize the passage of new laws or the repeal of old ones by a general appropriation bill.

19. STATUTES (§ 154*)—REPEAL—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—RE-ENACTMENT.

An item in a general appropriation act which makes no reference by title or otherwise to a previous legislative act could not amend such act, since Const. art. 3, § 36, provides that no law shall be amended by reference to its title, but that in such case the act reviewed or the section or sections amended shall be re-enacted and published at length.

20. STATES (§ 88*)—CIVIL ACTIONS—DENIAL OF CORPORATION'S GOOD FAITH.

In an action by a private corporation vested by the Legislature with the exclusive possession and control of public property belonging to the state, charged with its care and maintenance for historical and patriotic purposes, to enjoin a trespass, the objection that the corporation has not acted in good faith with the state cannot be considered; that being a matter to be addressed to the Legislature.

Appeal from District Court, Bexar County;
J. L. Camp, Judge.

Injunction by the Daughters of the Republic

lic of Texas against A. B. Conley and others. From an order perpetuating a temporary injunction, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

J. F. Carl, of San Antonio, for appellants. Webb & Goeth and Denman, Franklin & McGown, all of San Antonio, for appellee.

FLY, C. J. Appellee, a private corporation duly incorporated under the laws of Texas, instituted this suit to enjoin Dr. A. B. Conley, individually and as superintendent of public buildings and grounds, J. B. Nitschke, individually and as state inspector of masonry, and J. M. English, individually and as foreman of the workmen engaged in trespassing upon certain property, from so trespassing. It was alleged that, by an act of the Legislature of Texas dated January 26, 1905 (Acts 29th Leg. c. 7), the Governor was authorized to purchase the property known as the Hugo-Schmeltzer property, formerly a part of the Alamo Mission and adjoining the Alamo Church, which was the property of the state; that the Governor bought the property, and by the act of the Legislature of 1905 he was required to deliver the property, known as the Hugo-Schmeltzer property, as well as the Alamo Church property, to the custody and care of the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, and under the provisions of the act the custody, care, and possession of the property were duly delivered by the state of Texas to appellee; that appellants wrongfully and unlawfully, and without the consent of appellee, had entered upon the property and were engaged in tearing down the improvements and were threatening to remodel the same and erect improvements thereon without the consent of appellee and without the authority of law. A temporary writ of injunction was granted against appellants, which, on a final hearing, was perpetuated.

The court filed the following findings of fact, which are adopted by this court, with the emendation of a few unnecessary words:

"(1) The Daughters of the Republic of Texas is a private corporation, duly incorporated under the laws of the state of Texas, for the purpose set forth and alleged in plaintiff's petition herein.

"(2) Under the act of the Legislature of the state of Texas, approved January 26, 1905, as averred in plaintiff's petition herein, the state of Texas through its Governor purchased the property known as the Old Hugo & Schmeltzer Building in plaintiff's petition fully described, and being a part of what is commonly known as the 'Alamo property,' and previous to such purchase, the state of Texas had acquired what is known as the 'Alamo Mission' property proper in said city of San Antonio; the two properties together constituting what is commonly known as the Alamo property in the city of San Antonio.

"(3) In accordance with the provisions of said act of the Legislature, said two properties were delivered by the state of Texas into the custody and care of plaintiff prior to any of the trespasses alleged in plaintiff's petition, and at the time of the said alleged trespasses said plaintiff was in possession of said property, holding the care and custody of same under the terms of the act of the Legislature above referred to.

"(4) No plan for any changes or alterations or remodeling of any of the buildings upon said property has been made or adopted by plaintiff and approved by the Governor of the state of Texas.

"(5) No plan or any alteration or changes or remodeling of any of said buildings had been prepared by the Governor of the state of Texas and submitted to plaintiff for consideration by plaintiff.

"(6) Plaintiff has never surrendered said property nor the care or custody of same to any one, but has retained such possession, care, and custody ever since the delivery of the property to plaintiff.

"(7) The defendants in their official capacities alleged in plaintiff's petition entered upon the said property prior to the filing of plaintiff's petition, and without the consent of plaintiff were at the time of the filing of said petition engaged in tearing down certain of the improvements upon said property, making excavations thereon for rebuilding certain of the improvements thereon and for the erection of new improvements thereon, and were rebuilding certain of the improvements thereon and remodeling certain of the improvements thereon.

"(8) This work was being done without any plan as to what future improvements would be made upon the property or what remodeling of the property would be done, the evidence showing that the work was being done without any fixed or definite plan, and the defendants were unable to inform the court what remodeling of any improvements was contemplated, nor what improvements were contemplated, nor what changes in the present building were contemplated by them or by the Governor of the state."

Appellee was incorporated for the purposes, and given the authority, as follows: "First, to perpetuate the memory and spirit of the men and women who have achieved and maintained the independence of Texas. Second, to encourage historical research into the earliest records of Texas, especially those relating to the Revolution of 1835, and the events which followed; to foster the preservation of documents and relics, and to encourage the publication of records of individual service of soldiers and patriots of the Republic. Third, to promote the celebration of March 2d (Independence Day), and April 21st (San Jacinto Day); to secure and hallow historic spots by erecting monuments thereon; and to cherish and preserve unity of Texas, as achieved and established by the fathers and mothers of the Texas Revolution. This association may have and hold, by purchase, grant, gift, or otherwise, real estate on which battles for the independence of Texas were fought; such monument or monuments as may be erected thereon; and burial grounds where the dead, who fought and died for Texas independence, are buried; and personal property, consisting of books, manuscripts, and other historical records, relating to the early history of Texas; and relics."

[1] After providing for the purchase of the land causing this controversy, the act of January 26, 1905, provided: "Upon the receipt of the title to said land, the Governor shall deliver the property thus acquired, together with the Alamo Church property already owned by the state, to the custody and care of the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, to be maintained by them in good order and repair, without charge to the state, as a memorial to the heroes who immolated themselves upon that hallowed ground; and by the Daughters of the Republic of Texas to be maintained or remodeled upon plans adopted by the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, and approved by the Governor of Texas; provided that no alterations shall be made in the Alamo Church proper, as it now stands, except such as are absolutely necessary for its preservation. All of said property being subject to future legislation by the Legislature of the state of Texas." Undoubtedly, that law, in plain and unequivocal terms, gave appellee the custody of the property in question and imposed upon it the duty and burden of keeping it in good order and repair without expense to the state, and under that law appellee took possession of the property and assumed the responsibility of maintaining it in good order and repair. It is apparent that by "care and custody" the state intended to place appellee in possession and give it exclusive and absolute control, within the limitations prescribed in the law, over the property. The state intended to and did lift the responsibility from itself of caring for and maintaining the property and placed those burdens upon appellee. No other reasonable intentment can be deduced from the language of the act. No limitations of the powers granted to appellee were made except that its manner of maintenance or remodeling of the property or its improvements should meet with the approval of the Governor, and that the Mission Church should not be changed or altered unless it was absolutely necessary for its preservation. Within those limitations the possession and authority over the property were exclusive and supreme. Those statutory checks and limitations of the power of the custodian of the Alamo property were enacted to prevent any ill-considered change being made in the property which the state desired to be preserved and cherished "as a sacred memorial to heroes who immolated themselves upon that hallowed ground."

[2, 3] Under the act of 1905, appellee had the right of possession, custody, care and control of the Alamo property, and has to this day, unless the authority has been canceled and destroyed by subsequent legislation, and that is the contention of appellants. The law relied on as a repealing act is an item in the appropriation act of 1911 (Laws 1911, p. 6) which is: "For the improvement of the Alamo property belonging to the state of Texas, in the city of San Antonio, to be expended under the direction of the superintendent of public buildings and grounds, upon the approval of the Governor, $5,000.00." There is no mention of the statute of 1905 giving the Daughters of the Republic of Texas control of the property, and the contention is that by implication it deprives it of the custody given to it by the former law.

Repeals by implication are not favored by the courts of the country, and a statute will not be held to repeal an existing one unless there is an irreconcilable repugnancy between them, or unless there is an evident design upon the part of the Legislature to supersede all prior legislation in connection with the subject-matter and to enact a complete law in regard to it. The item from the appropriation bill will not stand such a test; but, on the other hand, it is in perfect harmony with the existing law and is merely supplementary thereto. There is not one word in it that indicates any desire or intention to take the custody of the Alamo property from the hands of the association of Texas women which had accepted the burdens imposed upon it by the state, but, on the other hand, it merely loosened the purse strings of the state in order to assist in the belated work of preserving these relics of our heroic dead.

The only change, if any, made by the appropriation item of 1911, was to give the superintendent of public buildings the right to enter the Alamo property for a specific purpose, that of directing the expenditure of the money appropriated. The general custody of the property was not disturbed. The right of maintenance and remodeling the improvements remained the same. Before the appropriation could be used, and before the state officer could direct its disbursement, appellee had to make plans for remodeling, and those plans had to be approved by the Governor. No one had the power and authority to provide plans or to have them executed but the Daughters of the Republic of Texas. To the amount of $5,000 the superintendent of public buildings, with the approval of the Governor, could superintend the disbursement of the money in making changes or improvements in the property. His authority began and ended with the direction of the disbursement of the $5,000.

[4] Appellee being undoubtedly in exclusive possession and having the care and custody of the Alamo property, by the consent of the state of Texas, expressed through its legislative department, had the right and authority to repel the invasion of the property by any trespasser. It stood in the same relation to the property that any other actual, exclusive possessor of land does against any mere stranger or wrongdoer, who has neither title to the possession, nor authority from the owner. No one but the state of Texas, the owner of the land, could oust it of its rightful possession, and it was not only the privilege, but the duty, of the custodian of the property to defend its possession against any trespasser. Linard v. Crossland, 10 Tex. 462, 60 Am. Dec. 213; Wilson v. Palmer, 18 Tex. 592; Bonner v. Wiggins, 52 Tex. 125; Parker v. Railway, 71 Tex. 132, 8 S. W. 541; Pacific Express Co. v. Dunn, 81 Tex. 85, 16 S. W. 792; National Bank v. Brown, 85 Tex. 80, 23 S. W. 862; Watkins v. Smith, 91 Tex. 589, 45 S. W. 560.

The title to the Alamo property is in the state of Texas, and it alone has the right and authority to place the possession, control, and custody of it in the hands of another; such permission to control and possess being expressed through its only medium of expression, in such case, the legislative branch of the government. It alone can legislate, and to it and the Constitution of the state the other branches of the government must look for power, guidance, and authority.

[5] Within constitutional limits its power in the enactment of laws is supreme.

[6] It had the power and authority to create the office of superintendent of public buildings and grounds, and to clothe him with authority to take charge and control of all public buildings, grounds, and property, and it seems clear that it could take the charge and control of any public property away from him and place such custody in the keeping of some other agency. The superintendent of public buildings is a legislative office, which may have its powers increased or restricted, or the office altogether abolished, by the Legislature, and the Legislature was acting within its constitutional powers when it placed the custody of the Alamo property in other hands than those of the superintendent of public buildings. This is what the Legislature intended to do by the act of 1905, and this is clearly evidenced by its adoption of the Revised Civil Statutes, at the regular session of 1911, containing the law of 1905 as to the Alamo property, which is made article 6394, in title 113, relating to public buildings, grounds, and parks, wherein is found the only authority for the appointment of the superintendent of public buildings. Under that same title are provisions for the appointment of San Jacinto park commissioners, who are not given the care and custody of the park, but who are authorized "to advise with and assist the superintendent of public grounds in the improvement, care, and preservation of the lands now owned and hereafter acquired by the state, known as the San Jacinto Battlefield." No such divided or concurrent authority is given by article 6394, relating to the Alamo.

We do not think that the contention that, although the Alamo property was "delivered to the care and custody of the Daughters of the Republic of Texas," the custody was not exclusive, can be sustained. The care and custody of person or property carries with it the idea of exclusive possession. This may be illustrated by our divorce laws, which authorize district courts to "give the custody and education of the children to either father or mother," and which, every one is constrained to admit, carries with it authority to one of the spouses not conferred on the other. It means a custody exclusive of the other. We cannot conceive of one person having the "care and custody" of property, charged with repairing and maintaining it, and another without a grant of authority taking possession and making changes and improvements in the property. This could not be done even by the owner of the property who had placed his property indefinitely in the hands of another, to care for it, unless done in a legal way to protect the property. The state of Texas had recognized the exclusive possession of the property by the Daughters of the Republic of Texas ever since the passage of the law of 1905, and the officers sued only claim the right to disturb that possession by authority of the quoted clause in the appropriation bill of 1911.

[7] The state has not attempted by legislative action to resume possession of the Alamo property, and has not authorized appellants to interfere in any manner with the possession and custody of the property unless appellee should invoke such interference by inviting the expenditure of the money appropriated by the Legislature. It has not done this, and the officers sued, acting without legislative sanction or authority, can be sued as any other trespasser upon the rights of possession would be sued. They are in no sense representing the state of Texas, and a suit against them is not a suit against the state. United States v. Schwalby, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 679, 29 S. W. 90; Id., 87 Tex. 604, 30 S. W. 435. In that case Gen. Stanley and other military officers of the United States were trespassers upon land owned by Mrs. Schwalby and they were sued by her. This court held that the United States was not sued, but that the officers were sued as trespassers. The Supreme Court of Texas refused a writ of error, and in its opinion on the application it was held: "The proposition that Stanley and his co-defendants, although officers of the United States, and in possession of the lot under and by virtue of the authority of the United States, could not be sued for the property and rents, is no longer open to contention." That cause was taken by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States (147 U. S. 508, 13 Sup. Ct. 418, 37 L. Ed. 259; 162 U. S. 255, 16 Sup. Ct. 754, 40 L. Ed. 960), and that tribunal agreed with this court that the officers could be sued as trespassers, but held that the title of the United States to the land was good, and that judgment should have been rendered in favor of the officers. There are other points discussed in that case, but none, except that mentioned, is applicable to this case.

The noted case of United States v. Lee, 106 U. S. 196, 1 Sup. Ct. 240, 27 L. Ed. 171, involving Arlington, the estate of Gen. Robert E. Lee, fully sustains the judgment of this court in the Schwalby Case, and that court quoted this strong presentation of the matter raised in this case, from Chief Justice Marshall in Osborn v. U. S. Bank, 9 Wheat. 738, 6 L. Ed. 204: "If the state of Ohio could have been made a party defendant, it can scarcely be denied that this would be a strong case for an injunction. The objection is that, as the real party cannot be brought before the court, a suit cannot be sustained against agents of that party; and cases have been cited to show that a court of chancery will not make a decree, unless all those who are substantially interested be made parties to the suit. This is certainly true where it is in the power of the plaintiff to make them parties, but if the person who is the real principal, the person who is the true source of the mischief, by whose power and for whose advantage it is done, be himself above the law, be exempt from all judicial process, it would be subversive of the best-established principles to say that the laws could not afford the same remedies against the agent employed in doing the wrong, which they would afford against him could his principal be joined in the suit." We need not go to that extent in this case, because no authority was shown to have been given by the state of Texas to appellants to invade the rightful possession of the property by appellee. Again, in the Osborn Case the Supreme Court said: "In deciding who are parties to the suit, the court will not look beyond the record. Making a state officer a party does not make the state a party, although her law may have prompted his action, and the state may stand behind him, as a real party in interest. A state can be made a party only by shaping the bill expressly with that view, as where individuals or corporations are intended to be put in that relation to the case."

In the Lee Case Mr. Justice Miller said: "In the case supposed, the court has before it a plaintiff capable of suing, a defendant who has no personal exemption from suit, and a cause of action cognizable in the court; a case within the meaning of that term, as employed in the Constitution and defined by the decisions of this court. * * * What is the right as established in this case? It is the right to the possession of the homestead of plaintiff, a right to recover that which has been taken from him by force and violence and detained by the strong hand. This right being clearly established, we are told that the court can proceed no further, because it appears that certain military officers, acting under the orders of the President, have seized this estate, and converted one part of it into a military fort and another into a cemetery. It is not pretended, as the case now stands, that the President had any lawful authority to do this, nor that the legislative body could give him such authority, except upon payment of just compensation. The defense stands here solely upon the absolute immunity from judicial inquiry of every one who asserts authority from the executive branch of the government, however clear it may be made that the executive possessed no such power." The suit was sustained by that court.

[8] Appellee is a private corporation chartered by the state of Texas, and, in the absence of charter or statutory provisions to the contrary, has the same capacity to sue and be sued as a natural person. The powers to sue and be sued are among the incidental and implied powers, from the earliest period attributed to corporations, and need never be expressly conferred. Clark & Marshall, Priv. Corp. § 258. Having a possessory right in the property, the corporation had the authority to prosecute a suit against a trespasser on the property as hereinbefore indicated.

[9] It was not necessary, in order to sustain a suit to prevent a trespass, that authority should be given by the statute giving the corporation the custody of the property. That statute carried with it the grant of every power needed to carry into effect the purposes of the statute. Such power was incidental to powers granted. The case of Charles River Bridge v. Warren Bridge, 11 Pet. 420, 9 L. Ed. 773, has no application to the facts of this case.

[10] It will be presumed that the suit was authorized by the corporation, as it was sanctioned by its president and other officers. Olcott v. Gabert, 86 Tex. 121, 23 S. W. 985. Appellants had no right to inquire into such authority and did not, on the trial, attempt to do so.

[11] It was not a condition precedent to instituting the suit that appellee should allege or prove that it was executing the trust reposed in it. If it is not performing the trust, that is a matter between it and the state of Texas, to be inquired into and met by the Legislature. No power has been vested in any officer of the state government to set aside the law and take possession of the property because the corporation is not living up to its agreement. The state has the authority to legislate further in regard to the matter, but it has not done so in a way to interfere with the law of 1905.

[12, 13] The claim that the act of 1905 is contrary to and in violation of article 1, § 26, of the Constitution of Texas, in regard to perpetuities and monopolies, cannot be sustained. That section is: "Perpetuities and monopolies are contrary to the genius of a free government, and shall never be allowed." The power granted to the Daughters of the Republic of Texas was not a perpetuity, because appellants are contending that they could put an end to it, and the law itself states "all of said property being subject to future legislation of the state of Texas." The definition of a monopoly precludes it from being applied to a grant of power to an association to assume the burden of caring for, preserving, and repairing a piece of property belonging to the state. "A monopoly consists in the ownership or control of so large a part of the market supply or output of a given commodity as to stifle competition, restrict the freedom of commerce, and give the monopolist control over prices." Black's Law Dictionary: Queen Ins. Co. v. State, 86 Tex. 250, 24 S. W. 397, 22 L. R. A. 483. That is the monopoly the Constitution condemns, and not the assumption of a burden which deprives no citizen of any privilege or right, and brings no financial gain to the person granted certain authority. The cases cited have no application to a case of this character. No credit or aid was given by the state to the corporation. If the property was, or is, revenue producing, the revenue belongs to the state of Texas, for the simple and plain reason that no revenues have been granted to appellee. That is a matter which can have no bearing on this suit.

The act of 1905 is a general and not a special act. It applies to the whole state, and not any particular community or particular persons. This question is not raised by any proper assignment of error, but is sought to be presented by a proposition under an assignment which refers to an entirely different matter.

The eighteenth assignment cannot be sustained. The evidence failed to show that any plan had been proposed by the Governor for the improvement of the property, and therefore there could have been no ratification of the same. The matter ratified was the tearing away of the woodwork and other rubbish but the record fails to indicate any ratification of any plans for improvement or repairs.

[14, 15] No attempt was made to prove that appellee had not elected a board of directors; but, if the testimony had shown that fact, it would not have deprived appellee of the right to prosecute the suit. Although appellee may not have complied with all the statutory requirements, it would still be a de facto corporation, and its corporate existence cannot be attacked in a collateral proceeding. Clark & Marshall, Priv. Corp. § 80, pp. 226, 227. The corporate existence of appellee has been fully recognized by the state. The facts show a board of directors was in existence under the name of executive committee.

[16] This has been fully recognized in De Zavala v. Daughters of the Republic, 124 S. W. 160, and writ of error denied by the Supreme Court. As held in that case, it was not necessary to allege nor prove that the suit was authorized by the board of directors.

[17] Appellee did show that the plans being followed by appellants were injurious, and that its lawful possession had been invaded, and that was a sufficient basis for a restraining order. Burnley v. Cook, 13 Tex. 586, 65 Am. Dec. 79; Buskirk v. King, 72 Fed. 22, 18 C. C. A. 418.

We have given all of the assignments careful attention, and have arrived at the conclusion that the exclusive custody and care of the Alamo property has been given to appellee by the state; that it alone can make plans, which, to be effective, must be approved by the Governor; that the appropriation item of 1911 did not repeal any part of the law of 1905; that the custody and care of the Alamo property is still confided to the Daughters of the Republic of Texas; and that appellants were trespassers thereon.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

Appellants pretermit all other questions raised in the brief by stating: "The sole question to be determined is: Did the court err in holding that the act of the Thirty-Second Legislature of Texas did not repeal the entire act of January 26, 1905?"

[18] In article 3, § 35, of the Constitution of Texas, it is provided that "no bill (except general appropriation bills, which may embrace the various subjects and accounts for and on which moneys are appropriated) shall contain more than one subject, which shall be expressed in its title." That section does not give any authority to pass new laws or repeal old ones through the medium of a general appropriation bill, and even if the Legislature had intended to repeal the act of 1905, by an item in the appropriation bill, it would be invalid and unconstitutional, for such bills are excepted from the general rule only for the reason that they might appropriate money for the various purposes of government, without naming each item in the title, which would render them cumbersome and very onerous. It was never contemplated that a valid existing law should be repealed by an appropriation of money, even though, as is not the case in this instance, it be totally inconsistent with the terms of the existing law. No case has been cited, or has come to our notice, where an existing law has been repealed by the appropriation of money in connection with the subject-matter of the existing law. A statute might be brought into a state of "innocuous desuetude," so that it might languish, and, languishing, perchance might die of inanition by a failure to appropriate funds necessary to put it into operation, but the Legislature attempted a novel performance if it endeavored to destroy a law by the appropriation of money to carry it into effect.

Admitting that a repealing act might be sandwiched among the various and sundry items of a general appropriation act, still such an act would not be a subject or account for and on which moneys are appropriated, and should be expressed in the title. It was never contemplated that an act should be repealed by an item in an appropriation bill, and there is nothing in the item appropriating the $5,000 to improve the Alamo property that evinces any desire upon the part of the Legislature to take the custody of the property from those to whom it had been intrusted by law. We must presume that, if the Legislature desired to relieve the association of Texas women of the custody and care of the Alamo property, it would have met the question in an open, manly way, and would not, at a called session, convened for certain purposes, have slipped an item into a general appropriation bill, in order to repeal one of the statutes of the state.

[18] Even if the item, which is dignified by appellants by being called a "repealing act," had been intended as an amendment of the act of 1905, it would not be in harmony with article 3, § 36, of the Constitution, which provides that no law shall be amended by reference to its title, "but in such case the act reviewed or the section or sections amended shall be re-enacted and published at length." No reference whatever is made in the appropriation item to the act of 1905, by title or otherwise. The sole object of the appropriation of 1911 was to assist the trustees and custodians of the Alamo in caring for and improving the property.

[20] As to the charge that the Daughters of the Republic of Texas have not made any efforts to improve the property, and have not acted in good faith with the state, this court has nothing to do; but that matter, if deserving of presentation to any branch of the state government, must be addressed to the Legislature, which gave appellee its authority and alone can take it away.

This court has not held, as so zealously, if not intemperately, asserted by appellants in their motion, that the money appropriated should be distributed by the Daughters of the Republic of Texas, but have held that no officer of the state government has the authority to dispossess that organization of the custody of property confided to it by the Legislature. This court has nothing to do with the question of the expenditure of the money appropriated, and does not propose to be led off into the consideration of such questions, which have no bearing whatever upon the law and merits of this case.

The motion for rehearing is overruled.

COMPTON v. AHRENS & OTT MFG. CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Galveston, Nov. 22, 1912.)

1. PAYMENT (§ 39*)—APPLICATION—RIGHT OF CREDITORS.

Where a debtor making a payment gives no direction as to the application thereof, the creditor may generally do so; and the application need not be made by him at the time of payment, provided it is done within a reasonable time thereafter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. §§ 104-114; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

2. PAYMENT (§ 75*)—APPLICATION—EVIDENCE.

The application by a creditor of a payment, where the debtor gives no directions as to application, may be established by circumstances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. 239; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

3. PAYMENT (§ 75*)—APPLICATION—EVIDENCE.

A guaranty covered $1,200 of an account of $1,450.53. The debtor made a partial payment of $500, without direction as to its application. The guarantor was advised of the payment, and three months thereafter the creditor demanded payment of the balance due on the account, and the guarantor replied that a remittance would be made about a designated future date. Held, that the creditor first applied the partial payment to the amount in excess of the guaranty, and the balance on the guaranty, so that the guarantor was liable for the balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Payment, Cent. Dig. § 239; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

Error from Galveston County Court; James B. Stubbs, Special Judge.

Action by the Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company against E. H. Compton and another. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendant named brings error. Affirmed.

Geo. G. Clough, of Galveston, for plaintiff in error.

REESE, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the county court. E. H. Compton was sued, along with his principals, by Ahrens & Ott Manufacturing Company as guarantor of a certain account for goods and merchandise sold by appellee Ahrens & Ott Company to the Compton Plumbing Company, or Compton & Athey. The entire account amounted to $1,450.53. The guaranty of appellant covered $1,200 of the account. The principal debtors made, at three different times, payments amounting in the aggregate to $940, which appellees claimed should be applied, or had been applied by them, to that part of the account not covered by the guaranty, leaving the guarantor liable for the entire balance of $510. On the other hand, appellant contends that the amounts paid should be applied to that part of the account secured by the guaranty, which would have left only $280 for which he would be liable. The case was tried without a jury, and the court held with appellees, and rendered judgment against the principal debtor, appellant (the guarantor), for $510.53, from which judgment he appeals by writ of error. We use the terms of appellant and appellees for brevity.

The debtor gave no directions as to the application of the several payments. So far as the books of appellees show, they were credited generally upon the account of $1,450.53. If this were all that there was on this point, we would be confronted with the vexatious question, upon which there is so much conflict in the authorities, at least in the practical application of principles to the concrete facts of particular cases, of the application of payments by the court, as between several items of indebtedness, when no application has been made by either debtor or creditor before suit brought.

[1] The debtor having made no application, the creditor had the right, generally, to do so; and it is not necessary that such application should have been made by him at the time of payment, provided it be done within a reasonable time thereafter. Stone v. Petrus, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 14, 103 S. W. 415; 30 Cyc. 1238.

[2] Such application may also be established by circumstances. Bray v. Crain, 59 Tex. 652; 30 Cyc. 1237.

[3] Three months after the first payment of $500 had been made, and of which appellant had been advised, reducing the entire account to $974.43 (interest included), appellees wrote to appellant as follows: "As you have not seen fit to reply to our recent communication relative to the account of Athey & Compton of $974.43, which was guaranteed by you, we are surprised at your ignoring our letter, and we take this means of advising that unless we receive some assurance from you that this account will be paid within a short time it is our intention to place same in the hands of our attorney. We hope that you will not permit matters to be brought to this issue but that you will arrange to see that check is forthcoming without delay." Appellant replied to this letter as follows: "Yours of the 30th inst. is at hand, and I have written you on different occasions in regard to Athey & Compton's account and I assure you that everything is all O. K. Their collections have been very slow in the past month. I think they will be able to make a remittance about the 20th of this month. Hoping this is satisfactory, I remain."

Appellant knew that $500 had been paid on the entire account. If this had been applied to that part secured by his guaranty, it would have reduced the amount for which he was liable to $700. This letter is a demand upon appellant for $974, and indicates that so much of the $500 as was required for that purpose had been applied to the payment of the unsecured part of the account, and the balance applied to that part secured by the guaranty. In no other way would appellant's liability be the amount for which demand was made on him by appellees. We think it a reasonable inference or deduction from this circumstance that appellees had at the time of, or previous to, the date of this letter made such application of the $500. The letter was certainly sufficient to so inform appellant, who in his reply made no objection thereto, but apparently acquiesced therein. The trial court so construed this correspondence, and found that there had been such application of this payment. We think this conclusion was correct. This left the entire balance of $974 then due secured by the guaranty. Subsequent payment reduced this amount to the amount for which judgment was rendered against appellant, as guarantor. We find no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

ROYAL NEIGHBORS OF AMERICA v. BRATCHER.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Dec. 17, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1912.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 723*)—BENEFIT CERTIFICATE—"ABORTION"—"MISCARRIAGE."

Decedent, having applied for insurance in a mutual benefit society, answered that she had never had any local disease, personal injury, or illness of any kind, but in answer to the medical questions stated that her last confinement was in 1908, and that she had had two miscarriages from overexertion. In an action on the certificate, it was shown that in 1903, about seven years prior to decedent's death, she suffered an abortion when she was about three months advanced in pregnancy, and that about three years later another occurred at about the same stage. Held, that since the words "abortion" and "miscarriage" are synonymous, both meaning premature parturition, there was no breach of warranty or misrepresentation.

2. INSURANCE (§ 723*)—MISREPRESENTATION—MATERIALITY.

Where insured denied that she had had any illness within seven years prior to her application, proof that her physicians treated her for headache three years prior to the date of the policy did not necessarily defeat plaintiff's right to recover, the jury being authorized to find that such illness, if any, was not material to the risk assumed within Acts 31st Leg. (2d Ex. Sess.) c. 22.

Appeal from District Court, Cooke County; Clem B. Potter, Judge.

Action by Andy Bratcher against the Royal Neighbors of America. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stuart, Bell & Moore, of Gainesville, for appellant. Davis & Davis, of Gainesville, for appellee.

HODGES, J. The appellant is a fraternal benefit insurance society, of which Mrs. Carrie Bratcher, the deceased wife of the appellee, was a member in good standing at the time of her death. This suit is to recover the amount due upon a policy of insurance issued on the life of Mrs. Bratcher, payable to the appellee. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict against the appellant for the full sum sued for.

[1] The first error assigned is the refusal of the court to grant the motion for a new trial, based upon the ground that the verdict was against the great weight and preponderance of the evidence. The principal defense urged in the trial court was the falsity of answers made by the deceased in her application for the insurance. The particular questions referred to and discussed in appellant's brief are the following: "Have you within the last seven years consulted any person, physician, or physicians in regard to a personal ailment? Have you ever had any local disease, personal injury, illness of any kind or nature, serious or otherwise?" To both of these questions the applicant answered, "No." It is claimed that these answers were false, and for that reason the policy was void under the terms of the conditions upon which it was issued.

The evidence shows that in 1903, about seven years prior to her death, Mrs. Bratcher suffered an abortion when she was about three months advanced in pregnancy, and that about three years later another occurred at about the same stage. Neither of these appears to have been attended with any consequences which affected her health. Some time after the last miscarriage a physician was called in upon one occasion to treat her for sick headache from which she also fully recovered. The record does not inform us whether she called in the physician, or that it was done by her husband. The testimony all indicates that at the time this policy was issued Mrs. Bratcher had fully recovered from the effects of her previous ailments, and was in good health. Her death was due to ulceration of the stomach, according to the testimony of the physician who attended her. On the reverse side of her application for insurance appears a list of questions under this heading: "Camp physician to fill in this page." In a subdivision of the questions which follow is a group to be answered by female applicants. The record there shows the following questions and answers: "Give date of last confinement—1908; How many miscarriages—2 times; Give cause of miscarriages—overexertion." The camp physician who inserted those answers testified as follows: "At the time I examined her she was in good health. I was fairly positive she was in good health. These answers on this application * * * are in my handwriting. She told me about the two miscarriages she had. I did not give the date at the time. They sent the paper back for correction, and I got the paper and corrected it. I got that from the family physician, Dr. Seagraves." Unless there is a substantial and generally recognized distinction between the meaning of the words "abortion" and "miscarriage," appellant was fully and truthfully informed of the two abortions relied on to prove falsity in the answers made. In the standard dictionaries one is treated as a synonym of the other. Both mean premature parturition. As to these ailments there was no ground for holding the policy void because of incorrect answers. Supreme Lodge v. Jones, 143 S. W. 247.

[2] The jury might easily have concluded that the calling in of a physician to treat her for headache three years prior to the date of the policy was, even if incorrect, not "material to the risk assumed." Acts 31st Leg. (2d Ex. Sess.) p. 443. The jury was charged in accordance with the provisions of the statute. United N. B. A. v. Baker, 141 S. W. 541. There was no error in giving the charge complained of, nor in refusing the special charges presented.

The judgment is affirmed.

MOURSUND, J. Pursuant to appellee's motion to strike out the statement of facts filed in this cause, we have examined the same, and find that it does not comply with the rules, in that much of it consists of questions and answers, interspersed with objections by counsel and rulings by the court. About 6 pages contain documentary evidence. Out of the remaining 53 pages, over 30 contain questions and answers, and about 20 consist entirely of questions and answers, objections and rulings, apparently copied from the stenographer's transcript. About 2 pages are entirely taken up by a single controversy between counsel in regard to the admissibility of certain evidence, interspersed with questions and remarks by the court. We cannot agree with appellants' contention that questions and answers were only copied when necessary to an understanding of the testimony of the witnesses. In our opinion, practically all the questions and answers could have been reduced to a succinct statement in narrative form.

We conclude that the rules have been flagrantly violated in the preparation of this statement of facts, and that it is our duty to grant the motion to strike same from the record. HOUSTON OIL CO. OF TEXAS v. POWELL, District Judge.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Galveston. Nov. 9, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 655*)—RECORD—CORRECTION—JURISDICTION.

The district court has jurisdiction to correct on motion the record on appeal, by striking therefrom conclusions of fact and law not signed and filed within the time allowed by law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2823-2825; Dec. Dig. § 655.*]

2. MANDAMUS (§ 57*)—COMPELLING CORRECTION OF RECORD ON APPEAL—REMEDY.

Mandamus lies to compel the district court to correct the record on appeal, when necessary to have the error corrected.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 68, 114-120; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. MANDAMUS (§ 16*)—COMPELLING CORRECTION OF RECORD ON APPEAL—REMEDY.

Where the record on appeal conclusively shows that the conclusions of fact and law were not filed within the statutory time, and that the indorsement of filing within the time was pursuant to an order of the court made under the belief of the existence of an agreement of the parties, mandamus does not lie to compel the district court to correct the record by striking therefrom the conclusions of fact and law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 48, 59, 60; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

Appeal from District Court, Sabine County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Mandamus by the Houston Oil Company of Texas against W. B. Powell, District Judge, to compel the judge to hear and determine the question of the correctness of the record on appeal. Denied.

Hightower, Orgain & Butler and W. H. Davidson, all of Beaumont, for relator. J. S. Wheless, of Beaumont, for respondent.

REESE, J. The record on appeal in this case contains conclusions of fact and law signed by Hon. W. B. Powell, District Judge. The file mark of the district clerk shows that this paper was filed on April 6, 1912. The term of the court at which the case was tried adjourned March 28, 1912. Claiming that this paper was not in fact filed until after April 16, 1912, being after the expiration of the 10 days after adjournment of the court allowed by law, and that by order of the district judge the same was indorsed by the district clerk filed on April 6th, and should therefore be stricken from the record, appellant presented an application to the district judge, then holding a term of his court in Jasper county, setting out the facts as claimed by it, and praying that the record be corrected, and the document stricken from the record. The judge sustained a general demurrer by appellee to the application, holding that he had no jurisdiction, sitting in Jasper county, to hear and determine the question presented. Afterwards appellant presented another application to the district court of Sabine county, where the case was tried, to the same effect, and subsequently still another to the district judge, holding court in Newton county, in the same district, both of which the district judge refused to hear and determine, whereupon appellant presents to this court its application for a writ of mandamus, setting up the facts stated, and praying for a writ of mandamus requiring the respondent to hear and determine the question presented with regard to the date of the filing of the conclusions of fact and law in this cause.

[1] We have no doubt of the right of appellant to take this course to have the record corrected. That it is the only course, and certainly the proper course, has been settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court and Courts of Civil Appeals. Railway Co. v. Walker, 39 Tex. Civ. App. 53, 87 S. W. 194, citing cases; Harris v. Stark, 101 Tex. 587, 110 S. W. 737; Maxson v. Jennings, 19 Tex.

Civ. App. 700, 48 S. W. 781; Boggess v. Harris, 90 Tex. 476, 39 S. W. 565; Willis Bros. v. Smith, 90 Tex. 636, 40 S. W. 401.

[2] We think that a proceeding of this kind would have to be instituted in the court in which the case was tried, and if it were necessary, in order to have the error here alleged corrected, that it be done by such proceedings, the mandamus would be ordered.

[3] The record before us, however, consisting of the answer of respondent to this application for mandamus, the bill of exceptions approved by the respondent to his action upon the application presented to him in Jasper county, with the affidavit of appellee's counsel, a part of the record in that proceeding and incorporated in this application, in fact, the entire record, contains such indubitable proof that the conclusions of fact and law were not filed on the day shown by the indorsement of the clerk, but were in fact filed more than 10 days after the adjournment of the court, and that the date of filing was, by order of the judge to the district clerk, made to appear as of the 6th of April, in accordance with what he was led to believe was an agreement of counsel for both parties, that it appears to us that it would be altogether unnecessary to have the fact finally adjudicated by the court below. To do so would be a mere idle form, entailing an unnecessary consumption of time, labor, and expense, for no useful purpose. We have, in the record, substantially an admission of all parties that the conclusions were not in fact prepared or filed until more than 10 days after the adjournment, and that the filing was dated back by the clerk, by order of the judge, in accordance with a supposed agreement of counsel. Counsel for the parties are at serious issue as to such agreement, an issue which we do not pass upon, as it is unnecessary to do so in this proceeding.

In this state of the record, we must refuse the writ of mandamus; and it is so ordered.

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 750*)—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—SCOPE AND EFFECT OF ASSIGNMENTS.

On appeal, in an action for cutting timber, an assignment of error that the testimony conclusively established that the timber was cut more than two years before the commencement of the action, and that, there being no evidence to the contrary, the verdict and judgment for plaintiff was not supported by it, and was against preponderance of the evidence, raised only the question whether the undisputed evidence showed that the timber was cut more than two years before the commencement of the action, especially where defendant in its brief waived all questions, except that whether the cause of action was barred by limitations "as shown by the undisputed evidence."

Where an assignment of error only raised the question that there was no evidence to support the verdict, a proposition, if intended to attack the verdict as against the preponderance of the evidence, was not germane to the assignment, and would not be considered.

Appeal from District Court, Tyler County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Action by E. Longini and others against the Thompson Bros. Lumber Company and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and the defendant named appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. Mooney and J. J. Goodwin, both of Woodville, and Lane, Wolters & Storey and Wm. A. Vinson, all of Houston, for appellants. W. A. Johnson and Joe W. Thomas, both of Woodville, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. This is a suit of trespass to try title for the recovery of lot No. 2 of the E. T. Hanks league, in Tyler county, brought on July 9, 1909, in the district court of Tyler county, by E. Longini, Frederick Milheiser, and W. H. Howard, against Thompson Bros. Lumber Company, Cave Johnson, W. G. Pennington, Mrs. Annie Cruse, and Ruth and John Knight Cruse. Plaintiffs alleged that Thompson Bros. Lumber Company had cut and removed the timber from said land, and sought by appropriate allegations to recover from said company the manufactured value thereof, or, in the alternative, the stumpage value. The Cruses disclaimed, and went out on their disclaimer. The plaintiffs admitted that defendants Pennington and Johnson were entitled to the portion of the land sued for described in their answers, and judgment was accordingly awarded them therefor. Defendant Thompson Bros. Lumber Company pleaded not guilty, and interposed a plea of the statute of limitations of two years to the plaintiffs' claim for damages. The case was tried before a jury, and resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiffs against Thompson Bros. Lumber Company for 113 acres of the land sued for and for the sum of $3,955 damages, being the manufactured value of the timber cut from said 113 acres. From this judgment the defendant, after its motion for a new trial had been overruled, has appealed.

[1] The only question presented by appellant for our consideration is embraced in its first assignment of error. The assignment is as follows: "The defendant pleaded the statute of limitation of two years, and the testimony established conclusively that all the timber cut by defendant had been cut for more than two years prior to July 9, 1909. There being no evidence to the contrary, the verdict and judgment is not supported by it, and is against a preponderance of the evidence." Under this assignment appellant urges the following proposition: "The undisputed evidence, or at least the great preponderance of the evidence, shows that the plaintiffs' claim for damages for cutting the timber was barred by the statute of limitations of two years interposed by the defendant." As we understand the assignment of error, it assails the verdict on the sole ground that there is no evidence to support it.

[2] There is a further proposition, advanced in the assignment, that the verdict and judgment are against the preponderance of the evidence; but it is clear that the reason given for this is that the evidence conclusively established that the timber was cut by defendant more than two years prior to July 9, 1909 (the date when the suit was filed), and that there is no evidence to the contrary. We think, then, that the only question presented by the assignment for our consideration is this: Does the undisputed evidence show that the timber was cut by defendant prior to two years before July 9, 1909? That it was the intention of appellant to present this question only is manifest from a statement in its brief immediately preceding the page on which the assignment is copied, wherein it says: "In the presentation of this case to this court, we will waive all other matters, and will present this single question, viz.: The plaintiffs' cause of action for damages for cutting the timber was barred by the statute of limitations of two years, as shown by the undisputed evidence." If by the proposition following the assignment it is intended to attack the verdict and judgment as being against the great preponderance of the testimony, it is not germane to the assignment, and will not be considered.

[3] As before stated, this suit was filed July 9, 1909. Appellant does not deny that it cut and removed the timber, and the testimony clearly shows that it did so. Its only contention is that the undisputed proof shows it cut and appropriated the timber prior to two years before the filing of the suit. If, therefore, there is any testimony in the record sufficient to justify the jury in concluding that the timber was taken within two years prior to July 9, 1909, their verdict should be upheld. Under the assignment of error presented, we are not concerned with or called upon to settle any conflict of the evidence on this point.

Much of the testimony relied upon by plaintiffs is confusing and unsatisfactory; but we think the clearest is that given by the witness W. G. Pennington, and we here copy his testimony in full: "I am acquainted with the E. F. Hanks league of land. I live on some of it. I own some of the league of land. * * * I am acquainted with the strip there west of me, the whole tract. Thompson Bros. Lumber Company cut that timber. I could not say just exactly what time that timber was cut really. The best I remember it was cut either in the spring of 1907 or in the fall of 1907; that is as near as I could come at it, but I think it was in the fall of 1907. They crossed my land in the fall of the year, and they had to cross my land before they entered the land sued for. They passed my land some time between October and December. I could not say which. They built a tram. They put the tramroad there, and crossed my land. I believe it was in 1907, either in October, November, or December. They cut that timber after they cut mine. I could not say how long afterwards, but it was after they cut my timber. I don't know whether they ran a tramroad up north there, and cut some timber before they came back down there, and cut that timber west, and entered onto the Blount league. I was not working in the woods, and really don't know which tram they ran first outside of the main line. Whether they ran south of me, or north, right or left, I don't know which tram they ran first. They cut this particular timber on this 113-acre strip west of me when they ran south. It was south of the main line. They crossed my land, the south part of that tract of land. This tract in the suit is about one and a half miles west of Duccette."

On cross-examination he testified: "I do not remember when the Thompson Bros. Lumber Company tramroad crossed the Texas & New Orleans Railway. I am not sure, but I think it was in the fall of 1907. If I am correct about that time, then I am correct with reference to the date on which this timber was cut. I merely know they cut this other timber on the Hanks league. If the tramroad crossed the Texas & New Orleans Railway in 1907, as to whether I am correct, then, with reference to when the timber on the 113 acres was cut, will say that I don't know what time it was cut. I think it was cut the same year the tramroad crossed, but I don't know how long afterwards. As to whether it is a fact that the tramroad crossed there in 1906, will say that I probably might be mistaken. I don't know what year. If it did cross in 1906, then the timber was not cut in the fall of 1907, not unless they were there a year in there on that land. I wasn't in the woods, and had no occasion to be there when they were working at it. I have nothing to fix the date exactly. As to whether I mean to tell this jury I don't know when it was, and told Mr. Thomas a while ago, will say I said I thought, to the best of my knowledge, it was in the fall of 1907, or spring of 1908. I think I said I knew it was cut after they cut mine; that is what I said. They went from my land onto the 113 acres sued for. I am not positive what year. If the tramroad crossed the Texas & New Orleans in 1906, then this timber would have to have been cut along about the spring of 1907. Since I have been studying about it, I really believe it was 1907 that the tramroad crossed the Texas & New Orleans Railway. If it crossed in 1906, then the cutting was done in the fall of 1906 and the spring of 1907; if it crossed in 1907, it was done in the fall of 1907 and spring of 1908; that is my belief."

On redirect examination he testified: "It is my best recollection about it that the tramroad passed through my land October, November, or December of 1907. Since I studied about it the last two or three days, it appears to me it was in the fall of 1907. This timber that is under investigation was cut some time after that, some part of it. The balance of the Hanks survey was cut after mine was cut. They built the tramroad right off of mine onto that. Mine was cut first, and this timber was cut after that, which was cut after October, November, or December, 1907. That is my best recollection about it. I think I am correct about that, after studying over the matter thoroughly."

On recross-examination he testified: "As to what timber was cut when the tramroad crossed the Texas & New Orleans Railway track, will say they cut mine, some I had sold to S. F. Carter, the party that owned it before the Thompson Bros. Lumber Company came there. They got that by purchase from the Carters after they got mine. Mine was the first timber they cut after they crossed the Texas & New Orleans Railway track. They cut the right of way timber first. They cut this timber immediately after they got through cutting mine. That was the first cutting they done immediately after they got through cutting mine."

From the foregoing testimony it will be seen that the witness testified that according to his best recollection appellants' tramroad was constructed through his land in October, November, or December, 1907, and that the timber in question was taken after the road was built, and that after studying over the matter thoroughly he thinks he is correct in this statement. If he was correct, then the timber was taken within two years next before the filing of the suit, and the bar of the statute was not complete. It was the province of the jury to weigh his testimony and judge of its accuracy and reliability, and their verdict based upon it cannot be said to be without evidence to support it. Were we authorized, under any assignment of error properly raising the point, to consider whether the verdict and judgment are contrary to the great weight and preponderance of the testimony, we might feel constrained to hold in the affirmative; but, as before shown, the only question presented for our determination is whether there is any evidence to warrant the verdict. Believing that the verdict and judgment were supported by the evidence, we can only affirm the judgment; and it has accordingly so been affirmed.

Affirmed.

CONTINENTAL OIL & COTTON CO. v. GILLIAM.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 22, 1912. On Motion for Re-hearing, Dec. 5, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 288*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—MINORS—ASSUMED RISK.

Plaintiff, a boy 19 years of age, while endeavoring to oil certain cogs connected with a line shaft, slipped from a conveyer box, whereupon his hand was caught in the cogs and crushed. The situation was obvious, and he had oiled the machinery in the same way before, and knew that the cogs were unprotected, and that, if his hand should be caught therein, he would be injured. He had never been warned, however, of the dangers of such work, nor instructed as to a safer way to do the work, and he testified that he did not know of any safer way. Held that, since it did not appear that his mind was sufficiently developed to appreciate the risk, he did not therefore assume the risk as a matter of law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1088-1088; Dec. Dig. § 288.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 289*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Where a minor servant was injured while oiling a bearing the same as he had done many times before in the presence of defendant's superintendent, and, though the method adopted was dangerous, he had never been told of any other way, the fact that he adopted such method of his own volition did not render him negligent as a matter of law.

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1066*)—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a servant, the negligence claimed was in failing to instruct the servant as to a safe way of oiling certain machinery, and in failing to warn him of the danger of the method he adopted, an instruction that a servant could assume that the machinery, tools, and appliances with which he is called upon to work were reasonably safe, and that the business was conducted in a reasonably safe manner, that he need not exercise ordinary care to see whether this had been done, but that the master must use reasonable care to furnish a reasonably safe place in which the servant may perform the contemplated services, while erroneous as not applicable to the issues, was harmless; the jury having been otherwise fully instructed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 4220; Dec. Dig. § 1066.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 293*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INSTRUCTIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

In an action for injuries to a servant by his hand being crushed in a shaft bearing, the court charged that if plaintiff was directed to oil the bearing, and was given no directions as to how he should place himself while so doing, and it reasonably appeared to him necessary to stand on a conveyer box, and reach between the bearing and the pinion on a cooker shaft, and, if in doing so plaintiff's foot slipped and his hand was caught in the machinery and injured, and if in doing so he was not negligent, he did not assume the risk, and if in directing plaintiff to perform the service defendant was negligent, and the injury was the proximate result of such negligence, then the jury should find for plaintiff, etc. Held, that such instruction was not erroneous as in effect authorizing the jury to find that defendant was negligent in requiring plaintiff to oil the machinery, the duty he was employed to perform.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 1148-1156, 1158-1160; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

5. DAMAGES (§ 216*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for injuries to a servant, an instruction that, if the jury found for plaintiff, they should allow him such a sum as in their judgment would fairly compensate him in money for the physical and mental pain, if any, from the injuries, and if they believed the injuries were permanent, and would diminish his earning capacity in the future, then, in addition, they should allow such sum as would reasonably compensate him for the diminution, if any, in his capacity to labor and earn money consequent on such permanent injuries, if any, from the time when his disabilities of minority were removed to the end of his life. Held, that such instruction was not objectionable as authorizing the jury to calculate the amount plaintiff would lose annually during life, and allow him that sum, instead of a sum which, if paid, at once would reasonably compensate him for the injuries received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 548-555; Dec. Dig. § 216.*]

6. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—EXCESSIVENESS—PERSONAL INJURIES.

Plaintiff, 19 years of age and employed as an oiler in defendant's oil mill, lost his left hand by having it caught in the bearing of a shaft. Held, that a verdict for $8,000 was not excessive.

Appeal from District Court, Taylor County; Thomas L. Blanton, Judge.

Action by W. H. Gilliam against the Continental Oil & Cotton Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Wagstaff and Hardwicke & Hardwicke, all of Abilene, for appellant. Cunningham & Sewell, of Abilene, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. At about 5:30 o'clock of the afternoon of October 26, 1910, appellee, then 19 years of age, in an effort, in the discharge of his duty as an employé of appellant, to oil machinery in appellant's oil-mill at Abilene, had his left hand caught by parts of the machinery, and thereby so crushed and injured as to necessitate its amputation. He contended that the injury he had suffered was caused by negligence on the part of appellant, and as his damages recovered the judgment for $8,000, from which this appeal is prosecuted.

[1, 2] Appellant requested the trial court to instruct the jury to return a verdict in its favor, and complains of the refusal of the court to grant its request. It is insisted that it conclusively appeared from the testimony that the risk incurred by appellee in his effort to oil the machinery was one he had assumed, and, further, that it conclusively appeared that in making the effort as he made it he was guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the accident which occasioned the injury he sustained. From testimony in the record it appeared that in appellant's mill was a conveyer box used to carry meal. The box extended north and south, and was situated about twelve feet above the floor. It was made of boards two inches thick, and was about twelve inches wide and twelve inches deep. It was not covered. Two or three feet above and about a foot east of this box was another like it. Still further east, and at about the same height, was the "line shaft," used in operating a meal cooker situated thereunder; and still further east and about the same height was the "countershaft." On the line shaft were some uncovered cogs. At a time when the machinery was in operation appellee, for the purpose of oiling same, by means of a ladder, climbed to the top of the lower one of the two conveyer boxes, and, standing with the tips of his toes on the east side thereof, with his right arm resting on the cooker and his body against the other conveyer box, attempted, with an oil can having a spout about two feet long, held in his left hand, to oil a bearing on the countershaft. The spout of the can came in contact with and was caught by the cogs on the line shaft. As a result appellee's feet were caused to slip forward on the box he was standing on, and, as he fell or leaned east over the other box as a consequence of his feet slipping, his hand was caught and crushed by the cogs. There was nothing to prevent appellee from seeing the situation and condition of the machinery as described, and it conclusively appeared he did see same. He had oiled the machinery as many as twelve times before the time of the accident, and each time had oiled it as he was then attempting to. It may be said, therefore, to have conclusively appeared that he knew the conveyer boxes were uncovered and the cogs unprotected. It further may be said to have conclusively appeared that he knew if his hand should be caught by the cogs as they revolved he would be injured. If it had further appeared that appellee was an adult at the time of the accident, we would be of the opinion that appellant's contention that the risk he incurred was one he had assumed should be sustained. But it conclusively appeared that he was then under 21 years of age, and had never been warned of the dangers of the work he was engaged in, and had never been instructed how to avoid those dangers. Therefore, notwithstanding he knew the situation and condition of the machinery, and that, if his hand should be caught by the cogs, he would suffer injury, it cannot be said as a matter of law that he assumed the risk of the accident. That he may have known the work was dangerous was not sufficient to put him in the attitude of having assumed the risk incurred in doing it. His discretion must have been sufficiently developed to enable him to know and appreciate the nature and extent of the risk he incurred. Whether his judgment was so developed or not was a question for the jury to determine with reference to all the facts of the case, and we think the court below did not err in refusing to treat and determine it as a question of law. T. & P. Ry. Co. v. Brick, 83 Tex. 598, 20 S. W. 511. Nor do we think the court erred in refusing to instruct a verdict for appellant on the ground that it conclusively appeared that appellee was guilty of negligence which contributed to cause the accident. While there was another and safe way to oil the bearing, appellee testified he knew of no other way than the one he pursued—that he had oiled it that way before, in the presence of the superintendent of the mill, and had never been told there was another way. Whether under all the circumstances shown by the testimony he acted as a reasonably prudent person of his age should have acted we think was a question about which reasonable minds might well have differed, and that the court properly submitted it to the jury.

We think the testimony was sufficient to support the findings involved in the verdict (1) that appellant, in directing appellee to oil the machinery without first warning him of the danger he would incur and instructing him how to avoid it, was guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the accident resulting in the injury he suffered; (2) that the risk of the accident was not one appellee had assumed; and (3) that appellee was not guilty of negligence which was a proximate cause of the accident, and we find the facts so to be.

[3] The court instructed the jury as follows: "When a servant enters the employment of the master, he has the right to rely upon the assumption that the machinery, tools, and appliances with which he is called upon to work are reasonably safe, and that the business is conducted in a reasonably safe manner. The servant is not required to use ordinary care to see whether this has been done or not, but the master is required only to use ordinary care in furnishing to such servant machinery, tools, and appliances which are reasonably safe, and in furnishing such servant with a reasonably safe place in which to perform the contemplated services." The instruction is attacked as erroneous, because, it is contended, "the evidence and pleadings do not raise the question of safe machinery, tools and appliances," and because it was, it is contended, "in effect a charge to the jury that the plaintiff had a right to believe and to assume that the machinery with which he was called to work would not injure him and that it was not dangerous." We think the instruction was inapplicable to the case made by the testimony, and should not have been given. But the error, for that reason, in giving it, we think should be held to have been harmless. It was an abstract statement—whether an accurate one or not need not be determined—of rules of law inapplicable to the facts, which, in view of the other instructions given to the jury, we think could not have misled them, to the prejudice of rights of the appellant.

In his charge the trial court instructed the jury as to the meaning of the words "ordinary care," "negligence," "contributory negligence," "assumed risk," and "proximate cause," used therein, as to the duty of a master to warn and instruct a young and inexperienced servant assigned to a hazardous service, as to the duty of the servant to use care to avoid injury to himself while engaged in such service, and then further instructed them as follows:

[4] "Now if you should believe and find from the evidence that the plaintiff was employed by the defendant's superintendent, John Sorrells, in the capacity of an oiler in a mill, and that said plaintiff was directed by said John Sorrells to oil a certain bearing on what is termed the "counter-shaft" located east of what is termed the shaft on the "meal cooker," and that said plaintiff was given no directions with regard to the manner in which he should place himself when oiling said bearing, and that in performing said duty it then reasonably appeared to said plaintiff that it was necessary for him to stand upon what is known as the lower conveyer, and by reaching between a bearing and a pinion on said meal cooker shaft thus oil the said bearing on said countershaft, and that in so doing the plaintiff's foot slipped and his hand was caught in the machinery and thereby injured, and as a proximate result of such injuries the same had to be amputated, and you further believe that in so doing, if he did so, the plaintiff was not himself guilty of negligence, and that the risk incident to such accident was not assumed by plaintiff, and you should further believe that in directing the said plaintiff to perform said service the said defendant was guilty of negligence, if it were so guilty, and that the injuries, if any, of the plaintiff were the proximate result of the negligence of said defendant, then in such events you will find for the plaintiff, and in such events would allow him damages in such sum as in your judgment would reasonably and fairly compensate him in money for the physical and mental pain, if any, consequent upon his injuries received, and if from the evidence you believe from the testimony that plaintiff's injuries, if any, are permanent, and will diminish his ability to labor and earn money in the future, then, in addition to the above, allow him such a sum as will reasonably and fairly compensate him for the diminution, if any, in his capacity to labor and earn money, consequent upon such permanent injuries, if any, from September 1, 1911, the time when his disabilities of minority were removed, until the end of his life."

It is insisted that the portion of the charge copied is erroneous, "in that it authorized the jury to find defendant was negligent in requiring plaintiff to do the work of oiling the machinery, a duty which he was employed to perform and which he agreed to perform."

We do not so understand the instruction. As we understand it, the jury were not authorized to find for appellee, unless they believed that in doing the work as he attempted to do it he did not assume the risk he thereby incurred and was not himself negligent, and further believed that appellant was guilty of negligence in directing him to do same without first instructing him as "to the manner in which he should place himself when oiling said bearing." In a paragraph of the charge immediately following the one in question the jury were told: "You are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff knew, or had the same means of knowing as his employer, of the danger to which he would be exposed in performing services at said place, and further believe from the evidence that the plaintiff failed to exercise that degree of care that a man of ordinary prudence would have used under the circumstances to avoid injuries from such danger, if any, and that by reason of the omission to observe that measure of caution he was injured, he cannot recover unless you believe from the evidence that at the time plaintiff was hurt he was a young man of immature judgment and experience in such business in which he was employed, and that the perils of his undertaking were not communicated or known to him, and that, by reason of such immaturity of judgment, inexperience, and want of information as to the perils of his employment he was incapable of understanding the nature and extent of the hazards to which he was subjected, and that his employer knew or by the exercise of ordinary care should have known of these facts, then, in such events, in order to prevent a recovery, you must believe that he failed to exercise that degree of care that persons of his age, undeveloped judgment, and want of information (if his judgment were undeveloped and if he did labor under a want of information) would ordinarily use under such circumstances, and that his injuries, if any, were the proximate result of negligence of the defendant, if any. It is not merely the fact of plaintiff's minority at the time he was hurt that you relieve from the care demanded of an adult, but such immaturity of judgment, inexperience, and lack of information as has been defined to you would be necessary to relieve him from that degree of care." And in succeeding portions of the charge they were told to find for appellant if they believed appellee was himself guilty of negligence which "proximately caused or contributed to his injury," or if they believed he "assumed the risk incident to his employment," or if they believed he had been warned of the "danger of oiling said machinery in the way and manner that he attempted to oil same." At the request of appellant, the jury were further specially instructed to find for it if they believed appellee "was a minor, but knew of the danger of oiling the machinery in the way and manner he oiled it," or if they believed he "was injured in some way or manner not alleged in his petition and not testified to by him." When the instructions referred to are construed together, we do not think the jury could have understood the court to have meant that they were authorized to find appellant to have been negligent merely because they believed appellee had been required to do work he had engaged to do.

The objection to the portion of the charge in question, that it was "on the weight of the evidence, in that the effect thereof is to tell the jury that the defendant was guilty of negligence in not directing the plaintiff to oil the bearing in some other way than the way he did oil it," we think is also without merit. The theory, and only theory as we understand the charge, upon which the jury were authorized to find that appellant had been guilty of negligence, was that it directed him to oil the machinery, without discharging a duty it owed him to instruct him as "to the manner in which he should place himself" while performing the service. Plainly, so instructing the jury was not equivalent to telling them appellant was guilty of negligence in not directing appellee to oil the bearing in some way other than the way he attempted to oil it.

[5] It is next insisted that the court erred in the portion of the charge in question in his statement as to the measure of the damages recoverable by appellee—the specific complaint being that the effect of the instruction "was to authorize the jury to calculate the amount the plaintiff would lose annually for the period of his natural life, and allow him this sum of money," whereas "the rule is that plaintiff should have been allowed such sum of money as, if paid now, would reasonably and fairly compensate him for injuries received." We think the jury as reasonable men must have contemplated that the damages recoverable by appellee when lawfully ascertained would be paid, and could not have been so misled as to base their finding as to the amount thereof on any other theory. Railway Co. v. Lester, 84 S. W. 404.

[8] The verdict and judgment are attacked as excessive. There is nothing in the record indicating that the jury in determining the amount thereof may have been improperly influenced. The amount found represents, it seems, the unbiased judgment of the jury. If, therefore, we regarded the sum found by them as excessive, we would not feel warranted in setting aside their finding and substituting one of our own for it.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Motion to Correct a Finding Made, Make Other Findings, and for a Rehearing.

In the opinion is this statement: "The spout of the can came in contact with and was caught by the cogs on the line shaft; as a result appellee's feet were caused to slip forward on the box he was standing on, and as he fell or leaned east over the other box, as a consequence of his feet slipping, his hand was caught and crushed by the cogs." So far as the statement is to the effect that appellee was caused to slip on the conveyer because the spout of the oil can was caught by the cogs it is erroneous. The testimony showed, instead, that the spout was caught by the cogs because appellee slipped on the conveyer.

Of findings requested we make the following: (1) That on his application therefor the district court of Taylor county on April 6, 1911, rendered a judgment removing appellee's disabilities as a minor. (2) That appellee in the fall of 1908 and spring of 1909 worked at a packer in a gin, and in the spring of 1910 worked in the linter room of a gin, where there was machinery. (3) That appellee knew if his feet should slip into the conveyer he was standing on at the time he had his hand crushed, they would be injured by an iron shaft which revolved therein.

The correction as specified of a finding made when the record was first before us, and the additional findings now made do not, we think, furnish a reason for setting aside the judgment rendered here. Therefore, the motion for a rehearing is overruled.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 80*)—FINAL JUDGMENT.

Where the judgment, in an action where in one defendant by a cross-action sought to recover on a claim against his codefendants, failed to dispose of such defendants' cross-action, it was not a final judgment, from which he could appeal.

Appeal from District Court, Harris County; Norman G. Kittrell, Judge.

Action by D. S. Cage & Co. against L. G. Hamilton and others. From judgment for plaintiff, Hamilton appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Terry, Cavin & Mills, of Galveston, for appellant. L. B. Moody, of Houston, for appellees.

HIGGINS, J. Appellees filed suit against R. E. Grotkass, H. W. Schwartz, and L. G. Hamilton, alleging that Grotkass and Schwartz were indebted to them in the sum of $10,384.80 for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, the payment of which was secured by chattel mortgage on certain personal property not necessary here to particularly mention, and also on the entire crop of rice raised on section 121, T. & N. O. Ry. Co. survey, in Chambers county: that 350 sacks of rice raised on said premises, on October 26, 1910, were delivered to the defendant Hamilton, who was a common carrier operating a line of boats to Houston, Tex.; that said rice was delivered to Hamilton as such common carrier, to be delivered to the plaintiffs at Houston, Tex., and Hamilton accepted and promised to so deliver the same; but, instead of so doing, he retained the same in his possession and refused to deliver the same to plaintiffs. Judgment was prayed against Grotkass and Schwartz for said sum of $10,384.80, and for foreclosure of lien on all of the property covered by said mortgage, including said 350 sacks of rice. Judgment against Hamilton was sought for the possession of said 350 sacks of rice and for the sum of $200, the same being the difference between the market price thereof when delivered to Hamilton and the market price at that date; and, in the alternative, judgment was prayed against Hamilton for the sum of $1,000, the same being the market price of the rice.

Defendant Hamilton answered, denying that he was a common carrier for hire, or that said rice had been delivered to him by Grotkass and Schwartz for transportation and delivery to plaintiffs. He averred that on December 1, 1909, he was part owner of the premises described in the plaintiffs' petition, and as such part owner and as agent for the other owners he contracted and agreed with Grotkass and Schwartz, whereby the said Grotkass and Schwartz were to cultivate a rice crop upon said premises, which agreement was in writing, and a copy thereof was attached to the answer and made a part thereof. It was further alleged: "This defendant further alleges that, during the term of the aforesaid lease, he advanced to and paid out for and on behalf of his codefendants various sums of money in the total amount of $834.42, for uses and purposes necessary for the said codefendants for the proper farming and harvesting of their said rice crop, and that the said sums of money paid out and advanced as aforesaid are more specifically shown in a certain itemized statement, attached hereto, marked 'Exhibit B,' and specifically made a part hereof; that on or about October 28, 1910, the said defendants Grotkass and Schwartz delivered to this defendant 350 sacks of rice, with the distinct understanding and agreement that this said defendant was to hold the said 350 sacks of rice as security for the said advances above mentioned, which were thereafter made by this said defendant; that the market value of the said 350 sacks of rice was $803.10, and that that sum was insufficient to reimburse this defendant for the amounts advanced to his codefendants as above set out; that by reason of the above facts and circumstances there remains due to this defendant from his said codefendants, Grotkass and Schwartz, the sum of $31.32, all as more particularly made to appear in the itemized statement attached hereto and marked 'Exhibit B.' Further pleading herein, this defendant respectfully shows to the court that the said above advances made by him to his codefendants were made in the due course of relationship between them as landlord and tenant; that the said defendant herein, by reason of the aforesaid facts, hath a landlord's lien upon the said 2,250 sacks of rice now in the possession of the plaintiff herein to secure to this defendant the sum of $31.32 due him by reason of the aforesaid advances. Wherefore defendant, having fully answered herein, prays that upon a hearing hereof the plaintiff take nothing in this suit as against this defendant, and that this defendant have judgment against his said two codefendants, Grotkass and Schwartz, in the sum of $31.32, together with a foreclosure of this defendant's said landlord's lien upon the said 2,250 sacks of rice now in the plaintiff's possession. But if it be held by the court that the lien of plaintiff herein was superior to the right of this defendant to appropriate the said above-mentioned 350 sacks of rice, this defendant prays that he have judgment against said codefendants, Grotkass and Schwartz, for any and all sums or amounts of money which may be adjudged to be due by this defendant to the plaintiff herein. This defendant prays for all such other and further orders and decrees, general and special, in law and in equity, as the facts may warrant."

Supplemental pleadings filed by the parties relate to matters not material to a consideration of this appeal. Upon trial before the court, without a jury, judgment was rendered in favor of plaintiff against Grotkass and Schwartz for the sum of $5,529.04, with interest from date of judgment at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, foreclosing their chattel mortgage lien as against all of the defendants upon the 350 sacks of rice in possession of the defendant Hamilton, and an order of sale therefor directed to be issued, and, if the said 350 sacks of rice could not be found, then that the plaintiffs have judgment against the said Hamilton for the sum of $997.50, with interest from October 28, 1910, at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum, amounting in the aggregate to the sum of $1,037.40.

It will be noted, from the statement made of the pleading of the appellant, that an indebtedness is asserted by him against his codefendants, Grotkass and Schwartz, and judgment therefor is prayed, together with lien foreclosure. It will likewise be noted that the judgment in no wise disposes of this cross-action, and, since it fails to dispose of this issue, it is not a final judgment, from which an appeal could be prosecuted. It is therefore ordered that this appeal be, and the same is hereby, dismissed. Williams v. Bell, 53 Tex. Civ. App. 474, 116 S. W. 837, on rehearing; Bushong v. Alderson, 143 S. W. 200; Daugherty v. Daugherty, 145 S. W. 642.

Appeal from District Court, Tyler County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Action by Mrs. C. L. Holloway and another against H. L. Hall and others for partition. From a judgment overruling objections to the report of commissioners partitioning the land and approving the partition made by them, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Crow & Phillips, of Groveton, for appellants. Joe W. Thomas, of Woodville, for appellees.

McMEANS, J. This is the second appeal of this case. See Holloway v. Hall, 136 S. W. 488. On the former appeal it was decided on the undisputed facts that the appellants Holloway were entitled to five-eighths of the land in controversy and the appellees Kirkland to three-eighths thereof, and the judgment of the trial court was reversed, and the cause remanded, with instructions to the district court to render judgment accordingly, and to cause the land to be partitioned between the parties according to law. Upon the filing in the court below of the mandate of this court, the district court entered its decree in accordance with such instructions, and appointed commissioners of partition, ordering them "to make a fair, just, impartial, and equitable division of said tract of land in accordance with the provisions of said decree and the law—that is to say, that you are to apportion said land as above instructed, five-eighths to the plaintiffs and three-eighths to the defendants—and this you shall do equitably." The commissioners of partition, after being duly commissioned, entered upon the land, surveyed it to ascertain the exact number of acres in the tract, made partition thereof, and then made their report to the court. They reported that the tract contained 41½ acres, that the land without the improvements was of the uniform value of $7 per acre, and they apportioned to the Holloways 26 acres, and to the Kirklands 15½ acres thereof. They further reported that the defendants Kirkland occupied and had made permanent and valuable improvements on a part of the land, which they held as tenants in common with the Holloways, of the value of $200, and that in making partition they had set aside and apportioned to the Kirklands the land upon which such improvements had been erected by them. After the commissioners had made their report, and before it had been acted upon by the court, the plaintiffs Holloway filed their objections thereto, the objection in the main being, substantially, that, as the commissioners found that the improvements on the land were worth $200, this added that much to the value of the land as a whole, and that the commissioners should have considered the value of both the land and improvements in making a fair and equitable partition and not the value of the land alone. Their contention, in other words, is that they were entitled to a greater number of acres than were apportioned to them to offset the tract, made more valuable by the improvements, which was set apart to the Kirklands. In answer to this contention, the Kirklands filed a plea in which they set up that, being tenants in common with the Holloways, they entered upon the land and placed improvements thereon, and that such improvements were made in good faith, and not with the intent to embarrass their cotenants, and that the same in no way affected the rights of the Holloways, and that the latter had in no wise been prejudiced by reason of the making of said improvements, and that such improvements do not extend over, affect, or interfere with the Holloways in the use and enjoyment of the land set apart to them by the commissioners of partition; and they prayed that the report allotting to them the 15½ acres, including the value of their improvements, be confirmed. The pleadings of the parties, other than those filed subsequently to the filing of the report of the commissioners of partition, are not incorporated in the record. The court, after hearing the exceptions and objections of the plaintiffs, and the evidence adduced thereon, overruled the same, and entered judgment approving the report of the commissioners of partition, and vesting in the parties title to the land apportioned to them respectively. From this judgment the plaintiffs Holloway have appealed.

No statement of facts accompanies the record, but upon proper request the trial judge filed his findings of fact and conclusions of law, from which we copy so much as we think essential to an understanding of the grounds upon which this decision is based:

"(4) I find that on July 25, 1911, this cause being reached for trial, this court entered its judgment in obedience to said order and decree of the Court of Civil Appeals, adjudging and decreeing to Mrs. C. L. Holloway and R. R. Holloway a five-eighths of the land in controversy and to the defendants Ed Kirkland and Alta Kirkland three-eighths of said land, etc.

"(5) I find that also at the same time, to wit, July 25, 1911, this court also by its order and decree, in obedience to said order of the Court of Civil Appeals, ordered that the land in controversy be partitioned between the parties in the proportionate shares, to wit, to said plaintiffs five-eighths, and to said defendants three-eighths of the land in controversy, and this to be done equitably, and at the same time appointed E. H. Hopson, Wm. McCreedy, and T. M. Hyde as commissioners to go upon the land and partition same in accordance with this court's decree.

"(6) I find that said commissioners did enter upon said land, and, after viewing same, partitioned the land, setting apart to the plaintiffs Mrs. C. L. Holloway and R. R. Holloway 26 acres of land off the east, and to the defendants Ed Kirkland and wife, Alta Kirkland, 15½ acres of the land off the west portion of said land in controversy.

"(7) I find that the said partition by said commissioners, upon a hearing of the exceptions filed by plaintiffs thereto, is a fair, just, and equitable division of the land.

"(8) I find that the 15½ acres set apart and partitioned to said defendants, including a dwelling house, one acre of land under fence, and some other small improvements, are of the value of $200, and I find that said improvements were placed thereon by said defendants and paid for by them, and that said improvements were not placed thereon by the defendants for the purpose of embarrassing the plaintiffs or the plaintiffs' rights, and I find that said improvements do not diminish the value of the other land in controversy nor affect the property set apart to the plaintiffs.

"(9) I find that the 26 acres set apart and partitioned to the plaintiffs has no improvements thereon, and said land is unaffected by any acts of the defendants or improvements placed on the other parts of the land by the defendants.

"(10) I find that said partition by said commissioners of said land was a fair, just, and equitable division of the land in controversy and in accordance with the decree of the court, and the land set apart to the respective parties is of equal value per acre, independent of the improvements.

"(11) I find that the 15½ acres awarded to the defendants is the homestead of the defendants, and I find that by actual survey there are 41½ acres of land in controversy."

Upon the facts found the court based the following conclusions of law:

"(1) I conclude that the land in controversy is susceptible of division and partition between the parties herein.

"(2) I conclude that the commissioners fairly, justly, and equitably partitioned the land in controversy between the parties herein, and that the 15½ acres set apart to the defendants and the 26 acres set apart to the plaintiffs is a fair and equitable division between said parties, and that the said report should be in all things approved and affirmed and entered of record by the clerk of this court, and that the title to such proportional shares and the land so set apart to the respective parties be vested in them respectively.

"(3) I conclude that the improvements placed on the 15½ acres allotted to defendants properly go with the land to the defendants, being placed thereon by the defendants, not for the purpose of embarrassing plaintiffs and without prejudice or injury to plaintiffs."

[1, 2] We will not discuss appellants' assignments of error in detail. The facts, as we understand them, are simply these: The Holloways and the Kirklands were the owners, as tenants in common, of a tract of 41½ acres of land, the former owning ¾ and the latter ¼. The Kirklands, without any purpose of embarrassing their cotenants, moved upon the tract and made improvements thereon of the value of $200. The land which they thus occupied and improved was wholly within the 15½ acres set apart to them in the partition. The findings of fact of the court, which, in the absence of a statement of facts, are conclusive, are that the partition made by the commissioners was a fair, just, and equitable division of the land and in accordance with the decree of the court. The court concluded as a matter of law that the improvements placed on the 15½ acres allotted to the Kirklands, go to them with the land, having been placed thereon by them, not for the purpose of embarrassing their cotenants, and without prejudice or injury to them. That this is the law is not an open question in this state. In Whitmire v. Powell, 103 Tex. 236, 125 S. W. 889, our Supreme Court, in passing upon a similar question, says: "But as tenant in common of the tract he (Whitmire) had a right reasonably to improve it and to be reimbursed for the expense in partition, provided the improvements were not placed upon it for the purpose of embarrassing his cotenants in the assertion of their rights. A tenant in common who has improved the land, not for the purpose of embarrassing his cotenants, is entitled to have them set apart to him, providing it can be done in justice to his cotenants. If this cannot be done, then he is entitled to compensation for them in the partition." To the same effect are Burns v. Parker, 137 S. W. 707; Robinson v. McDonald, 11 Tex. 385, 62 Am. Dec. 480; Lewis v. Sellick, 69 Tex. 383, 7 S. W. 678; Johnson v. Bryan, 62 Tex. 627. We think that under the facts found by the court and under the foregoing authorities the judgment setting apart to the Kirklands the portion of the land improved by them was in all things correct.

[3] But appellants contend that there were no pleadings in the case to authorize the jury or the court to take into consideration the question of improvements made by appellees in making the partition, or in entering the decree. As we have before stated, none of the pleadings filed anterior to the filing of the report of the commissioners of partition is incorporated in the record, and we cannot say, therefore, that no such pleadings were filed. In the absence from the record of the pleadings in the case, it will be presumed, in support of the judgment, that the pleadings on file at the time of the appointment of the commissioners authorized the rendition by the court of the judgment appealed from.

[4] However that may be, we think that in view of the fact findings of the court, which are unchallenged, the justice of the case has been attained, and that the judgment should not in such case be reversed and a new trial ordered because of some informality of procedure which cannot affect the merits of the controversy or the substantial rights of the parties. We have examined all of appellants' assignments of error, and are of the opinion that none of them presents reversible error, and they are severally overruled. The judgment of the court below is affirmed.

Affirmed.

GARRISON v. STOKES et al.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Amarillo. Nov. 30, 1912.)

1. VENUE (§ 41*)—CHANGE OF VENUE—PLEA OF PRIVILEGE—EFFECT.

Where plaintiff joined as defendant a party who was clearly entitled to a change of venue to another county, and did not dismiss as to such party, the court, having no power to dismiss as against that party, properly transferred the suit as to all parties, especially where the other parties defendants had pleaded privilege to be sued in such other county.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 62, 63; Dec. Dig. § 41.*]

2. VENUE (§ 5*)—NATURE OF SUBJECT OF ACTION—ACTION RELATING TO REAL PROPERTY.

Tested by the averments of a petition to the effect that defendants contracted with plaintiff to convey to him certain lands, the breach by defendants, that defendant bank was instrumental in delaying the completion of the contract, and in causing its final breach by the other defendants, with a claim, usual in trespass to try title, of the legal and equitable ownership of the land described, and a prayer for specific performance, and, in the alternative, for title and possession, for rent, damages and costs, the suit was for specific performance of a contract to convey land, and not an action in the alternative to recover land, and, as such, required the court to sustain a defendant's plea of privilege to be sued in the county of his residence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Venue, Cent. Dig. §§ 4-11; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

Appeal from District Court, Floyd County; L. S. Kinder, Judge.

Action by J. M. Garrison against D. R. Stokes et al. From an order transferring the suit to the district court of Motley county, Texas, for trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Houghton & Hall, of Floydada, for appellant. T. T. Bouldin, of Matador, and Randolph & Randolph, of Plainview, for appellees.

PRESLER, J. This suit was filed by appellant (plaintiff below) against appellees (defendants below), alleging, in substance, that on or about the 1st day of November, A. D. 1911, appellees, D. R. Stokes, Miss Petie Stokes, and Mrs. Mary I. Stokes, entered into a contract with appellant, in which appellees agreed to convey certain lands located in Floyd county, Tex., as described in appellant's petition, alleging specifically said contract and the breach thereof by said appellees, and further alleging that appellee the First State Bank of Matador was instrumental in "procuring" said contract on the part of the other appellees by phoning to Floydada, Tex., and hindering and delaying the completion of the contract and causing the same to be finally breached by the other appellees, and sought damages against said appellee by reason thereof. Later in his petition, by general allegations, usual in an action of trespass to try title, appellant claimed to be the legal and equitable owner of the land described in the first part of his petition, prayed for specific performance of the contract of sale and judgment for his damages, and, in the alternative, prayed judgment for title and possession of the land referred to, for rent and damages and costs of suit.

[1] Appellees below filed their pleas of privilege (the First State Bank of Matador filing its plea separate from the other three named appellees), each setting up the fact that they resided in Motley county, Tex., and the First State Bank of Matador further alleging in said plea that it had no agent or local representative in Floyd county, Tex., said pleas of privilege in all respects complying with the statute, and the court, after considering the same, sustained said pleas, and ordered said suit transferred to the district court of Motley county, Tex., for trial. From this order appellant duly appeals to this court. We are of the opinion that there was no error in the action of the court complained of. It clearly appears from the record that the appellee the First State Bank of Matador resided in Motley county, Tex., and that there was no exception under the statute that would give the district court of Floyd county jurisdiction of said bank, appellant's petition clearly showing that said appellee bank owned no interest in said land, was not a party to the contract, the specific performance of which is the primary purpose of this suit, and was neither a necessary nor proper party to this suit, and the appellant having joined this appellee with the others and having failed to dismiss his suit as to said appellee who clearly had the right as against appellant to have the suit tried in the county of its residence, and the court having no authority under the statute to dismiss said suit against said appellee, appellant is in no attitude to complain of the action of the court in transferring the case as against all of the appellees to Motley county, if its action had been based upon the plea of the appellee bank alone. As stated by the court in the case of Luter v. Ihnken, 143 S. W. 676: "Both of the parties sued in this case live in Medina county, and appellant deemed it necessary to join them in his action for specific performance, and, when the plea of privilege was sustained as to one of them, it had the effect of changing the venue to Medina county. No provision is made in the law of 1907 for the dismissal as to one of the parties in whose favor the plea of privilege is granted, but the statute was passed to prevent dismissals for it is mandatory that 'the cause shall not be dismissed on that account.' The court, acting under that statute, had no right or authority to dismiss the cause as to one of the parties, and neither does it seem that he had the authority to change the venue as to one party and refuse it as to another, especially when that other does not object to such action. The law has provided for no such contingency as arises in this case, but imperatively demands that, whenever a plea of privilege to a venue is sustained, the venue must be changed."

[2] We are further of the opinion that appellant's contention that said pleas of privilege should have been overruled by the court because his action in the alternative is one to recover the land with the usual allegations and indorsements of an action of trespass to try title cannot be sustained upon the record in this case. Tested by the averments of the petition, we think that the primary and manifest purpose of the suit was to compel the appellees to specifically perform the contract to convey the land in question and to transfer a lease to certain other lands referred to. Such suit should be brought in the county of appellee's residence (Hearst v. Kuykendall, 16 Tex. 327; Mixan v. Grove, 59 Tex. 573), unless appellees had agreed in writing to perform the contract in some other county, which is not alleged. As is stated in the opinion of the court, in Cavin et al. v. Hill, 83 Tex. 76, 18 S. W. 324: "The prayer is for a judgment for the possession of the land and for a specific performance of the contract before described. It is an elementary rule of pleading that specific allegations will control those of general character. It is also well settled that if the other party pleads, even when not bound to do so, his right or title specially, he will be bound thereby, and must be confined to the proof of the facts thus specifically alleged, for the reason that he has thus notified his adversary of the exact nature and extent of his claim. It is likewise the established doctrine in this state that, under the general averments of a petition in trespass to try title, the plaintiff cannot have special equitable relief, such as the reformation of a deed, on the ground of mistake, etc., without distinctly alleging the facts upon which he relies in addition to the usual averments in a judgment." And here, as in the case above referred to, it is apparent from the petition itself that the only right or title to the land in question which appellant claims is such as he derives through the contract of sale which is made the basis of his action, and that to establish and have performed that contract is the real and sole purpose of the suit. We regard the allegations of appellant's seizure and title otherwise and of the trespass by the appellees as mere surplusage. The character of the suit is determined as a matter of law by the facts stated in the petition, and not by the indorsements thereon. Any other view of this petition would place the appellant in an inconsistent and untenable position; for, if he already owns the land in fee simple, the appellee could not be compelled in equity to specifically perform the contract for the conveyance of the land.

We are therefore of the opinion that the jurisdiction of the court cannot be maintained upon the ground that appellant's suit is one for the recovery of the land, and that the judgment appealed from should be in all things affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PHILADELPHIA UNDERWRITERS AGENCY OF FIRE ASS'N OF PHILADELPHIA v. BROWN.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 21, 1912.)

1. PLEADING (§ 360*)—MOTION TO STRIKE—DETERMINATION—TAKING ALLEGATIONS AS TRUE.

In passing upon a defense upon a motion to strike, the trial court was required to look alone to the facts alleged, and to take them as true in determining its legal sufficiency.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1129-1146; Dec. Dig. § 360.*]

2. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 8*)—SUBMISSION—POWER OF COURT TO REVOKE.

Though Sayles' Ann. Civ. St. 1897, art. 61, in the chapter relating to arbitration in general, provides that nothing therein shall be construed as affecting the right of parties to arbitrate in such way as they may select, an agreement that a majority of the jurors impaneled at the trial should return a verdict, and that the court should render the usual judgment thereon to have the force of a regular verdict and judgment, does not conclude the court, and it has power to set aside the verdict rendered and grant a new trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 113*)—DECISIONS REVIEWABLE—SETTING ASIDE JUDGMENT.

An order setting aside a judgment entered at the same term under a verdict rendered in pursuance of an agreement of the parties that a verdict might be returned by a majority of the jurors on which judgment might be entered, and granting a new trial, is not appealable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 758-785; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

4. ARBITRATION AND AWARD (§ 8*)—OUSTING JURISDICTION OF COURT.

In the absence of clear and specific averments showing that the effect of an agreement of the parties that a majority of the jurors might return a verdict, on which judgment should be entered was to oust the jurisdiction of the court, it will not be assumed that the court and jury abdicated their official position and assumed the role of private arbitrators, so as to deprive the court of jurisdiction to set aside the judgment entered, and grant a new trial, and one relying on such a state of facts as a defense must show it beyond reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Arbitration and Award, Cent. Dig. § 29; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 183*)—SUPPLEMENTARY ANSWER—PURPOSE.

Supplementary answers are permitted for the purpose of meeting matters appearing for the first time in a supplemental pleading filed by the opposite party, and facts pleaded in defense for the first time should not be incorporated in a supplemental answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 389-396; Dec. Dig. § 183.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 159*)—BEST EVIDENCE—CONTRACT OF INSURANCE—OTHER INSURANCE.

In an action on a policy of fire insurance, where defendant pleaded avoidance of the policy by breach of a provision against other insurance, the execution of other policies was only collaterally involved, and parol evidence offered not to show the contents of such policies, but that other policies had been issued, was admissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 471, 474; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

7. EVIDENCE (§ 222*)—ADMISSIONS BY PARTY INTERESTED.

In an action on a policy of insurance, defended on the ground of its avoidance by breach of a condition against other insurance, an admission by plaintiff that he had obtained other insurance was competent as original evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 788-800, 803-808; Dec. Dig. § 222.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 653*)—INCENDIARISM—EVIDENCE—MOTIVE.

In an action on a policy of fire insurance, where the evidence strongly tended to show that loss was occasioned by incendiarism committed by plaintiff or at his instance, evidence as to the existence of a mortgage on the property was admissible as tending to show a motive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1678, 1679; Dec. Dig. § 653.*]

Appeal from Wise County Court; E. M. Allison, Judge.

Action by J. B. Brown against the Philadelphia Underwriters Agency of the Fire Association of Philadelphia. From an order sustaining a motion to strike out an answer, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Carswell & Carswell, of Decatur, and Crane & Crane, of Dallas, for appellant. McMurray & Gettys, of Decatur, for appellee.

HODGES, J. This suit was instituted by the appellee against the appellant in the county court of Wise county upon two policies of insurance, one for $550 and the other for $250. By the terms of these policies the appellant insured the appellee in an amount not exceeding the sums therein stated against loss or damage by fire to a certain two-story shingle-roof store building situated in Boyd, Tex. About the 2d of December, 1900, and during the period covered by the policies, the property was totally destroyed by fire. Upon a refusal of the company to pay the amount of the insurance, the appellee instituted this suit. Appellant answered by a general demurrer and a general denial, and by special answer averred that each of the contracts sued on contained the following stipulation: "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has or shall hereafter make or procure any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." It was further alleged that plaintiff had another contract of insurance on the property in the sum of $400; that defendant was informed and believed that this other policy was issued by the Texas Fire Insurance Company of Ft. Worth; and that this insurance was issued either prior or subsequent to the issuance of the policies sued on, and for that reason the policies here involved were null and void. It was also charged that the fire originated by the act, design, or procurement of the plaintiff for the purpose of collecting the insurance. Appellee filed a supplemental petition wherein he denied generally all of the allegations contained in defendant's answer, and further pleaded a waiver by the insurance company of the provisions in the contract sued on with reference to other insurance, alleging that appellant's local agent knew of the existence of this additional insurance and consented thereto. On April 27, 1911, which appears to have been the term at which this case was tried, the appellant filed a supplemental answer wherein it alleged that on the 26th of January preceding this suit was called for trial the parties appeared and announced ready, the jury was impaneled, the evidence presented, and the argument of counsel heard, and the jury was charged and retired to consider its verdict; that, after the jurors had been deliberating for some time, they returned into open court, and reported that it was impossible to agree upon a verdict; that, the court being on the point of discharging the jury without a verdict, counsel for plaintiff and defendant then and there mutually agreed, the plaintiff being present and assenting thereto, that the jury retire and a majority bring in a verdict, by which each party would abide, and a judgment should be rendered upon the same which would be conclusive between the parties as to matters involved in that suit; that in pursuance with that agreement the jury retired, and a majority thereof brought into court a verdict for the defendant; that this verdict was received and filed, and a judgment thereon was duly entered on the minutes of the court for the defendant. It is further alleged that the judgment rendered thereon was binding upon the parties to this suit, and that the action of the court in setting aside said verdict and judgment and granting a new trial after the verdict had been returned and received and the judgment rendered and entered upon the minutes of the court, over the objection of defendant and without its consent, was coram non iudice and void. The appellee filed a motion to strike this answer out (1) because it was not a proper pleading and did not constitute a supplemental answer, it not being in reply to anything set up by plaintiff in his supplemental pleadings; and (2) because the allegations set forth in this supplemental answer were not true in fact. The motion then proceeds to set out in detail what it is claimed the facts really were. The court sustained the motion without hearing any evidence, and that ruling is assigned as error.

Appellant contends that the facts alleged in its supplemental answer, if true, constituted a common-law arbitration in which an award had been made according to the agreement of the parties; that this, having been done and entered by the court, was binding on the parties, and the court had no power to set it aside; that, by reason of that fact, the award still subsists as a final settlement of this controversy, and is now an effectual bar to a prosecution of this suit. It is not claimed that this answer sets up a statutory arbitration of the subject-matter in controversy. If it describes an arbitration at all, it is one of the parties' own selection, and one which the statute permits but does not prescribe. Revised Civil Statutes, art. 61.

[14] In passing upon this defense, the trial court was required to look alone to the facts alleged, and they should have been taken as true in determining the legal sufficiency of the answer. If in construing the averments of this answer the court was justified in concluding that it set forth an agreement between the parties at a former term of the court and at a time when it was apparent that there would be a disagreement among the jurors—that a majority of the jurors might render a verdict in the case and a judgment be entered thereon which should have the binding force of a judgment regular in all respects—he was fully warranted in his action. Conceding it to be true that such a verdict was rendered and a judgment for the defendant entered in accordance therewith, the court at the same term would have the judicial power to set that judgment aside and grant a new trial, and from such a ruling, though it may have been erroneous, there would be no appeal. The only view of the case which could deny the court that power would be one regarding the jurors and the judge as merely actors in a private arbitration, and the judgment as simply a private record of an award made. In the absence of clear and specific averments showing that such was the effect of what was done, it will not be assumed that the court and jury in the midst of a public trial abdicated their official positions and assumed the role of private arbitrators. One relying upon such a state of facts as a defense should urge it with such certainty and clearness as to leave no reasonable ground for a contrary construction. From an examination of the facts alleged in the supplemental answer, we think they might have been construed as alleging an agreement that the finding of a majority of the jurors impeached upon that occasion should return a verdict, and that the court might render the usual judgment thereon, and that such verdict and judgment should have the effect which usually attaches to verdicts and judgments in all respects regular and in conformity with law.

[5] Another reason sufficient to sustain the action of the court in striking out this supplemental answer is this: Even if the facts pleaded constituted a defense, they should have been incorporated in an amended original answer, and not in a supplemental pleading. They could only operate as a defense to the action as stated in the plaintiff's original petition, and were available, if at all, as a plea in bar to the cause of action there set forth. Supplemental answers are permitted for the purpose of meeting matter appearing for the first time in a supplemental pleading filed by the opposite party. Townes' Texas Plead. pp. 307, 308, 321; rule 8, 142 S. W. xvii. Admitting that a good defense was stated, the irregularity of its introduction justified the court in striking it from that position.

[6, 7] Upon the trial the defendant offered to prove by its witness G. P. Cooke, the agent who issued the policies sued on, that on the night of the fire he was present and heard the plaintiff make the statement that he (plaintiff) had other insurance upon this property besides the two policies sued on, and that this was the first notice that Cooke, the agent, had of such additional insurance. On cross-examination defendant himself was asked if he did not at the time of the fire have additional insurance upon this property. In both instances objections were made and sustained by the court. The grounds upon which the objections were based were that the policies of insurance were themselves the best evidence. The bills of exceptions reserved by the appellant showed that after the fire one of the policies referred to had been delivered to the company from which it emanated, and the other had been sued on and was in the possession of the district clerk, and within easy reach of the parties at the time this trial was in progress. That provision of the policies specially pleaded which provided for the avoidance of these policies in case any other insurance was held at that time or thereafter procured upon the property made the evidence of such outstanding policies material. We think the court erred in excluding the testimony offered. The existence of other insurance was only collaterally involved, and might have been proven by parol. This was not an effort to show the contents of other written policies, but merely to establish that such policies had been issued and were in existence. An admission by the plaintiff that he had this additional insurance would be original evidence. Dooley v. McEwing, 8 Tex. 307; Hoefling v. Hambleton, 84 Tex. 517, 19 S. W. 689; Oaks v. West, 64 S. W. 1033; 2 Ency. Ev. 306, and cases referred to in notes. The court erred in sustaining the objections.

[§] We think there was also error in refusing to permit the plaintiff to be interrogated on cross-examination as to the existence of a mortgage on the property. There was strong evidence upon the trial that this loss was occasioned by incendiarism, and appellant had charged in its pleadings that this was committed by the plaintiff or at his instance. The existence of any fact or condition tending to show a motive for the burning, if not otherwise objectionable, would be admissible in determining that issue.

For the errors discussed, the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

ST. LOUIS & S. F. RY. CO. v. KNOX.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Texarkana. Nov. 15, 1912. Rehearing Denied Nov. 28, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 538, 544*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—EXPERTS.

Cattlemen, who for a number of years had been engaged in shipping and marketing stock to a given point, and were acquainted with the market reports and prices at the time the shipment was made, are competent to testify as experts whether or not it was necessary to feed and water cattle at a given point, and whether depreciation in price and loss in weight was due to rough handling and delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2348, 2356; Dec. Dig. §§ 538, 544.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries to a shipment of cattle from delay, a charge that if the cattle were fed and watered at a certain point, and it was made necessary by the negligence of defendant in delaying the cattle, if it did delay them, then plaintiff, if he paid for feeding the cattle, would be entitled to recover the sum paid, is not erroneous as on the weight of the evidence in telling the jury that the delay in transportation was caused by the negligence of the defendant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

3. CARRIERS (§ 229*)—CARRIAGE OF LIVE STOCK—INJURY TO ANIMALS—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Where a common carrier of live stock delayed a shipment so as to injure them, the shipper's measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the stock at the time they arrived at the point of consignment and what would have been their market value had they arrived without delay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 930, 963, 964; Dec. Dig. § 229.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 194*)—INSTRUCTIONS—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for negligent delay in shipment of cattle, an instruction that, if there was a finding for the shipper, then the measure of his damages is the difference between the market value, if any, of the cattle at the time of arrival in the condition they were in and what would have been their market value, had there been no delay or negligence, is not erroneous as on the weight of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 413, 439-441, 446-454, 456-466; Dec. Dig. § 194.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS COVERED BY CHARGES GIVEN.

In an action against a railroad company for damages to cattle in shipment, occasioned by its negligent delay, where the court repeatedly told the jury that plaintiff could not recover anything, unless the company had been guilty of negligence, a request that the plaintiff cannot recover, unless defendant was negligent, and that such negligence was the proximate cause of the injury to the cattle, being covered by the charges given, was properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

Appeal from District Court, Jack County; J. W. Patterson, Judge.

Action by S. W. Knox against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Stark & Stark, of Jacksboro, and Andrews, Ball & Streeman, of Ft. Worth, for appellant. Sporer & McClure, of Jacksboro, for appellee.

WILLSON, C. J. January 29, 1909, appellee delivered to the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company 141 head of steers, to be transported by said company and its connecting lines from Jacksboro, Tex., to the National Stockyards in East St. Louis, Ill. Appellee accompanied the cattle, and at the time he delivered them to said railway company, in a writing separate from the bill of lading covering them, waived the requirement of the federal statute (Act June 29, 1906, c. 3594, § 1, 34 Stat. 607 [U. S. Comp. St. Supp. 1911, p. 1341]) that they should not be confined in the cars for a longer period than 28 hours without unloading, feeding, and watering them, and agreed that such time of confinement might be extended to 36 hours. The cattle left Jacksboro over said railway company's line at 4:30 p. m. of said January 29th, and reached Chickasha, where they were delivered to appellant for transportation to their destination over its line of railway, at 4:30 o'clock of the morning of January 30th. At Chickasha appellee surrendered to appellant the bill of lading issued to him by the Chicago, Rock Island & Gulf Railway Company, and the waiver referred to, and received from appellant its bill of lading covering the transportation of the cattle on to St. Louis. The cattle left Chickasha, over appellant's line of railway, at about 5:10 o'clock of said morning of January 30th, and reached Sapulpa at 3:50 o'clock of the afternoon of that day. At Sapulpa they were detained about 11 hours, during which time they were unloaded, fed, and watered. There was testimony authorizing a finding that the cattle were roughly handled at this point, and that because of negligence on the part of appellant they were delayed there longer than was necessary to comply with the requirements of the federal statute referred to. The cattle left Sapulpa at 2:30 o'clock of the morning of January 31st, were then carried to Afton, where they were detained 2½ hours, when they were carried to Monett, where they were detained 1 hour, then to Springfield, where they were detained 1 hour and 15 minutes, and then to Newberg, a point 117 miles south of St. Louis. They reached Newberg at 2:10 o'clock on the morning of February 1st, having then been confined in the cars, after leaving Sapulpa, 23 hours and 40 minutes. At Newberg, over appellee's protest, they were detained 7 hours and 20 minutes, during which time they were unloaded, fed, and watered. For the feeding and watering of the cattle at that point, appellee was compelled to pay $21. There was testimony authorizing a finding by the jury that the pens into which the cattle were unloaded at Newberg were in such a condition as to cause injury to them. The cattle left Newberg at 9:30 o'clock of the morning of February 1st, reached St. Louis at 4:30 o'clock of the afternoon of that day, and the National Stockyards in East St. Louis at 6:30 o'clock of the same afternoon. It was shown that the usual running time of trains carrying live stock between Newberg and St. Louis was from 30 to 40 miles an hour. Appellee's contention, supported, we think, by testimony, was that the delays mentioned were due to negligence on the part of appellant; that as a result thereof the cattle did not reach their destination in time to be sold on February 1st, but had to be sold on February 2d, when the market price had declined; that the market price of the cattle was injuriously affected by the condition the cattle were in on account of negligence of appellant in handling them; and that they had lost in weight, on account of such delays and rough handling, about 70 pounds each more than they otherwise would have lost. He sued for $1,465.96 as his damages, and recovered a judgment for $950.

[1] In the first 18 assignments complaint is made of the action of the court in admitting, over appellant's objection thereto on the ground, in some instances, that the witnesses had not qualified as experts, and in others that same was their opinions on mixed questions of law and fact, testimony that it was not necessary to feed and water the cattle at Newberg; that but for the delays and rough handling the cattle would have reached their destination in good condition for the market of February 1st; that on that day they could have been sold for 6 cents a pound, whereas on February 2d the market had declined, and they could be sold for only 5.54½ cents a pound; that the cattle had lost in weight about 70 pounds each more than they would have lost but for the delays and rough handling they were subjected to; that the cattle would have sold for from 25 to 45 cents a hundred pounds more than they did sell for if they had been in good condition, etc. It appeared that the witnesses who gave the testimony objected to were experienced cattlemen, and for a number of years had engaged in shipping and marketing such stock; that they accompanied the cattle while they were being transported from Jacksboro to the National Stockyards, and from inquiries made and market reports examined were acquainted with the prices of such cattle on that market at that time. We think the admission of the testimony does not furnish a reason for reversing the judgment. Railway Co. v. Allen, 117 S. W. 923; Railway Co. v. Henson, 56 Tex. Civ. App. 468, 121 S. [2] It is insisted that the trial court, in the third paragraph of his charge, told the jury that the delay in the transportation of the cattle shown to have occurred was due to negligence on the part of appellant, and that therefore that portion of the charge was erroneous because on the weight of the evidence. As we understand the language used, the court did not so instruct the jury. On the contrary, he told them appellee was not entitled to recover the sum he paid on account of the feeding and watering of the cattle at Newberg, unless such feeding and watering "was made necessary by the negligence of defendant in delaying the cattle after it received them, if it did so delay them." Said paragraph of the charge was as follows: "If you believe and find from the evidence that the cattle were fed and watered at Newberg, Missouri, and if you believe said watering and feeding was necessary, as hereinafter explained, and if you believe that said feeding and watering was made necessary by the negligence of the defendant in delaying said cattle after it received them, if it did so delay said cattle, and if you believe plaintiff paid for feeding said cattle, and if you believe it was necessary for him to pay for same under his contract, he would be entitled to recover the sum he so paid, provided you believe the sum was reasonable; or if you find it was not necessary or required to so feed and water said cattle at Newberg, and that same was done without the consent of plaintiff, and that the plaintiff was compelled to pay therefor, he would be entitled to recover therefor the reasonable value thereof."

[3, 4] The eighth paragraph of the charge also is attacked as erroneous because on the weight of the evidence, and on the ground that it "did not correctly state the law of the case." While not as clear as it should have been in the statement of the measure of the damages recoverable, we think the measure was not incorrectly stated; and certainly the instruction was not on the weight of the evidence. It was as follows: "If you find for the plaintiff by reason of injury to his cattle, then the measure of his damages is the difference between the market value, if any, of the cattle at the time they arrived at the National Stockyards in Illinois in the condition they were in and what would have been their market value at the time they should have arrived there, had there been no delay caused by the negligence of said defendant, if there was such delay and negligence, and the condition they should and would have been in had there been no such delay or negligence."

Appellant next insists that "there was no evidence that plaintiff's cattle sold for less, nor that their market value was less, when they reached their destination in the condition they were then in than it would have been had they reached the market or destination in ordinary time and condition," and complains of the action of the court in refusing to give to the jury a special charge to that effect requested by it. The testimony was that the market value of such cattle on February 1st, when the steers should have reached said National Stockyards, was 6 cents a pound, and that on February 2d, when they reached said stockyards and were sold, the market had declined to 5.54½ cents a pound. The testimony, further, was that on account of the rough handling the cattle were subjected to and the delay in transporting them each of the steers had lost 70 pounds more in weight than it otherwise would have lost.

[5] Finally, it is insisted that the court erred in refusing a charge requested by appellant as follows: "Before the plaintiff can recover in this case, you must find and believe from the evidence that the defendant was negligent in the said shipment; that the plaintiff received some injury to his cattle; that the negligence of the defendant was the proximate cause of such injury; and the evidence must show that the negligence of the defendant was the direct and proximate cause of such injury." The contention is that it was error to refuse this charge, because in his main charge the court "omitted to instruct the jury upon proximate cause." The court was careful to repeatedly tell the jury that appellee was not entitled to recover anything, unless appellant had been guilty of negligence in transporting the steers, and that he was entitled to recover, if at all, only such damages as were caused to him by appellant's negligence. We think the contention should be overruled.

There is no error in the judgment; and it is affirmed.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. v. VANCE.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas, Galveston. Oct. 29, 1912. On Motion for Rehearing. Nov. 27, 1912.)

1. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY—ACTIONS—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—NEGLIGENCE.

Evidence in an action for negligent delay in delivering a telegram held to sustain a finding of negligence in transmitting and delivering the message.

2. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 66*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY—CAUSE OF INJURY.

Evidence in an action for negligent delay in delivering a telegram announcing the probable death of plaintiff's daughter held to show that plaintiff's inability to reach his daughter's bedside before her death was proximately caused by the negligent transmission and delivery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 61-63; Dec. Dig. § 66.*]

3. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 38*)—DELAY IN DELIVERY—NEGLIGENCE—DEFENSES.

That the sender of a telegram did not advise the company that the addressee lived beyond the free delivery limits, nor offer to pay the extra charges for service, was no defense to an action for negligent delay in delivery.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1078*)—PRESENTATION BELOW—EXCEPTIONS TO PLEADING.

In absence of any ruling shown by the record upon a special exception to the answer, it will be presumed that such exception was waived, since the record must show that a ruling upon an exception was made in order to authorize the appellate court to review it.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1050*)—HARMLESS ERROR—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

Any error in admitting evidence was harmless to defendant, where a witness for defendant testified to substantially the same fact.

8. TRIAL (§ 256*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS—"ORDINARY CARE"—"REASONABLE CARE."

An instruction, in an action for negligent delay in transmission and delivery, on the measure of the telegraph company's duty in delivering, was not erroneous for requiring it to transmit in "due time (that is, such time as it would have been delivered by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in getting it through and delivered)," on the ground that it was only required to use "ordinary care," in absence of a request for a more specific charge; the terms "reasonable care" and "ordinary care" having substantially the same meaning (citing 7 Words and Phrases, 5955).

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1064*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction, in an action for negligent delay in transmitting and delivering a telegram announcing the probable death of plaintiff's daughter, that if plaintiff could, after the receipt of the message, "by the usual and regular means of travel," have reached his daughter's bedside before her death, and failed to make use of such means as he could or should have done, he could not recover, was not affirmative error.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4219, 4221-4224; Dec. Dig. § 1064.*]

10. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—MESSAGES—DELIVERY.

If the recipient's residence beyond the free delivery limits was not known to the sender of a telegram at the time of its delivery to the telegraph company's agent for transmission, the agent at the receiving office should notify the sender of such fact, so that he might have an opportunity to pay the extra charges.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 29, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

11. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 37*)—DELIVERY—BEYOND FREE DELIVERY LIMITS.

A telegraph company was not justified in abandoning all effort to deliver a telegram merely because the recipient was not found at the address stated, and his actual address was beyond the free delivery limits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 24, 29, 32; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

12. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 71*)—DAMAGES—NEGLIGENT DELIVERY.

A verdict for $947.50 for failure to promptly deliver a telegram announcing the death of plaintiff's 17 year old married daughter between whom and plaintiff the deepest affection existed was not excessive, though the daughter was unconscious from the sending of the message until she died, and could not have recognized plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. § 74; Dec. Dig. § 71.*]

13. TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES (§ 70*)—DAMAGES—MENTAL ANGUISH—DISCRETION OF JURY.

The jury has a large discretion in estimating damages to be awarded for mental anguish, as from the negligent delivery of a telegram.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Telegraphs and Telephones, Cent. Dig. §§ 72, 73; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

14. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—RECORD.

Error in admitting evidence cannot be reviewed, where there is no showing in the assignments of error that witness gave the objectionable testimony, except certain statements from the motion for a new trial.

On Motion for Rehearing.

15. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 742*)—BRIEFS—ASSIGNMENTS OF ERROR—PROPOSITION.

The office of a proposition under an assignment of error is to specifically present the question of law intended to be covered by the assignment, and the Appellate Court cannot consider any question not suggested by a proposition if the assignment is not relied on as such, nor need appellee answer such questions.

Appeal from District Court, Orange County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Action by F. Vance against the Western Union Telegraph Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Holland & Holland, of Orange, and F. J. & C. T. Duff, of Beaumont, for appellant. Bisland, Adams & Bruce, of Orange, for appellee.

REESE, J. F. Vance instituted this action against the Western Union Telegraph Company in the district court of Orange county to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the negligent failure of defendant promptly to transmit and deliver a telegraphic message sent to him at Orange by his son-in-law, Will Langston, from Cool-edge, Tex., informing him that his, plaintiff's, daughter was not expected to live, and notifying him to come to Cooledge at once. The damages were laid at $1,995. A trial with a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for plaintiff for $947.50, from which defendant prosecutes this appeal.

Will Langston, the husband of the "Ollie" named in the message, who lived at the town of Cooledge, Tex., about 12 o'clock noon on January 2, 1911, delivered to the agent of the appellant at Cooledge for transmission and delivery to appellee, who lived at Orange, Tex., the following message: "Cooledge, Texas, Jan. 2nd, 1911. F. Vance, c/o Orange Power Co., Orange, Texas. Come to Cooledge at once. Ollie is not expected to live. [Signed] Will Langston."

Appellee was the father of the said Ollie. It is not shown exactly when the message was put upon the wire at Cooledge, but, when it reached Houston, it had to be transmitted from that point to New Orleans and back to Orange on account of the wires being "grounded" between Houston and Orange. It appears from the evidence that the wire from Houston to Beaumont between Houston and Orange was grounded east of Beaumont between 4 o'clock and 6 o'clock p. m., on the 2d of January. At 4:15 p. m. and at 5 o'clock p. m. it was grounded east of the Southern Pacific depot at Beaumont and west of Beaumont. The circuit was thus cut off, and messages could not be transmitted from Houston to Orange. The wire was broken and down, caused by the cold weather. The message reached Orange at 6:10 o'clock p. m. on January 2d, and was not delivered to appellee until some time between 9 and 10 o'clock the next morning. Appellee lived in Orange at a place called the Cove, three-fourths of a mile from the telegraph office, and outside of the established free delivery limits. There was a train leaving Orange for Houston at 8:45 o'clock p. m. on January 2d, and, if appellee had received the message before 8 o'clock p. m., he could and would have, by taking this train, been able to leave Houston at 8:15 the next morning for Cooledge, and to have reached the bedside of his dying daughter between 3 and 4 o'clock p. m. the same day, and about 24 hours before her death, which occurred at 4 o'clock on January 4th. There was a train leaving Orange for Houston at 12 o'clock noon on the day the message was received, but the evidence shows that, if appellee had taken this train, he could not have left Houston or reached Cooledge any sooner than he did do by taking the train leaving Orange between 5 and 6 o'clock in the afternoon. Appellee did not take this train leaving at 12 o'clock noon; the reason being that he did not have, and was not able to procure, money sufficient to pay his expenses in time. He, in fact, reached Cooledge as soon as he could after the receipt of the message. His daughter was dead when he reached her. She was unconscious for at least 24 hours before her death, and so remained until her death.

[1, 2] We find that appellant was guilty of negligence in the transmission and delivery of the message as found by the jury, and that as a proximate consequence appellee was unable to reach the bedside of his daughter before her death, and to be with her in her last moments. The evidence is sufficient to support the verdict of the jury as to the amount of damages recovered.

By the first assignment of error appellant complains of the ruling of the court in sustaining plaintiff's special exception to the eighth paragraph of appellant's answer. It is stated in the assignment: That "said special exception and the eighth paragraph of the defendant's second amended original answer being in regard to the defendant's plea that at the time the message in question was delivered to it for transmission to the plaintiff it was given a certain address where plaintiff could be found. That said address was a place within the free delivery limits fixed by the defendant company for the city of Orange. That said address was incorrect, and that the plaintiff could not be located there, but that he was at a point outside of the free delivery limits of the city of Orange, and that the defendant was not under any duty or obligation to deliver the telegram sued on to the plaintiff at such place. That, after the defendant found that the plaintiff lived beyond the free delivery limits, it did not have opportunity and could not demand payment of the extra charges required by the rules of the company for the delivery of messages to such places, and that after it, the defendant, had delivered or attempted to deliver the message at the address given, and it found out that the plaintiff was outside of the free delivery limits of the city of Orange, that it had then discharged its contract, and was no further liable to the plaintiff."

The first and second propositions under the assignment are as follows:

"Where a message is delivered to a telegraph company for transmission at a place within the free delivery limits of the point of destination and the addressee is not found at the address given, but resides beyond the free delivery limits, before delivering the message, the company is entitled to reasonable time after ascertaining the correct address to demand its proper charge for such delivery beyond the free limits.

"It is not negligence for a telegraph company to fail in the delivery of a message where the addressee resides and is found at a different point from the address given in the message, and where a delivery at such different point is upon a different charge and for a different and greater rate from the charge for a delivery at the place addressed."

The third presents substantially the same proposition as the second.

The special exception referred to is as follows, as stated in appellant's brief: "Plaintiff excepts to said answer, the last paragraph thereof, whereby and wherein the defendant alleges that Will Langston did not advise this defendant that the plaintiff lived beyond the limits for the free delivery of such messages, and did not pay or offer or promise to pay to this defendant any sum, etc., because plaintiff's suit herein is upon a contract for the transmission and delivery of a telegraph message, and said petition contains no allegations that the defendant required or demanded any sum whatever from the sender of said message, to wit, Will Langston, for the trouble and expense, if any, in sending said message beyond the full delivery limits, if any, of the city of Orange."

[3] It will be seen that the exception was directed solely to the allegations of the answer, setting up as a defense that the sender of the message did not advise the defendant that the addressee lived beyond the free delivery limits, nor pay, nor offer to pay, the extra charges for such service. This was in fact no defense to the charge of negligence. Telegraph Co. v. Harris, 132 S. W. 878. It will be seen that the exception does not, by any means, go to the extent set out in the assignment and propositions. If it did, it would be a sufficient answer to the assignment that it is nowhere shown in the record that the court did, in fact, make the ruling complained of.

[4] It has been too often decided to require citation of authority that, in order to have the appellate court revise the ruling of the trial court in passing upon exceptions in pleadings it must be shown by some judgment or order of the court that the ruling complained of was in fact made. This is not done with regard to the error complained of in the statement. The rule would be different in case of a general demurrer which was improperly overruled. In the absence of any ruling shown by the record upon this special exception, it will be presumed that it was waived. The assignment is overruled.

[5] If there was any error in allowing appellee to testify, over appellant's objection, as set out in the second assignment of error, as to what the agent at Houston told him with regard to the time of departure of trains by which he could reach Coolege, the error was not prejudicial in view of the testimony of the witness Kossbiel, joint agent of the railroad company and appellant at Coolege, as to such fact, his testimony being, in substance, identical with what the agent at Houston told appellee. The assignment is without merit, and is overruled.

[6] The third and fourth assignments of error complain of the action of the court in overruling objections of appellant to questions propounded by appellee to certain witnesses. It does not appear anywhere in the brief, either in the bill of exceptions set out in the assignments of error, or elsewhere in the statements under the propositions, what answers the witnesses made to the questions. Obviously we cannot say that the testimony was prejudicial. It only inferentially appears from the bill of exceptions, set out in the assignments, that the witnesses answered at all. We cannot be required to examine the statement of facts to determine, first, whether the witnesses answered the questions objected to, and, second, what the testimony was. The assignments must be overruled with the several propositions thereunder.

[7] As to the fifth assignment, it is nowhere shown what the witness' testimony would have been if he had been permitted to answer the question objected to. We cannot assume that his answer would have been material, or of such a nature that its exclusion was prejudicial to appellant. The assignment is overruled.

The sixth assignment of error is without merit, and is overruled without discussion.

There is nothing in the charge referred to in the seventh assignment of error which could be construed as assuming that defendant had admitted its liability.

[8] By the eighth assignment of error appellant complains of the tenth paragraph of the court's charge, on the ground that in instructing the jury as to the measure of appellant's duty in the transmission and delivery of the message the court uses the language "due time (that is, such time as it would have been delivered by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence in getting it through and delivered)." The ground of objection is that appellant was required by law to transmit and deliver the message in such time as it could be done in the exercise of ordinary care, under all the circumstances and conditions existing at the time. We think the terms "reasonable care" and "ordinary care" have substantially the same meaning. Black v. Railway Co., 30 Neb. 197, 46 N. W. 480; Railway Co. v. Faith, 175 Ill. 58, 51 N. E. 807; 7 Words and Phrases, 5955. If it was desired that the jury be more fully instructed as to the effect of the extraordinary conditions prevailing as affecting such ordinary care, a special charge should have been requested. The court elsewhere in the charge properly defines negligence to be the want of ordinary care, and properly defines ordinary care, and in that connection instructs the jury that, if it found that defendant was not negligent in the transmission and delivery of the message, the plaintiff could not recover.

[9] It was not error prejudicial to appellant to tell the jury that if appellee could, after the receipt of the message "by the usual and regular means of travel," have reached the bedside of his daughter in time to have reached her before her death, and fails to make use of such means as he could or should have done, he could not recover, as set out in the ninth assignment. Certainly it was not affirmative error. The assignment is overruled.

The tenth, eleventh, and twelfth assignments are addressed to certain portions of the charge of the court and present no error. That portion of the charge complained of in the twelfth assignment is not susceptible of the construction sought to be given to it. The copy of the charge as given in the brief is entirely misleading. The charge, as shown by the record, instructs the jury that, under the facts indicated, the law presumes that plaintiff "suffered mental anguish and he would be entitled to damages therefor, if you should find for the plaintiff under the instructions hereinafter given you," etc. As given in the brief, this portion of the charge is so punctuated (incorrectly) as to wholly distort its meaning.

We might very well refuse to consider the thirteenth assignment for want of a sufficient statement of the evidence upon which it is predicated. The assignment complains of the refusal, upon request of appellant, to charge the jury to return a verdict for the defendant. The evidence clearly raises the issue of negligence on the part of appellant in the failure both to transmit the message to Orange, and in its delivery to appellee after its receipt by the agent there. At least four hours elapsed after the delivery of the message to the agent at Cooledge before the transmission of messages direct from Houston to Orange was interrupted by the grounding of the wires between those points, so far as is shown by the evidence. It was delivered at Cooledge about noon, and did not reach Orange until 8:10 p. m. It is true that it was found that appellee could not be found at the place which the agent at Orange took to be the "power house," and that he lived outside of the free delivery limits at a place known as the Cove, but this place was only three-fourths of a mile from the telegraph office. Admitting that on account of the 2d of January being authorized by orders of appellant to its employes to be taken as a legal holiday, on account of the 1st of January falling on a Sunday, and the change in the office hours, appellant's agent testified that he was informed before he closed the office at 7 o'clock that appellee lived in the Cove, and that he so informed the messenger boy. If inquiry had been made in that section of the town, the evidence leaves no doubt that appellee could have been very easily found, and the telegram delivered, in ample time for him to have taken the 8:45 train that night. It is true that this was outside of the free delivery limits, and, admitting that this entitled appellant to demand an additional charge for the delivery of the message, it is not shown that by the terms of the contract or by any rule of the company known to appellee or his agent, the sender, at the time, this additional charge had to be paid before delivery of the message.

[10] Nor was any such contract alleged. Telegraph Co. v. Harris, supra. Even if such contract had been alleged and proven, we think that it is the law that, if the fact of the residence of the addressee of the message beyond the free delivery limits is not shown to have been known to the sender of the message at the time of its delivery to the agent for transmission, it would be the duty of the agent at the receiving office to notify the sender of such fact so that he might have opportunity to pay the increased charge, and if there is not time to do so, in case of such a message as this, we are inclined to think that the residence of the addressee, so short a distance beyond the free delivery limits, would not excuse the agent from making any effort to deliver the message. It does not appear that the fact that appellee lived beyond such free delivery limits, in fact, had anything to do with the delay, for the messenger boy was instructed to deliver the message that night about 6:30 o'clock, before the agent left at 7 o'clock, and after the agent was informed that appellee lived at the Cove, and the next morning (but too late) the agent took steps to apprise appellee of the receipt of the message so that he might get it. The evidence, we think, was sufficient to raise the issue of negligence, and the court did not err in so holding and in refusing the requested charge. It would not have enabled appellee to reach Cooledge any sooner if he had taken the train leaving at 12 o'clock noon, as we have shown, and there was no error in refusing the requested charge referred to in the fourteenth assignment.

There was no prejudicial error in giving the charge referred to in the fifteenth assignment, nor in refusing to give the charges requested, the refusal of which is complained of by the sixteenth assignment. Whether or not the office at Orange should have been kept open, as on ordinary business days, until 8 o'clock p. m., or might have been closed at 6 o'clock, it was undisputed that it was kept open until 7 o'clock, that this message was received at 6:10, was given to the messenger boy for delivery, and that before closing and leaving the office the agent was informed that appellee lived at the Cove, and so informed the messenger boy. It does not appear that this difference in office hours, whether or not it would have excused the delay, had anything to do therewith. Appellant requested the court to charge the jury, in substance, that, if they believed that appellee lived beyond the free delivery limits in Orange, their verdict should be for defendant. We do not think this charge is a correct measure of appellant's liability under the facts of this case, and it was not error to refuse it. Telegraph Co. v. Ayres, 47 Tex. Civ. App. 557, 105 S. W. 1166. It is not shown that any effort was made to deliver the message on the evening of its receipt, further than to inquire for appellee at the ice plant, and at the light plant, where he was not known, but it is undisputed that it was known to the agent before he closed his office at 7 o'clock, in fact at 6:30, when the messenger boy returned after going to the two places referred to, and that he told the messenger boy that appellee lived at the Cove, which was not about a mile beyond the free delivery limits, as stated in appellant's brief, but only about three-quarters of a mile from the telegraph office. It does not appear but that any sort of inquiry at the Cove that evening would have disclosed the exact place where appellee could be found and resulted in prompt delivery of the message.

[11] As we have said, appellant's agent was not justified in abandoning all efforts to deliver the telegram merely because appellee was not found at the address given, and his address when learned, was found to be beyond the free delivery limits. The court did not err in refusing to give the special charge requested, as set out in the eighteenth and nineteenth assignments of error.

[12] Appellant complains that the verdict is excessive in view of the fact that appellee's daughter was unconscious from the time the message was sent until she died, and could not have recognized nor communicated with him. We do not think the assignment can be sustained. A verdict for $1,000 was allowed by the court to stand in the case of Telephone Co. v. Gehring, 137 S. W. 754, the writer dissenting, in which the facts were similar. Telegraph Co. v. Sloss, 45 Tex. Civ. App. 153, 100 S. W. 354. The deceased Mrs. Langston, although married, was a mere child of 17 years of age. There was shown to have existed the deepest affection between appellee and his children.

[13] As long as damages are allowed to be recovered for mental anguish alone in this class of cases, juries must be allowed a large latitude in estimating the damages. The assignment is overruled.

[14] What we have already said renders a discussion of the twenty-first assignment of error unnecessary, if we were required to consider it as it is presented. There is no statement showing that the witness gave the testimony objected to, save certain statements from the motion for a new trial. This is not sufficient.

We have considered all of the assignments of error and the several propositions thereunder, and have concluded that none of them presents any ground for reversing the judgment.

Finding no error in the record the judgment is affirmed.

Affirmed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

It is urged on motion for rehearing that this court erred in overruling appellant's eleventh, fifteenth, and sixteenth assignments of error. These assignments relate to the charge of the court and the refusal of special charges as to the effect of the order of appellant authorizing employes to treat January 2d, the day the message was sent, as a legal holiday, the first falling on a Sunday, and to keep the office of appellant open only from 8 o'clock to 10 o'clock a. m., and from 4 o'clock to 6 o'clock p. m. on that day. It will be seen from the opinion that the message in question was received at 6:10 p. m., when it was delivered to the messenger, and that the office at Orange was then open and remained open until 7 o'clock p. m. It was further shown, which is however not stated in the opinion, that the messenger was engaged in delivering messages at least up to 7 o'clock. The point now urged in this motion for a rehearing is that any service performed by the agent after 6 o'clock p. m. was a gratuitous service on his part which appellant was not obligated to perform, and that it is therefore not liable for any negligence of its agents in the performance of this service. The following cases are cited in the motion in support of this contention: Telegraph Co. v. Rawls, 62 S. W. 136; Telegraph Co. v. Weeks, 128 S. W. 674; Telegraph Co. v. May, 8 Tex. Civ. App. 176, 27 S. W. 760; Telegraph Co. v. Neel, 86 Tex. 368, 25 S. W. 15, 40 Am. St. Rep. 847. By referring to appellant's brief, it will be seen that none of the propositions stated under the several assignments referred to even suggest the question here presented. They refer only to the duty of the appellant to keep its office open after 6 o'clock p. m., and none of the authorities cited in the motion for rehearing are cited in the brief, nor any authorities, in fact, bearing upon this question. Of the cases cited the strongest is Telegraph Co. v. Neel, supra, which arose upon a certified question. After reviewing the cases and referring to the conflict of authorities, the Supreme Court concludes its opinion as follows: "In the application of the principles of law to new cases, we should proceed with caution, and therefore we deem it proper to say that our ruling is restricted to the question submitted. Whether the rule we have announced should be applied to other regulations by telegraph companies we leave for decision when the question may arise." The question submitted and answered can only be intelligently applied by reference to the state of facts upon which it was based, which were as follows, as correctly stated in the syllabus: "A telegram was sent from Yoakum to Cuero, Tex., July 29, 1891, at 4 o'clock a. m. The message reached Cuero at 4:50. The office hours at Cuero were from 7 a. m. to 7 p. m.

The carrier boy did not reach the office before 7 a. m., and the message was promptly delivered after the opening of the office." In the present case it appears from the undisputed evidence that the office at Orange was kept open until 7 o'clock. The message was not received until 6:10. The messenger boy was on hand, and, as stated by the agent, had other messages, some of which the agent telephoned to the addressees. In short, it appears that the office was open and the usual work of a telegraph office was being done until 7 o'clock. There is nothing to indicate that the order of the appellant with regard to office hours, differing from those on ordinary business days, on January 2d, was anything more than to authorize agents to observe these hours. The rule was for their benefit, and did not require the office to be closed, except between the hours named. In the Neel Case the messenger boy did not come to the office until the time for opening, when the message was promptly delivered. The telegraph company was without means of such delivery until the office actually opened in accordance with the established rule. The facts, we think, distinguish this case from the Neel Case and others cited, even conceding that appellee was bound by the rule authorizing employees to treat the 2d of January as a legal holiday. It is true that the evidence would have authorized a finding of negligent delay in the transmission of the message from Coolidge to Orange, but we do not think that it required such finding as a matter of law, and therefore we cannot say that the jury did not base their verdict on the negligent delay in delivering the message after it reached Orange. In such case, if this case falls under the rule laid down in the Neel Case, and is not distinguishable, some of the assignments of error referred to should have been sustained, if the question had been properly presented in the brief. But we doubt very much whether this question can be raised for the first time in a motion for a rehearing.

[15] The office of a proposition under an assignment is to specifically present the question of law intended to be embraced by the assignment, and where an assignment is not relied upon as in itself a proposition, but the pleader undertakes to state propositions thereunder, we think that this court is not authorized to consider any question not suggested by such propositions, nor is the appellee expected to make answer to them. Rule 30 (142 S. W. xii). Any other rule would not be fair to appellee, who is only required to answer the question presented by such propositions.

We conclude that the motion for rehearing should be overruled, and it is so ordered.

BLEDSON et al. v. THOMPSON BROS. LUMBER CO.

(Court of Civil Appeals of Texas. Galveston.
Nov. 15, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 12, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 278*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—SAFE PLACE TO WORK—EVIDENCE.

An employé in a sawmill handled the lever controlling rollers carrying from a saw planks as fast as sawed to an edger, and afterwards they were placed on a transfer chain and carried out into the yard. The transfer chain broke, and a coemployé, who was not able to take the planks off as fast as they came, on seeing a plank about to pass him on the rollers, seized the lever and reversed the rollers, so that they revolved toward the saw, and the plank was rapidly carried toward the saw and struck the employé, killing him. Held, that the employer was not, as a matter of law, negligent in operating the mill while the transfer chain was broken, and in failing to furnish the employé a safe place to work, but the accident was directly caused by the negligence of the coemployé in reversing the rollers.

Action by Mrs. F. A. Bledson and others against the Thompson Bros. Lumber Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

McMEANS, J. The appellee, a private corporation, was engaged in operating a sawmill, and Felix A. Bledsoe, the husband of F. A. Bledsoe and the father of the other appellants, was, on the 18th day of January, 1910, in the employment of said corporation, and on the date last named, while engaged in the services for which he was employed, received injuries which resulted in his death. This suit was instituted in the district court of Tyler county against the appellee to recover damages for the death of said Bledsoe. A trial before a jury resulted in a verdict and judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed.

The grounds of negligence charged against the appellee are substantially: (1) In operating the sawmill at a time when the transfer chains were broken; (2) in failing to furnish the deceased, Bledsoe, a safe place in which to work; and (3) in employing one Griffin, a negro boy of about the age of 18 years, whose negligence is alleged to have been the immediate cause of Bledsoe's injury, and who, it is alleged, was incompetent to perform the duties assigned to him on that occasion.

[1] The facts, as we gather them from the record, in substance are: Bledsoe was engaged in talling the saw. By this is meant that he received the planks as fast as they were sawed and placed them on the live rollers, which carried them away from the saw. The live rollers consisted of a succession of rollers, all of which revolved at the same time and in the same direction from the saw, so that planks placed upon them are carried by their action away from the saw and to the "edger." After the planks are carried through the edger, they are placed upon what is called a "transfer chain," and are carried by this chain out into the yard, where the lumber is to be stacked. When this chain becomes broken, the planks are not permitted to reach the edger, but are taken from the live rollers, in order that the latter may not become blocked by the sawed lumber. The motion of the live rollers is controlled by a lever, and by its proper use the rollers may be started and stopped, or made to revolve towards the saw. In Bledsoe's work of talling the saw, it was his duty to handle this lever, and not the duty of the person to whom was assigned the task of removing the planks from the live rollers at times when the transfer chain was broken. Griffin's usual duties consisted of talling the "trimmer," but on the occasion when the transfer chain was broken it was his duty to remove the planks from the live rollers as fast as they came from the saw. On January 18, 1910, while Bledsoe was engaged in talling the saw, the transfer chain broke, and Griffin, as was his duty, began to remove the planks from the live rollers before they reached the edger, and pile them upon the floor. He was not able, however, to take the planks off as fast as they came, and seeing a plank about to pass by him on the live rollers he negligently seized the lever and reversed the rollers, so that they revolved toward the saw, and the plank was thus carried rapidly toward the saw and toward Bledsoe, and the end of it struck Bledsoe and so injured him that he afterwards died.

It is substantially upon these facts that the appellants base the alleged negligence of appellee in operating the mill while the transfer chain was broken, and in failing to furnish the deceased a safe place in which to work. The court refused to submit these grounds of negligence to the jury, and in this, we think, there was no error. The other ground of negligence charged, viz., the negligent employment and retention of the boy, Griffin, in its service by appellee, was submitted to the jury by an appropriate charge, and by their verdict in favor of the defendant the jury must have found that there was no negligence in this regard, and the evidence in the record warranted them in so finding. We also find that the negligence, and only negligence, which proximately resulted in the injury and death of Bledsoe was that of the boy, Griffin, in reversing the lever and causing the plank to be carried by the live rollers back to and striking Bledsoe, and that the proof shows that the corporation was not negligent in failing to furnish Bledsoe a safe place in which to work, nor in operating its sawmill at a time when the transfer chain was broken.

[2, 3] We further conclude that Griffin was a fellow servant of Bledsoe, and that for an injury to the latter through the negligence of the former the appellee would not be liable in damages, unless it be further shown that Griffin was incompetent to perform the duties assigned to him, and that appellee was negligent in employing and retaining him in its service. As we have before stated, the jury upon sufficient evidence, found that appellee was not negligent in this regard, and its finding is conclusive of that question. This leaves to be settled only the question of whether the court should have submitted to the jury the issues of negligence of appellee in operating its sawmill at a time when the transfer chain was broken, and in not using ordinary care to furnish Bledsoe a safe place in which to work.

The submission of these issues was requested by appellants by several special charges, all of which the court refused to give to the jury, and in this we think there was no error. The evidence leaves us no doubt that the alleged negligence of defendant in the regards stated was remote in its relation to the injury and death of Bledsoe, and upon which no cause of action could be based.

[4, 5] But independently of all the alleged errors complained of by appellants in their brief, we think that, under the facts of this case, appellants could sustain no recovery; and therefore, if any error of procedure was committed on the trial, a reversal of the judgment would not be required. The injury to Bledsoe resulted in his death, and was directly caused by the negligence of Griffin in reversing the live rollers and thereby running a plank back and striking him. Whether or not Griffin was a fellow servant of Bledsoe is not material in this connection; for the testimony shows that Griffin was not the vice principal of appellee. All actions for injuries resulting in death must be brought under article 3017, Sayles' Civil Statutes, which reads as follows: "An action for actual damages on account of injuries causing death of any person may be brought in the following cases: 1. When the death of any person is caused by the negligence or carelessness of the proprietor, owner, charterer, (or) hirer of any railroad, steamboat, stage-coach, or other vehicle for the conveyance of goods or passengers, or by the unfitness, negligence or carelessness of their servants or agents; when the death of any person is caused by the negligence or carelessness of the receiver or receivers or other person or persons in charge or control of any railroad, their servants or agents, and the liability of receivers shall extend to cases in which the death may be caused by reason of the bad or unsafe condition of the railroad or machinery or other reason or cause by which an action may be brought for damages on account of injuries, the same as if said railroad were being operated by the railroad company. (2) When the death of any person is caused by the wrongful act, negligence, unskillfulness or default of another."

It is clear that appellants could not base their cause of action upon the first subdivision of the article; the appellee belonging to none of that class of corporations or persons to which it is applicable. It is also clear that, the cause of action being based upon the second subdivision, and the negligence which resulted in the death of Bledsoe being the negligence of Griffin, who was not a vice principal of the corporation, and as to whom the rule respondeat superior does not apply, there could be no recovery in favor of appellants, who sue as the surviving wife and children of the deceased, Bledsoe. We will not in this opinion undertake to give the reasons for this conclusion, but content ourselves with a reference to the case of Sullivan-Sandford Lumber Co. v. Cooper et al., 142 S. W. 1168, a case very similar in its facts to this, wherein Chief Justice Brown of our Supreme Court, in a well-considered opinion, goes elaborately into the subject and reaches the conclusion upon which we base our decision of this case. We have, however, examined all the assignments of error presented by appellants in their brief, and are of the opinion that none of them points out errors which require a reversal; and the judgment of the court below will be in all things affirmed.

Where a testator devised his entire estate, real and personal, to his wife for life, and directed that at her death it should all be sold and the proceeds equally divided among his children, each child while taking a vested remainder, subject to the life estate of the widow, received no title to the real and personal property of the testator as such, the direction to sell and distribute the proceeds working an equitable conversion.

2. EXECUTION (§ 45*)—INTEREST SUBJECT.

The interest of a legatee in the proceeds of property which is directed to be converted into money and distributed is not subject to levy under an ordinary execution, and a judgment against the legatee does not create any lien on his interest in the land.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Chancery Branch, First Division.

Action by John C. Miller, as administrator, etc., of Raleigh Kendall, against Lorena Kendall Cropper and another, and S. A. Gaar's executor. From a judgment for the last-named defendant on their cross-petition, the first-named defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Wm. McKee Duncan, of Louisville, for appellants. Arthur M. Wallace, of Louisville, for appellees.

SETTLE, J. Raleigh Kendall, a resident of Jefferson county, Ky., died in 1870, testate, and on February 13, 1871, his will was duly probated in the Jefferson county court.

The will is as follows: "I, Raleigh Kendall, being sound in mind at this time make this my last will for the better disposition of my property for the benefit of my family. I will all my real estate and personal property to my wife, Lucinda Kendall to have and to hold the same for her use and my minor children during her life, and after her death the whole property, real and personal is to be sold and equally divided among my children, except the house and lot on the south side of Walnut Street, between Center and Sixth Street, which I will to my youngest daughter Anna Bell Kendall for her share of my estate. I appoint my son Edward Kendall as executor for the better purpose of executing this my will."

On the same day that the will was admitted to probate, the testator's son, Edward Kendall, named in the will as executor, duly qualified as such. On June 9, 1879, Edward Kendall was by an order of the Jefferson county court removed as executor and H. S. Irvin appointed administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the testator's estate, who duly qualified as such and continued to act until May 23, 1907, when he resigned, and John C. Miller was by the same court appointed administrator de bonis non with will annexed of the estate. Edward Kendall died in 1905, intestate, survived by two children, the appellants Lorena Cropper and Lou Kendall Stevens. His mother, the widow of the testator, died in 1906. Shortly after the appointment and qualification of John C. Miller as administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of Raleigh Kendall's estate, he, in his fiduciary capacity, sold the devised real and personal estate as directed by the will and brought this action for a settlement of his accounts and for the purpose of distributing the proceeds thereof among the testator's children, according to the provisions of the will. All the devisees were made parties, as were the children of Edward Kendall, deceased.

It was alleged in the petition that the heirs at law of S. A. Gaar were setting up some sort of claim to whatever interest Edward Kendall, deceased, had he lived, would have been entitled to receive from the estate as a devisee under the will. Hence, they, together with the executor of the will of S. A. Gaar, were also made defendants and called upon to assert their alleged claim, which they did by filing an answer that was made a cross-petition against the heirs at law of Edward Kendall, the devisees under the will of Raleigh Kendall, deceased, and the administrator de bonis non with the will annexed of the estate. It was alleged in the answer and cross-petition that Edward Kendall in 1878 executed a note to one Early Smith for $600, upon which S. A. Gaar became his surety; that, when this note became due, Edward Kendall, the principal, failing to pay it, suit was brought thereon by Smith, the payee, and judgment obtained against Kendall and Gaar, the surety; that soon thereafter execution issued upon the judgment which the sheriff of Jefferson county levied upon what in the execution return was called the one-seventh undivided interest of Edward Kendall in the real estate left by his father, Raleigh Kendall, deceased, and at a sale, July 1, 1878, under the execution, of such supposed interest, S. A. Gaar became the purchaser thereof at the price of $450, for which he executed bond payable to Smith, and, in addition, paid him the residue of the judgment amounting to $383; that Smith thereupon assigned him that much of the judgment; and that subsequently, on February 27, 1885, S. A. Gaar caused the sheriff of Jefferson county to execute to him a deed conveying what was therein represented to be the one-seventh undivided interest of Edward Kendall in the real estate in question sold under the execution, and this deed was put to record in the office of the clerk of the Jefferson county court.

It was further alleged in the answer and cross-petition that S. A. Gaar, by his purchase at the execution sale and the deed subsequently executed to him by the sheriff, became the owner of Edward Kendall's interest in the real estate left by his father, Raleigh Kendall, deceased, and that the fee-simple title thereto upon the death of S. A. Gaar, passed to his children and heirs at law, which entitled them to a one-seventh part of the proceeds realized from the sale of the Raleigh Kendall lands. It was asked in the answer and cross-petition that, if the court should be of opinion that no title passed to S. A. Gaar by the execution sale and sheriff's deed, it be adjudged that a lien was acquired by virtue of the levy of the execution, which would entitle his heirs to have applied to the payment of the execution debt one-seventh of the proceeds arising from the sale of the Raleigh Kendall lands. The appellants, children of Edward Kendall, by answer to the petition of the administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of Raleigh Kendall's estate, and the cross-petition of the heirs at law and executor of S. A. Gaar, attacked the validity of the execution levy and sale, and also the deed from the sheriff to S. A. Gaar, alleging that each was void, and that no lien was acquired by virtue of the execution levy or sale upon any part of the proceeds of the real estate left by Raleigh Kendall, deceased, and asking that the sheriff's deed be canceled. To this end the answer was made a cross-petition against the executor of the will of S. A. Gaar, his heirs at law, the administrator de bonis non, with the will annexed, of Raleigh Kendall and his devisees. It was further alleged in their answer and cross-petition that Edward Kendall during his lifetime owned no interest in the real estate left by his father, Raleigh Kendall, which could be levied upon or sold under execution; that, under the will of the father, he took no interest in the real estate devised, but only a vested remainder in an undivided seventh of the proceeds thereof, the enjoyment of which was postponed by the will until the death of the testator's widow, which was fixed as the time of the sale of the real estate for a division of the proceeds among the devisees; and that the widow's death did not take place until after his death. Therefore, his interest was never such an interest as could be levied upon or sold under execution. The answer also relied upon the statute of limitations, which was pleaded in bar of the claim asserted by the Gaar heirs.

The court below overruled a demurrer filed by appellants to the answer and cross-petition of the appellees, S. A. Gaar, executors and heirs at law, and sustained a demurrer filed by the latter to the answer and cross-petition of the appellants. Appellants excepted to these rulings and refused to plead further. whereupon the court rendered judgment dismissing their cross-petition, declaring that Edward Kendall at the time of the levy of the execution in favor of Early Smith owned an undivided one-seventh interest in the real estate devised by Raleigh Kendall, subject to the widow's life estate; that S. A. Gaar, by virtue of his purchase at the execution sale, acquired a lien on such interest for what was due him of the execution debt, which entitled appellees to receive a seventh part of the proceeds of the real estate devised, and this seventh the administrator, with the will annexed, was ordered to pay them. From that judgment this appeal is prosecuted.

[1, 2] In our opinion the judgment appealed from did not properly determine the rights of the parties. The will of Raleigh Kendall devised his entire estate, real and personal, except a house and lot in the city of Louisville given his youngest daughter as her share of his estate, to his widow for life, and directed that at or after her death it should all be sold and the proceeds equally divided among the testator's children, exclusive of the youngest daughter mentioned, whose share was given her in the city house and lot. The will appointed the testator's son, Edward Kendall, executor, and by clear implication conferred on him the power to sell the devised estate for a division of the proceeds as by the will directed.

It is clear that Edward Kendall was one of the seven children to share in the proceeds of the estate devised, after the death of the testator's widow. He therefore took under the will a vested remainder, subject to the life estate of the widow, not in the real or personal estate as such, but in its proceeds: hence his right to receive his one-seventh part of the estate devised was by the will postponed until there could be a sale made of the property after the death of the widow. and, as his death occurred before that of the widow and consequently before the time when the property devised could be sold and divided, as directed by the will, his undivided one-seventh interest therein descended under the statute of descent and distribution to his two daughters, the appellants, Lorena Cropper and Lou Kendall Stevens.

It is a well-settled rule in the construction of wills that, when land is directed to be sold and turned into money, courts of equity in dealing with the subject will consider it a personality, and, to that end, treat its conversion into money as having taken place immediately following the death of the testator. An excellent illustration of our meaning may be found in the case of Hocker et al. v. Gentry et al., 3 Metc. 463, wherein it was held that, if a direction to an executor to sell land or slaves is positive, the right of the legatee will in equity be regarded as a right to money from the time of the testator's death, though the time of sale is remote, and the conversion cannot, in fact, be made until the time of sale arrives. In that case there was a devise "to the children of my said son Thomas J. Gentry the following slaves, (naming them). These slaves and their income I direct my executor to hire out until the youngest of said children attain the age of twenty one years; then I direct my executor to sell all of said slaves, and divide the proceeds equally among said children." There were four legatees, one of them being a daughter, who married after the death of the testator and died, before the youngest child attained the age of 21 years, survived by her husband. It was held that the legatees took a vested interest in the proceeds of the slaves which, in equity, was to be regarded as a right to money from the time of the testator's death, and that the husband of the legatee who died was entitled in her right to one-fourth of the proceeds, the division to take place at the time mentioned in the will at which the legatees were also entitled to the hire of the slaves.

The same doctrine was announced in Geddes v. Western Baptist Theo. Ins., 13 B. Mon. 530, the opinion declaring, in substance, that, where a will peremptorily directs the sale of land, a court of equity regards the land as converted into money even before the sale; moreover, that a gift of the proceeds of land directed to be sold is a legacy, and its transmissibility determined by the rules applicable to legacies of money or other personality. In Porter v. Porter, etc., 135 Ky. 813, 123 S. W. 302, a more recent statement of the rule referred to is to be found. In that case the testator directed in his will that at the death of his wife his land be sold and the proceeds equally divided between all of his children. By another clause of the will the executor was given power to sell the land and divide the proceeds between the children equally. The action was instituted by the children after the death of their mother to obtain a sale of the land and division of the proceeds as directed by the will. In the opinion it is said: "The doctrine that land directed to be converted into money by a testator is to be regarded as a money legacy is well established and has been long recognized by the courts of this state, subject it is true to an election by the devisees whether to treat it as realty or personality; but in the absence of an election to regard it as realty the law stamps it as a money bequest. Jarmon on Wills, 756; Arnold's Ex'rs v. Arnold's Adm'r, 11 B. Mon. 89; Williams on Executors, 767; Bowling's Heirs v. Dobyns' Adm'r's, 5 Dana, 434; Fields' Heirs v. Hallowell, 12 B. Mon. 517; Hocker et al. v. Gentry et al., 3 Metc. 473."

After commenting at length upon the case of Rawlings' Ex'r v. Landes, 2 Bush, 158, and Holeman v. Landes, 2 Bush, 158, and demonstrating their applicability to the case in hand, the court in the opinion further said: "Appellee's counsel admit the correctness of the rule above stated, but claim there has been a reconversion by the devisees; that they elected to take the land, instead of the proceeds thereof. It is true that it is a well-established rule that the devisees may elect to do so, but the facts do not support the contention of appellee's counsel in this case. The authorities seem to consider it necessary, in order to create a reconversion of property, for all the devisees to join in the election, which was not done in this case. On the contrary, this action was brought to carry out the intention of the testator by selling the land and dividing the proceeds as directed by the will. It is true Sam (Porter) received many deeds or writings from his brothers and sisters which had the effect to convey or transfer to him their interests in the land or the proceeds thereof, but this fact does not show an election to change the devise from one of personality to one of realty. Some of the heirs did not convey their interest to any one, but held it under the will until their mother's death."

The same question arose in Miller's Ex'r v. Sageser, 99 S. W. 913, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 837. F. S. Miller's will devised the 250-acre farm on which he lived to his wife for life. Another clause of the will disposed of the farm after the widow's death as follows: "After the death of my wife, I will and direct that the farm on which we reside shall be sold, and the proceeds divided among my children so as to make them all equal, and I authorize my said executor to convey the same to the purchaser." Nannie Rosa Miller, a daughter of the testator, after the death of the latter, intermarried with A. J. Sageser. She, however, died intestate while her mother, the testator's widow, was still living, but left surviving her a son and her husband. Within a few months of her death the son also died, and his death was followed by that of F. S. Miller's widow. After her death A. J. Sageser, in his own right and as administrator of his deceased wife and son, brought suit against F. S. Miller's executor and the legatees under his will for a settlement of the executor's accounts and a sale of the farm, which had been devised the testator's widow for life, and also for a judgment in his own right, or in his fiduciary capacity, for that proportion of the proceeds of the farm which would have gone to his wife had she been living at the time the suit was brought. The executor resisted the claim of Sageser, but the circuit court sustained it, and the executor appealed. On the appeal this court affirmed the judgment upon the ground that the interest of Sageser's wife in the farm referred to was, under the will of her father, an interest in the proceeds of the land, and that the land, in so far as it related to the testator's children, was, under the doctrine of equitable conversion, changed from realty to personalty at the date of the death of the testator, when the will became effective. The opinion, after citing Rawlings v. Landes, Hocker v. Gentry, supra, and numerous other authorities, closes with the following statement: "Under these authorities, there is no doubt about the principle of equitable conversion. This 250 acres of land was changed from real estate to personal property when the will of F. S. Miller became effective. At the death of her father Nannie Rosa Sageser took a vested interest in the proceeds of the home farm under her father's will, which, by the will, and under the authorities cited, was converted into personalty. When she died intestate, it passed to her surviving husband and child under the statute; and when this child died, leaving no issue, the whole of the interest passed to the appellee A. J. Sageser." The above case, and the several other authorities to which we have referred, are conclusive of the instant case, as the doctrine of equitable conversion they announce establishes beyond doubt appellants' contention, that Edward Kendall's interest in the estate devised by his father's will was not an interest in the tangible property itself, whether real or personal, but an interest in its proceeds—that is, the money for which it might be sold—and, this being so, it is equally certain that such interest was not subject to levy or sale under an execution in favor of Smith or his assignee, S. A. Gaar, the appellee's ancestor. Therefore both the levy and sale were void. Mudd v. Durham, 33 S. W. 1116, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 1202; Roberts' Ex'rs v. Brinker, 4 Dana, 570. It is also well-settled that "where land has been equitably converted into money a judgment against the beneficiary does not create any lien upon his interest in the land, nor is his interest subject to sale on execution." 7 American & English Encyclopedia of Law, 476.

[3] Whether Smith or Gaar could by attachment have subjected Edward Kendall's interest in the devised estate to the payment of the judgment obtained by Smith against him it is unnecessary to decide, as that question is not before us. Such interest cannot now be subjected to the satisfaction of the appellees' judgment, for, more than 15 years having elapsed since execution was issued upon it, it is barred by the statute of limitations.

[4] There is no merit in the estoppel pleaded by appellees. The fact that Edward Kendall made no objection to the attempted levy of the Smith execution, or the sale thereunder, or that he thereafter took no steps to have the levy and sale quashed, gave no validity to the void levy or sale; nor was there any act upon his part which can be said to have constituted an election to take his interest under the will in land, instead of its proceeds. Indeed, in view of the conclusion expressed in Porter v. Porter, supra, an election to do so could not have been made by him, without a like election on the part of the other devisees under the will. It follows from what we have said that as Edward Kendall died before there could be, under the provisions of his father's will, a sale of the property therein devised, appellants, as his only heirs at law, became at his death entitled under the statute to the undivided one-seventh interest in the proceeds of the devised estate, of which he would have been the beneficiary had he lived.

For the reasons indicated, the judgment is reversed and cause remanded, with directions to the circuit court to enter judgment in conformity to the conclusions expressed in the opinion.

CARROLL v. BOSWORTH, State Auditor.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. STATUTES (§ 107*)—TITLE OF ACT—VALIDITY.

Under Const. § 51, providing that no law shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in its title, an act entitled "An act permitting C. C. to sue the state for a fee for legal services performed" is not invalid, though it provides not only for the maintenance of the suit, but validates a contract between the plaintiff and the Attorney General providing the fee for such services, the inhibition of the statute being leveled against the inclusion in one act of unrelated matters, and not preventing the enactment under one title of several remedies which all apply to the same subject-matter.

2. STATUTES (§ 104*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION.

A special act in favor of an attorney, validating a contract made between him and the state for rendition of services, is not invalid under Const. § 59, subsec. 13, providing that the Legislature shall pass no local or special acts to legalize, except as against the commonwealth, the unlawful or unauthorized act of any officer of the same; the constitutional provision itself inferentially giving the Legislature the power to enact a local law to legalize the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 116; Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 104*)—AUDITING OF CLAIMS.

While Const. § 58, prohibits an act to audit or allow private claims against the commonwealth, a special act validating a contract made by plaintiff with the state officers, and giving him permission to sue the State Auditor, does not fall within its inhibitions, because showing on its face that the claim must be audited by the Auditor himself.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Franklin County.

Action by Charles Carroll against H. M. Bosworth, as State Auditor. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions to enter judgment for plaintiff.

D. L. Hazelrigg, of Frankfort, and T. C. Carroll, of Louisville, for appellant. Jas. Garnett, Atty. Gen., and O. S. Hogan, Asst. Atty. Gen., for appellee.

TURNER, J. During the 1904 session of the Legislature an investigation was instituted as to certain alleged overpayments to one Henry Bacon, who was at the time a contractor with the state as to a certain class of printing. Appellant was then a state senator. He was a member of that investigating committee, and, as such, became very familiar with the transactions between Bacon and the commonwealth. As a result of that investigation the Attorney General of Kentucky, N. B. Hays, thereafter determined to institute an action against Bacon and his sureties, seeking to have paid back to the state certain moneys improperly collected by Bacon. By reason of appellant's familiarity with the transactions, acquired through the legislative investigation, the Attorney General sought to employ him as an assistant in the proposed litigation; but it being the opinion of both the Attorney General and appellant at the time that, under the existing statutes, the Attorney General had no right to employ him in such way as to bind the state, and possibly for other reasons, the appellant at the time declined the employment. But subsequently some parties in Louisville sought also to employ appellant to assist the Attorney General, proposing to pay him a fee of $500 to aid in the prosecution of the suit. He accepted the employment upon condition that the Attorney General was still willing to employ him for the state, and at once notified the Attorney General of his employment by these Louisville parties, and indicated to him that he was then willing to accept an employment from the Attorney General upon behalf of the state, as had been previously proposed, and fully acquainting the Attorney General with the nature of his agreement with the Louisville parties. Shortly thereafter the suit was instituted against Bacon and his sureties, and was vigorously prosecuted, both in the circuit court and in this court; the appellant, apparently by reason of his detailed knowledge of the transactions, taking the leading part. The final judgment of the court was that the state recover of Bacon about $24,000, but released his sureties from liability. The Louisville parties paid appellant the fee which they agreed to pay him; and at the 1912 session of the Legislature the following act was passed, authorizing him to sue the state, to wit:

"An act permitting Charles Carroll to sue the state for a fee not exceeding $500.00 for legal services performed.

"Whereas, in December, 1904, the Attorney General of the state employed Charles Carroll to assist in the prosecution of a suit against Henry Bacon, accepted bidder for the second-class printing and binding for the state for two years from January, 1902, said suit being in the name of the commonwealth of Kentucky on the relation of the Attorney General against said Bacon and his sureties, and in said suit it was sought to construe the printing laws of the state, and to recover of Bacon an alleged overcharge against the state, which was paid to him by reason of his claim for said printing. Said Carroll accepted said employment, and assisted in said suit from its inception in the Franklin circuit court to its final determination in the Court of Appeals, covering a period of nearly four years, and in said litigation said Carroll assisted in the preparation of the pleadings, and took an active part in the examination of the witnesses and orally argued the case in the Franklin circuit court, and orally argued and briefed it in the Court of Appeals, which on the 20th of June, 1908, in an opinion which will be found in 111 Southwestern, beginning on page 387, reversed the judgment of the Franklin circuit court, and sustained the contention of the commonwealth and ordered judgment against Bacon for money collected from the state without warrant of law for $23,992.69 with interest from August 29, 1902, and the result of said litigation was of great benefit to the state. Said suit was prosecuted under section 340a, Kentucky Statutes, and whereas, it was agreed between the Attorney General and said Charles Carroll at the time of the employment of said Carroll that he should receive for his services in said litigation the sum of $500.00, but there being some question whether under said section 340a of Kentucky Statutes, the contract between the Attorney General and said Charles Carroll is binding upon the state, and it appearing in equity and good conscience that said Charles Carroll is entitled to the fee agreed upon between him and the Attorney General in said litigation and having rendered services to the state in same to amount greater in value than said amount of $500.00, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the General Assembly of the commonwealth of Kentucky:

"That said Charles Carroll is hereby permitted to sue the commonwealth of Kentucky in the Franklin circuit court under the style of Charles Carroll, Plaintiff, v. Henry M. Bosworth, Auditor, Defendant, in order

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes that said court may determine and allow after hearing the proof as to the value of said services a reasonable fee to said Carroll not exceeding $500.00 for his services in the above mentioned litigation, and when said judgment becomes final the Auditor is directed to issue to said Charles Carroll his warrant upon the treasurer of the state for the amount of said judgment, and said treasurer is directed to pay said warrant out of any funds in his hands not otherwise appropriated.

"Approved by the Governor, March 12, 1912." Laws 1912, c. 37.

Thereafter the appellant instituted this action in the Franklin circuit court, and, his petition having been dismissed, he appeals.

There is no doubt of the reasonableness of the fee in this case under the evidence, and it appears that the services of appellant have resulted in great benefit to the state by reason of the fact that in the action against Bacon the printing laws of the state were construed in such way as to reduce the printing expense since that time, although it appears that the judgment against Bacon has never been collected. We are therefore confronted with these questions, to wit:

(1) Was the title of the act sufficient, under the provisions of section 51 of our Constitution, to authorize the Legislature in the body of the act to validate an invalid contract between the Attorney General and appellant?

(2) Under the provisions of section 59 of the Constitution, did the Legislature have the power by special enactment to validate the invalid contract between the Attorney General and appellant, and did the act in fact have that effect?

(3) Was the effect of the legislative act to audit or allow appellant's claim against the commonwealth as is prohibited by section 58 of the Constitution?

We will discuss these questions in the order named.

[1] 1. Section 51 of the Constitution is as follows: "No law enacted by the General Assembly shall relate to more than one subject, and that shall be expressed in the title. * * * " The proper interpretation of this section has frequently been before this court. The section is in exactly the same language as section 37, art. 2, of the Constitution of 1850. In the case of Phillips v. Cov. & Cin. Bridge Co., 2 Metc. 219, this court had before it the same question which we here have, and the determination of the question in that case has been uniformly followed since. There the act was entitled "An act to amend the charter of the Covington & Cincinnati Bridge Company." Laws 1855-56, c. 185. Section 1 of the act increased the capital stock of that company to $700,000. The second section of the act authorized the company to sell, and the city of Covington to buy, $100,000 of the capital stock, and in payment thereof authorized the city to sell her bonds to that amount for that purpose. And it was urged that the act, in so far as it related to the city of Covington, was entirely foreign to the subject-matter of the title, and therefore invalid. The court in discussing the history of this constitutional provision said: "A practice had become prevalent of uniting in the same act of the Legislature subjects which had no relation to each other, and which were wholly dissimilar and unconnected. Hence it not unfrequently happened that the title of an act gave no indication whatever of some of the subjects to which its provisions related. And by permitting amendments to be made to a bill, by which distinct and unconnected matters might be introduced into and made a part of it, an improper influence was sometimes brought to aid in its final passage. To remedy this evil, the constitutional provision under consideration was adopted. Such a construction should therefore be given to it as is necessary to render it effectual in accomplishing the object for which it was designed. But it should not be so construed as to restrict legislation to such an extent as to render different acts necessary where the whole subject-matter is connected, and may be properly embraced in the same act. It is not necessary for the accomplishment of the purpose contemplated to go from one extreme to the other, nor would such a course be consistent with the intention of the framers of the Constitution. This prohibition should receive a reasonable, and not a technical construction; and, looking to the evil intended to be remedied, it should be applied to such acts of the Legislature alone as are obviously within its spirit and meaning. None of the provisions of a statute should be regarded as unconstitutional where they all relate directly or indirectly to the same subject, have a natural connection, and not foreign to the subject expressed in its title." And again in the same case the court said: "The power to sell stock to the city of Covington necessarily requires that a power should be conferred on the latter to subscribe and pay for it; for without such power the power to sell would be nugatory. The subject is the same, although it relates to a transaction to which two corporations are parties, one of whom only is named in the title of the act. If by the act a power had been conferred on the city of Covington to subscribe for the stock of any other corporation but the one named in the title of the act, then the provision would fall within the constitutional prohibition, and be clearly null and void. But as it is restricted in its operation to matters pertaining to the bridge company, and the provisions of the act, so far as they relate to the city of Covington, are apposite to the purpose which was intended to be effected by its passage, and are sufficiently indicated in its title, it is not liable to this constitutional objection. It was certainly not necessary for the Legislature to pass two separate acts to effect the object it had in view—one to enable the company to sell the stock to the city, and another to enable the city to subscribe and pay for it. The constitutional provision relied upon must receive a rational construction, and not one that would lead to such an unnecessary and absurd result.”

That is the leading case in Kentucky interpreting that provision of the Constitution, and the broad rule laid down therein has never been departed from, and has been followed and upheld in the following cases: Johnson v. Higgins, 3 Metc. 569; O'Bannon v. Railroad Co., 8 Bush, 353; McReynolds v. Smallhouse, 8 Bush, 453; Howland C. & I. Works v. Brown, 13 Bush, 685; Hoke v. Commonwealth, 79 Ky. 573; City of Covington v. Voskotter, 80 Ky. 221; Citizens' Gaslight Company v. Louisville Gaslight Company, 81 Ky. 270; Gayle v. Owen County Court, 83 Ky. 67; Wulftange v. McCollom, 83 Ky. 364; Ky. Union R. Co. v. Bourbon County, 85 Ky. 112, 2 S. W. 687, 8 Ky. Law Rep. 881; Burnside v. Lincoln County Court, 86 Ky. 426, 6 S. W. 276, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 635; Rogers v. Jacob, 88 Ky. 508, 11 S. W. 513, 11 Ky. Law Rep. 45; Board of Trustees v. Maysville, etc., R. Co., 97 Ky. 150, 30 S. W. 1, 16 Ky. Law Rep. 890; Conley v. Commonwealth, 98 Ky. 130, 32 S. W. 285, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 678; Smith v. Commonwealth, 8 Bush, 112; Bierley v. T. P. Co., 29 S. W. 874, 17 Ky. Law Rep. 36; White v. Commonwealth, 50 S. W. 678, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 1944; Henderson Bridge Co. v. Alves, 122 Ky. 46, 90 S. W. 995, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 996. In this case the title to the act indicates that the General Assembly is dealing with the general subject of authorizing appellant to sue the state for a fee which he claims against it, and there is in the body of the act not only an authority to sue, but in addition thereto a provision directing the court in which he is authorized to enter suit to ascertain merely the amount of the claim, not to exceed $500, and to render judgment therefor; and a further provision directing the Auditor upon the rendition of the judgment to issue his warrant. The act throughout is dealing with the single subject of permitting appellant to get from the commonwealth a fee to which in justice he is entitled, and the mere fact that the act in addition to authorizing him to sue went further and validated an incomplete contract between him and the state is not in violation of either the letter or spirit of section 51. It is merely dealing with two aspects of the same general subject, namely, the authority to sue, and the validating of a contract which is an incident to the authority to sue.

We cannot assume that the Legislature meant to do a vain thing, viz., to authorize appellant to sue the state on a contract which was by all the parties connected with it recognized as invalid, unless at the same time it took some action to validate the incomplete contract. The enforcement of the invalid contract between appellant and the commonwealth was the subject of that act; and it was permissible for the Legislature, under the general title, to deal with all phases of it.

[2] 2. Section 59 of the Constitution provides: “The General Assembly shall not pass local or special acts concerning any of the following subjects, or for any of the following purposes, namely: * * * Subsec. 13. To legalize, except as against the commonwealth, the unauthorized or invalid act of any officer or public agent of the commonwealth. * * *” We have here by inference express authority for the Legislature to legalize or validate as against the commonwealth the unauthorized or invalid acts of its officers or agents; and the act in this case, taken and read as a whole, cannot be interpreted in any other way than to legalize the unauthorized contract between the Attorney General and appellant. The preamble of the act refers to the circumstances under which the agreement between the Attorney General and appellant was made, and also to the fact that under the then existing statutes there was a doubt as to whether it was binding upon the state; and in the body of the act the court in which appellant is authorized to sue is left only the duty of hearing proof as to the value of his services, and it is in effect directed to render judgment for a reasonable fee, not to exceed $500. There can be no doubt of the legislative purpose to legalize the contract between the Attorney General and appellant so as to allow him to recover against the commonwealth.

[3] 3. The claim that this act undertakes to audit or allow a private claim against the commonwealth, which is prohibited by section 58 of the Constitution, cannot be maintained. As we have said, the purpose of the act was to permit appellant to sue the state and to validate his incomplete contract with the Attorney General; and the act on its face shows that, after the allowance of the fee by the circuit court, the same was to be audited and warrant issued by the Auditor.

The judgment is reversed, with directions to enter a judgment for appellant in the sum of $500, with interest from the date of the judgment.

VIOLET v. PURDY et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

DEEDS (§ 125*) — CONSTRUCTION — ESTATES CREATED — REMAINDER — CONDITIONAL LIMITATIONS.

Grantees under a deed conveying real property to them and their heirs forever, subject to a life estate reserved by the grantor, and providing that, on the death of either without bodily heirs or issue, her share should become the absolute property of the survivor, took a remainder subject to defeasance upon their death within the lifetime of the grantor, but, on surviving the grantor, the defeasible estate ripened into a fee simple.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Action between Lige Violet and Edna Daniel Purdy and others. Judgment for Edna Daniel Purdy and others, and Violet appeals. Affirmed.

S. A. Russell, of Lebanon, for appellant. William W. Spalding, of Lebanon, for appellees.

NUNN, J. The question involved upon this appeal is: What character of estate did appellees receive under the following deed: "This deed made out and entered into by and between R. C. Daniel of Marion county, Kentucky, party of the first part, and Miss Edna Daniel and Mrs. Setta Putnam of the same county and state, parties of the second part, witnesseth: That for and in consideration of one dollar, cash in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, and the further consideration of the natural love and affection I, R. C. Daniel, bear for the second parties, my granddaughters, the party of the first part, said R. C. Daniel, by these presents sells, aliens and conveys unto the said Edna Daniels and Mrs. Setta Putnam the following real estate, to wit: [Here follows description.] To have and to hold unto said parties of the second part and their bodily heirs, forever, with covenant of general warranty. This conveyance is subject to the following stipulation and conditions: First, the first party, R. C. Daniel, reserves in said property a life estate and the use, management, control and products of said land so long as he lives. Possession to be surrendered to second party at the death of the first party. Secondly, should either of the second parties die without leaving bodily heirs or issue, then in such event the share of the one so dying shall pass to and become the absolute property of the survivor. Said second parties are hereby vested with title to said property jointly and equally. Thirdly, should both the second parties die without bodily heirs or issue, in such event said property shall pass to and become the property of my grandson R. M. Bannister and his bodily heirs; and if said Bannister shall be dead on the happening of such contingency, then said property shall pass to and vest in his said R. M. Bannister's bodily heirs or issue of his body," etc.

It will be observed that appellees alone were named as the second parties in the caption and granting clause, but the habendum clause is restricted by the following conditions: First, the grantor reserved a life estate and the management, use, control, and products of the land so long as he lived; second, he provides that, if "either of the second parties should die without leaving bodily heirs or issue, then in such event the share of the one so dying shall pass to and become the absolute property of the survivor"; third, he provides that, in case both the second parties should die without issue, then the property should go to his grandson, R. M. Bannister, etc. The real and only question is: What did the grantor mean by the expression "should both the second parties die without leaving bodily heirs or issue," as used in the third condition referred to? Did the grantor have reference to them dying during his lifetime, or did he mean, if they should die at any time without bodily heirs or issue, the property should pass to his grandson, R. M. Bannister, or to his bodily heirs or issue if he be dead? In the case of Gibson v. Thompson, 83 S. W. 138, 26 Ky. Law Rep. 1065, this court conclusively settled this question in construing the deed under consideration therein. The part of the deed construed in that case, as copied in the opinion, is as follows: "And it is distinctly understood that she reserves to herself a life estate in both aforesaid tracts of land. To have and to hold said undivided two-thirds (that is to say, the undivided one-third to each of them) to the said William Gibson and the said Fanny Goodwin and their heirs and assigns forever after the death of the party of the first part, and not before, it is hereby understood that in the event that the said Fanny Goodwin, her said granddaughter, dies without children, then the said interest of said Fanny Goodwin shall vest in the survivors, that is to say, one-half of the undivided one-third of said tracts of land hereby conveyed to said Fanny Goodwin shall vest in said William Gibson and his heirs and the other half of said one-third shall vest in my grandchildren, Fanny Gaines and Bernard Gaines, and their heirs." The question in that case was whether the grantor in referring to Fanny Goodwin's death meant her death at any time or within the lifetime of the grantor, and the court said: "The rule is that if a vested remainder be limited by deed or will on a particular estate, with the condition that, if the remainderman die without heirs (or other words of like import), then his estate shall vest in a third person or class, such remainderman takes a defeasible fee, conditioned upon his dying without heirs during the continuance of the particular estate; and, after the falling in of the latter, he surviving, his defeasible fee ripens into a fee-simple title." Fanny Goodwin did not die without heirs during the life of her grandmother, the grantor, and upon the death of her grandmother that which had been a defeasible fee in Fanny Goodwin ripened into a fee-simple title, and in support of this conclusion the court cited a dozen or more cases. That case is a facsimile of the case at bar.

Appellees survived their grandfather, the grantor, and their title, which was a defeasible fee so long as he lived, ripened into a fee simple upon his death. Therefore their sale and conveyance to appellant of the land conveyed to them by the deed of their grandfather passed to appellant a fee-simple title, and the lower court did not err in so adjudging.

Judgment affirmed.

MARPLE v. BANISTER et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County. Action between J. M. Marple and R. M. Banister and another. From a judgment for the latter, the former appeals. Affirmed.

H. W. Rives, of Lebanon, for appellant. H. S. McElroy and W. W. Spalding, both of Lebanon, for appellees.

TURNER, J. In the case of Violet v. Purdy, etc., 151 S. W. 920, in an opinion this day rendered by Judge Nunn, the precise question involved in this appeal is determined. The two appeals are from the same court, and the deed construed in that opinion is a companion one to the deed involved herein, having been made by the same grantor, at the same time, and in each case made by him to his grandchildren. For the reasons given therein, the appellee Banister took a defeasible fee under the deed from his grandfather, which upon the death of the grandfather ripened into a fee simple; and therefore he had a good title to the land involved, and appellant should be required to accept the deed tendered therefor.

Judgment affirmed.

ANDONIQUE v. CARMEN.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 17, 1912.)

1. PROCESS (§ 58*)—SERVICE-AGENCY—"ENGAGED IN BUSINESS IN THE STATE."

A nonresident owner of real estate in a city, who employs a resident as agent in charge of the property to rent the same and collect rents, is engaged in the business in the state of renting real estate within Civ. Code Prac. § 51, subsec. 6, providing that, in actions against a nonresident engaged in business in the state, the summons may be served on the agent, and in an action against her for damages to a tenant by defects in the premises process is properly served on the agent.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 204*)—RULINGS ON EVIDENCE—PARTY ENTITLED TO COMPLAIN.

A party who, on the cross-examination of a witness, brings out incompetent testimony, and who does not object or except to it nor move to exclude it, may not complain on appeal of the admission of the testimony.

3. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 169*)—INJURY TO TENANT—MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction in an action against a landlord for injuries to a tenant by defects in the premises that if the landlord or her agent "had actual knowledge or such notice as would cause a reasonable person to act upon it of the defective condition" of the premises, and concealed the defective condition from the tenant, the tenant could recover, was misleading, as imposing on the landlord the duty of exercising ordinary care to discover defects.

4. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES TO TENANT—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

Where a landlord or his agent is notified that the premises are in a dangerous condition, and the notice is sufficient to apprise a person of ordinary prudence that the premises are in a dangerous condition, such notice will be deemed knowledge rendering the landlord liable for injuries to a tenant from whom the condition of the premises is concealed.

5. LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 164*)—INJURIES TO TENANT—LIABILITY OF LANDLORD.

A tenant who knows of the defective condition of the premises, or who may have known thereof by a reasonable inspection, may not recover from the landlord for injuries sustained in consequence thereof, since the liability of the landlord rests on the element of deceit.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jefferson County, Common Pleas Branch, Second Division.

Action by Ida Carmen against Annie L. Andonique. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

Burwell K. Marshall and John L. Woodbury, both of Louisville, for appellant. Flexner & Gordon and J. L. Richardson, all of Louisville, for appellee.

CLAY, C. Plaintiff, Ida Carmen, fell into a privy on premises which she rented from defendant, Annie L. Andonique, and was injured. She brought this action against defendants, Annie L. Andonique and the Fidelity Trust Company, to recover damages.

The cause of action is predicated on the fact that the flooring, sills, and platform of the privy gave away by reason of their dangerous and defective condition, and precipitated her into the vault; that she did not know of such dangerous and defective condition, and could not have discovered same by the exercise of ordinary care; that such dangerous and defective condition was known to the defendant and her agent, the Fidelity Trust Company, and its servants, agents, officers, and employes, prior to the time plaintiff leased the premises; and that they concealed such dangerous and defective condition from her. At the time the action was instituted Annie L. Andonique was a non-resident, and process was served on the Fidelity Trust Company, which company it is conceded was defendant's agent for the purpose of leasing the property, collecting the rents, and looking after the property. The defendant Annie L. Andonique, without entering her appearance to the action, moved to quash the service of summons on the ground that the Fidelity Trust Company was not her agent for the service of process, but was only her agent for the purpose of renting out and taking charge of the real estate owned by her in the city of Louisville. At the same time she filed a special demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court. Both the motion to quash and the special demurrer were overruled. The action was dismissed as to the Fidelity Trust Company. The defendant Annie L. Andonique filed an answer, denying the allegations of the petition, and pleading contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. The plea of contributory negligence was denied by reply. Trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and judgment in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $1,999.99. Defendant appeals.

The property in question is a small cottage, and is located at the southwest corner of Twentieth and Chestnut streets in the city of Louisville. The defendant, Annie L. Andonique, lived in St. Louis. The Fidelity Trust Company was her agent in charge of her property, and as such agent rented the property to the plaintiff by written lease dated January 23, 1910. The privy is located at the extreme rear of the property. The accident occurred on July 19, 1910. Plaintiff testifies that she had no knowledge, either at the time the lease was executed or at the time of the accident, of the dangerous and defective condition of the privy, and that there was nothing in the appearance of the privy to indicate that it might be dangerous or defective. The wood underneath the floor was decayed, but this condition was not apparent from an inspection of the floor. This condition was concealed from her. On the day of the accident she went into the closet, and the whole floor gave away, precipitating her into the vault. She fell a distance of 12 or 14 feet into the fecal matter. It got all over her clothing and person. She remained in the vault about 20 or 30 minutes, when she was rescued by one of the men connected with the fire department. Her left arm and right side were injured, and her eyes were affected for a while. The principal injury was to her spine and head. Since the injury she has been unable to do her household work. After the accident the joist, or sleeper, was brought to her, and it was decayed. There was nothing in the looks of the flooring to indicate that there was any danger there. Daniel Leahan, a member of the fire department, testified that he rescued plaintiff from the vault in question. The vault had caved in from what he judged to be rotten joists. Dr. Robert E. Gatz testified to the extent of her injuries, and gave it as his opinion that the injury to her spine was permanent. Mrs. Maggie Carmen, a sister-in-law of plaintiff, and Mamie Mitchell, a domestic, testified to plaintiff's suffering and her inability to do her household work after the injury. Emmett B. Jeffries testified that he occupied the premises in question during the year 1908, and during the year 1909 up until a day or two before Christmas. He says that prior to the time he left the premises he complained to the employes of the Trust Company that the privy was dangerous. The person he made the complaint to was Kinser, the collector. Thereafter he made a second complaint of the dangerous condition of the privy. On cross-examination he stated that the privy needed everything new. It was all rotted down, and there was no top on it, and the sides were all off. He told the man at the Trust Company that the privy was liable to fall in and cause trouble. Upon being asked if anybody had gone there if the condition was such that they could have seen it, he replied: "Anybody that didn't understand it would not, I reckon." On re-direct examination he testified that there was no evidence on the top covering of the vault to indicate that it was rotten underneath, but that the shaky condition was what alarmed him. Plaintiff was then recalled, and testified that none of the officers or agents of the Fidelity Trust Company ever informed her of the dangerous condition of the privy. On cross-examination she was asked how she got into communication with Mr. Jeffries. She replied that one of the young gentlemen who collected the rent for the Fidelity Trust Company came to her house just after she got hurt and said: "Mr. Jeffries told me yesterday: 'I told you some one was going to get hurt there.'" The young man who made this statement was not Mr. Kinser, but was the boy who collected for him.

For the defendant, D. F. Murphy, the manager of the real estate department of the Fidelity Trust Company, William Newhall, the assistant manager, William H. Wiser, who had charge of the repairs for that company, and N. R. Kinser, the collector, all testified either that no complaint was made to them of the dangerous condition of the vault in question, or that they had no recollection of a complaint being made. They further testified that all complaints for necessary repairs were registered by the company and immediately acted upon. Had a complaint been made, it would have been attended to promptly. J. H. Miller, a carpenter, who was sent to examine the privy just after the accident, testified that the flooring was sound, but the joists underneath the floor were decayed.

[1] The first question to be determined is: Was the defendant properly before the court? Subsection 6 of section 51, Civil Code, provides: "In actions against an individual residing in another state, * * * engaged in business in this state, the summons may be served on the manager or agent of or person in charge of said business in this state, in the county where the business is carried on or in the county where the cause of action accrues." In the case of Nelson, Morris & Co. v. Rehkopf & Sons, 75 S. W. 203, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 352, it was held that where the defendants, Nelson, Morris & Co., nonresidents, had, through an agent at Paducah, made a sale of certain goods, wares, and merchandise, there being only one transaction, the service upon their agent was authorized under the provision of the Code, supra, and such service brought the defendants personally before the court. In the case of Commonwealth v. Bullock, 58 S. W. 429, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 528, the defendants were residents of the state of Ohio, and were indicted in the Kenton circuit court for maintaining a nuisance by renting and leasing certain property for improper purposes. Summons was served on their agent in charge of the property. This court held that the defendants were engaged in business in this state within the contemplation of the code provision, and that the service upon their agent in charge of the property was sufficient.

In this case the defendant lives in St. Louis. She owned the property in question and other property in the city of Louisville. The Fidelity Trust Company, as her agent, has charge of the property, and rents it, and collects the rents as they accrue. The defendant being engaged in the business of renting real estate in this state, and the cause of action growing out of the dangerous and defective condition of property thus rented, we conclude that she was engaged in business in this state within the meaning of the code provision, and that service of process on her agent, the Fidelity Trust Company, was sufficient to bring her before the court. It follows that the trial court did not err in overruling the special demurrer to the jurisdiction of the court, and the motion to quash the process.

[2] It is next insisted that the court erred in permitting plaintiff to testify to the statement made by the collector for the Trust Company to the effect that "Mr. Jeffries told me yesterday: 'I told you some one was going to get hurt there.'" This evidence was not an admission of the fact that Jeffries told the collector that some one was going to get hurt there. It was simply the statement of the collector that Jeffries said that he had told him that some one was going to get hurt there. While this evidence was not admissible, it appears that it was brought out by defendant on cross-examination, and was not objected or excepted to, nor did defendant move to exclude the evidence from the jury. Under these circumstances, defendant cannot complain of the fact that the evidence was improperly admitted.

[3] At the conclusion of the evidence, the defendant requested the court to give the following instruction: "Unless the jury shall believe from the evidence that at the time the premises were rented to the plaintiff that the defendant, the landlord, had actual knowledge of the defective condition of the floor, or seat or timbers supporting them, of the privy on said premises, and having such knowledge concealed said defective condition from the tenant, the plaintiff herein, the law is for the defendant, and the jury should so find." This instruction was refused, and the court, in addition to an instruction on the measure of damages, gave the following instruction: "If you believe from the evidence that at the time the premises were rented to the plaintiff that the defendant, the landlord or her agent, the Fidelity Trust Company, had actual knowledge (or such notice as would cause a reasonable person to act upon it), of the defective condition of the floor, or seat, or timbers supporting them, of the privy on the premises in regard to which you have heard testimony and having such notice or knowledge concealed said defective condition from the tenant, the plaintiff herein, the law of the case is for the plaintiff and you will so find. But, unless you believe from the evidence that at the time the premises were rented to the plaintiff the defendant, the landlord, or her agent, the Fidelity Trust Company, had actual knowledge or such notice as would cause a reasonable person to act upon it of the defective condition of the floor, or seat, or timbers supporting them, of the privy on said premises, and having such notice or knowledge concealed said defective condition from the tenant, the plaintiff herein, the law of the case is for the defendant, and you should so find." The first complaint of the instructions is the insertion of the words, "or such notice as would cause a reasonable person to act upon it." In this connection it is earnestly insisted that, under the rule laid down in Franklin v. Tracy, 117 Ky. 267, 77 S. W. 1113, 78 S. W. 1112, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1409, 1909, 63 L. R. A. 649, and the cases therein cited, the landlord is under no obligation to exercise ordinary diligence to discover defects in the premises which he lets, and in no event can he be held liable unless he has knowledge of the defective condition, and conceals it from the tenant, and that the words complained of, fairly construed, impose upon the defendant the duty of exercising ordinary diligence to discover defects in the premises. On the other hand, counsel for plaintiff insist that notice should be regarded as knowledge, and that the words, "or such notice as would cause a reasonable person to act upon it," refer to action on the part of the defendant in giving to the plaintiff the information brought home to her by such notice. In view of the fact that the words complained of are of doubtful meaning, and are fairly susceptible of the construction that it was the duty of the defendant to act upon the notice received by making an inspection of the premises, we conclude that they are misleading, and should not have been incorporated in the instruction.

[4] We do not mean to hold, however, that the knowledge of the landlord must be limited to such knowledge as he acquires by the use of his senses alone. On the contrary, if the landlord or his agent is notified that the premises are in a dangerous condition, and the notice which he receives is sufficient under all the circumstances to apprise a person of ordinary prudence that the premises are in a dangerous condition, then such notice will be regarded as knowledge. Having this view of the law, the court, on another trial, will omit the words complained of above, as well as the word "actual" and give the following additional instruction: "No. 2. If you believe from the evidence that defendant's agent, prior to the time of the renting, was notified that the privy was in a dangerous condition, and that such notice, if any, was sufficient, under all the circumstances, to apprise a person of ordinary prudence that the privy was in a dangerous condition, then such agent had knowledge of such dangerous condition within the meaning of instruction No. 1."

[5] The instruction is erroneous for another reason. It will be observed that a recovery is authorized notwithstanding the fact that plaintiff may have known of the defective condition of the premises, or could have discovered such defective condition by a reasonable inspection. In the case of Franklin v. Tracy, supra, the court quoted with approval from the following language of Shearman & Redfield on Negligence (5th Ed.) § 709: "Where, however, there is some latent defect—e. g., an original structural weakness or decay, or the presence of an infectious disease, or other injurious thing rendering the occupation of the premises dangerous—which were known to the lessor and were not known to the lessee or discov-erable by him on a reasonable inspection, then it was the duty of the lessor to disclose the defect; and, if an injury results therefrom, he is liable as for negligence." And in the more recent case of Holzhauser v. Sheeny, 127 Ky. 28, 104 S. W. 1034, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 1238, the court said: "If the landlord knows that the premises are defective or dangerous, and such defect is not discoverable by the tenant by ordinary care, and the landlord conceals or fails to disclose the dangerous condition, he is liable to the tenant, his family and servants, and even his guests, for injuries sustained therefrom." Coke v. Gutkese, 80 Ky. 598, 44 Am. Rep. 499; Franklin v. Tracy, supra. The reason for the rule is that the liability of the landlord in such cases rests entirely upon the notion of deceit; that is, knowledge on the part of the landlord of the defective condition, and fraudulent concealment from the tenant. Manifestly, if the tenant knows of the defective conditions, or could discover them by a reasonable inspection, the element of deceit is lacking, and there can be no recovery.

[6] The witness Jeffries testified in one place that the floor was all rotten. Subsequently he said that the shaky condition of the privy was what alarmed him. Plaintiff occupied the premises for six months before she was injured. Manifestly, on this evidence, the question whether or not plaintiff knew of the defective condition of the privy, or could have discovered same by a reasonable inspection, was for the jury. On the return of the case, the court will qualify the instructions so as to present this phase of the case, which, under the facts, is just as essential to a recovery as knowledge on the part of the landlord of the defective condition and his concealment thereof from the plaintiff.

This conclusion makes it unnecessary for us to consider other questions that are urged as grounds for reversal.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial consistent with this opinion.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*)—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—RIGHT TO COMPLAIN.

Accused may not complain of evidence brought out on the cross-examination of a state's witness.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 369*)—EVIDENCE OF OTHER OFFENSES—ADMISSIBILITY.

On a trial for rape on a female 14 years old, the admission of testimony that accused had committed a second offense a few weeks after the commission of the offense for which he was tried, and that prosecutrix complained of the second assault shortly after its commis-

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS—ISSUES.

Where prosecutrix, 14 years old, insisted that accused raped her, while he insisted that he had had nothing to do with her beyond making an improper proposal, instructions that, if accused had intercourse with her with her consent, he should be acquitted, and that, if he unlawfully detained her with a felonious intent to have intercourse with her, he should be found guilty of that offense, were properly refused because presenting issues not raised by the evidence.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1173*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Where accused, convicted of raping a female under the age of 14 years, was sentenced to the penitentiary from 10 to 20 years, he could not complain of the refusal of an instruction that, if he was found guilty of unlawfully detaining prosecutrix with intent to have intercourse with her, he should be found guilty of that offense, and sentenced to the penitentiary, since the verdict found conformed to the verdict which he asked if he was found guilty of the lesser offense.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Marion County.

Harry Gamble was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Affirmed.

S. A. Russell, of Lebanon, for appellant. James Garnett, Atty. Gen., and D. O. Myatt, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the Commonwealth.

MILLER, J. The appellant, Harry Gamble, was convicted of rape, committed on his stepdaughter Catherine Smith, aged 14, and given an indeterminate sentence of confinement in the penitentiary from 10 to 20 years at hard labor. He appeals, and alleges four grounds for reversal.

[1, 2] 1. He insists that incompetent testimony was admitted over his objection. The crime of which appellant was convicted is alleged to have been committed in February, 1912, in the barn of John W. Mouser, where appellant and Catherine Smith were bulking tobacco. She did not tell any one at the time, but, when she was asked upon cross-examination by appellant's attorney as to when she told her mother of the assault, she answered that she told her mother immediately after Gamble had committed a second assault upon her a few weeks later. Appellant insists that the latter part of this answer was not responsive to the question, and should have been excluded. Upon the direct examination the commonwealth offered to prove the second assault, but the court excluded the testimony; but, when appellant's counsel asked the question upon cross-examination, the court overruled the objection and permitted the witness to answer; and it is insisted that this ruling constituted a reversible error, since appellant was charged with one crime, and evidence was admitted showing that he had also committed another crime. This answer, however, was brought out by the appellant's cross-examination; and, that being true, he cannot complain. Moreover, it is almost impossible at times to keep from the attention of the jury at all stages of the trial evidence of offenses which were so closely connected as they were in this case. Under the circumstances, we do not think the court erred in allowing the question to be answered. Miracle v. Commonwealth, 148 Ky. 453, 146 S. W. 1146; Gross v. Commonwealth, 151 Ky. 89, 151 S. W. 36.

[3] 2. It is further contended that the court erred in not giving instructions C and D, asked by the appellant, which read as follows:

"(C) Although you may believe that defendant had carnal knowledge of Catherine Smith, yet, if you further believe that defendant had such carnal knowledge of her with her consent, you should find defendant not guilty.

"(D) Although you may not find defendant guilty as set out in instruction No. 1, yet, if you do believe to the exclusion of a reasonable doubt that defendant in Marion county before the finding of this indictment herein did unlawfully detain Catherine Smith with the intent to have carnal knowledge of her against her will, you will find him, defendant, guilty, and, so finding, you shall say in your verdict: 'We, the jury, find defendant guilty of detaining Catherine Smith against her will with the intent to have carnal knowledge of her, and fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary.'"

Instruction "C" was properly refused, because there was no evidence whatever that Catherine Smith consented to the act of appellant. She insists that he raped her, while appellant insists that he had nothing whatever to do with her beyond making an improper proposal to her. He denies all carnal knowledge of Catherine Smith; and, that being true, the only question to be presented to the jury was that of rape. For the same reason, instruction "D" was properly refused, since the evidence clearly shows that appellant was either guilty of rape, or he was not guilty at all. It is a well-settled rule of practice that the court should not give an instruction upon a theory of the case that is without evidence to sustain it.

[4] Furthermore, by the rejected instruction "D," appellant asked the court to instruct the jury that, if they should find him guilty of detaining Catherine Smith against her will, with intent to have carnal knowledge of her, it should fix his punishment at confinement in the penitentiary, and not at death, which they were authorized to do in case they should find him guilty of rape. Appellant cannot, therefore, complain of the court's refusal to give this instruction, since the verdict actually found conformed to the verdict which he asked in case they should find him guilty of the lesser offense. The six instructions given by the court properly covered the law of the case, and there is no substantial criticism made against them. It is only claimed that the court refused to give instructions "C" and "D" above set out, and that the court improperly overruled appellant's motion for a peremptory instruction on his behalf. The latter question, however, will be considered later.

[5] 3. It is again insisted that the verdict and judgment are not sustained by the evidence. The evidence concerning the act charged was confined to the testimony of Catherine Smith and John W. Mouser for the commonwealth, and that of the appellant in his own behalf. Catherine Smith testified unequivocally that appellant raped her as laid in the indictment. Mouser, after testifying to an earlier conversation with appellant, relates a subsequent conversation with him as follows: "A. An hour after that conversation I saw this girl he had been talking about here going down through the bottom, about 400 yards away, and I looked up and seen her going the way he had gone. I was fixing to go to Veech's blacksmith shop. I went and got my mare, and I had to go by Mr. Gamble's house. I looked down in the field, and seen the girl in there. Just as I passed the gate and got up beside the gate that goes into the lot I heard Harry remark. He says, 'Oh, Mr. Mouser, I want to see you.' I looked around. I couldn't tell where the voice was coming from. I couldn't see him, and I seen the top of a cedar tree shaking, and he come down out of the tree, and he come out in the road, and I says, 'What are you doing up in that tree?' He says, 'Damn it, don't you know I got that girl and sent her over here through the field, and I guess she got with her mother when she got here. I stopped to talk to Grant Hays, and they beat me here, and she has gone; and, God damn her, I will have her or die.' I says, 'Harry, you have asked me for advice, and I tried to give it to you the best I knew how.' I says, 'You had better let that girl alone. You have no business with her.' I says, 'Her mother has got her, and you had better not try to get her. If she gets a writ out for you, you will be in serious trouble.' He says, 'I am not afraid of her getting out a writ; but, God damn Ann [that is his wife]! God damn her! She is mean enough to do most anything; but I am not afraid of the girl's swearing out a writ.'"

Mouser further says that appellant admitted to him in the conversation referred to that he had been intimate with his step-daughter. The only other testimony upon this subject is that of appellant. He denies that he made the statement related by Mouser, and denies that he ever had carnal knowledge of Catherine Smith. He admits, however, that on the second occasion on which Catherine claims he outraged her he made an improper proposal to her, and that she declined to yield. Not only was there ample testimony to take the case to the jury, but in our opinion it sustains rather than discredits the verdict. The motion of appellant for a peremptory instruction was properly overruled.

4. Finally, appellant contends that the conduct of the attorney for the commonwealth in his closing argument to the jury was prejudicial to appellant's rights. Upon this subject it is sufficient to say that the language in question did not transcend the bounds of legitimate argument.

Judgment affirmed.

DESCENT AND DISTRIBUTION (§ 9*)—REAL ESTATE—SALE UNDER ORDER OF COURT—PROCEEDS AS REAL ESTATE.

Under the statute providing that a wife may have dower out of the surplus of the proceeds of land sold to satisfy a mortgage in which she joined, and independent thereof, the proceeds on the sale of real estate of a lunatic, under order of court, to satisfy mortgages thereon in which the wife joined are, on his death, real estate, and she is entitled only to a third thereof for life; and that he became sane after the sale, and so remained for a short time, when he became insane again, and died while insane, does not change the rule, though while sane he asked that the proceeds be turned over to him, but no order granting such relief was made.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Montgomery County.

Proceedings by J. Will Clay as administrator of John McClain, deceased, for the distribution of the assets of the estate between Mamie L. McClain, widow, and Fay C. McClain and others, children. From a decree of distribution, Mamie L. McClain appeals. Affirmed.

John A. Judy, of Mt. Sterling, for appellant. Lewis Apperson, of Mt. Sterling, for appellees.

OLAY, C. John McClain was the owner of a farm in Montgomery county, Ky. On December 10, 1908, he was adjudged insane by the Montgomery county court, and J. Will Clay was appointed his committee. Prior to the time that he was adjudged insane, he had executed and delivered three mortgages on his farm, one for $5,000 to the Northwestern Mutual Life Insurance Company, one for $1,500 to H. Clay Turner, and one for $500 to the Exchange Bank of Kentucky. His wife, Mamie L. McClain, united in these mortgages.

On December 28, 1906, J. Will Clay, as committee for John McClain, brought this action against John McClain and the wife and creditors of John McClain for the purpose of selling the farm in question, in order to pay the debts of John McClain, and to provide for the maintenance and support of his wife and children. The petition alleged and the proof showed that the land could not be divided without materially impairing its value. The case was referred to the master commissioner of the Montgomery circuit court, and after proper steps had been taken before him the land was ordered sold as a whole, and so much of the proceeds as was necessary was applied to the payment of John McClain's debts. To this action Mamie L. McClain, the wife, filed answer, relinquishing her potential right of dower, and asking that the funds remaining after the payment of the debts of John McClain be invested for the support of herself and the infant children of John McClain.

On February 12, 1910, John McClain was adjudged of sound mind. At the April term, 1910, of the Montgomery circuit court, John McClain appeared and filed in this action his petition and answer, setting forth the fact that he had been adjudged of sound mind, and asking that the balance of the proceeds of his property be turned over to him. Thereupon the court entered an order, directing he funds in the hands of the committee to be turned over to John McClain. This was done. At that time the last bond executed or the purchase of the farm was not due, and McClain never collected any of its proceeds.

On September 15, 1910, John McClain was again adjudged insane by the Montgomery circuit court, and M. C. Clay was appointed its committee. Thereupon M. C. Clay qualified and filed his petition in this action, asking to be made a party. An order was entered making him a party, and he then proceeded, under the order of the court, to collect the last sale bond due on the farm in question.

John McClain died in November, 1911, and J. Will Clay qualified as his administrator. Thereupon J. Will Clay, as such administrator, filed his petition and answer in this action, setting out the fact that there were no assets belonging to John McClain, except the funds in the hands of his committee, and asking that the court disburse the sum to the widow and children of John McClain, according to their respective rights. The chancellor adjudged that the widow, Mamie

L. McClain, was entitled to one-third of the proceeds for life, and this sum he ordered invested in real estate for the use and benefit of the widow for and during her natural life, with remainder to the five children of John McClain. The balance of the proceeds he ordered divided equally between the children. From that judgment the widow, Mamie L. McClain, prosecutes this appeal.

The sole question to be determined is whether or not the proceeds of the last sale bond should be treated as realty or personalty. If the former, Mamie L. McClain is entitled to one-third thereof for life, as provided in the judgment of the chancellor. If the latter, she is entitled to one-half thereof absolutely.

Where real estate of a lunatic is sold by his committee under the statute or by order of court, the better doctrine is that the proceeds of such sale remain realty for the purpose of distribution upon the death of the lunatic. 9 Cyc. 848; Holmes' Appeal, 53 Pa. 339; Lloyd v. Hart, 2 Pa. 473, 45 Am. Dec. 612; In re Tugwel, 27 Ch. D. 309; In re Barker, 17 Ch. D. 241. Counsel for appellant insist that the above rule should not apply in this case, for the reason that after the sale was ordered by the chancellor John McClain was adjudged of sound mind, and filed an answer, asking that the proceeds of the sale be turned over to him. In this way it is insisted that he ratified and approved the sale, and virtually consented to the conversion of the realty into personalty. While this may be true as to the funds which were actually turned over to him, we do not think it is true as to the proceeds of the last sale bond, which were not turned over to him, and over which he never had any control. The sale was made while John McClain was incompetent. It was made without his consent. It was valid, whether he assented to it or not. The sale being valid, he was in a position where he could only lay claim to the proceeds. He remained sane but a short time. The last sale bond not being due, and no order having been made giving him control over it, it remained in the hands of the court; and it was impossible for him to dispose of it or invest it in a way that would determine its character. His mere act in asking that the proceeds be turned over to him was not sufficient to convert the proceeds from realty into personalty. We are led to this conclusion not only for the reasons given, but for the reason that we have in force in this state the following statute: "The wife shall not be endowed of land sold, but not conveyed by the husband before marriage, nor of land sold, in good faith, after marriage, to satisfy a lien or incumbrance created before marriage, or created by deed in which she joined, or to satisfy a lien for the purchase money; but if there is a surplus of the land or proceeds of sale after satisfying the lien, she may have dower out of such surplus of the land or compensation out of such surplus of the proceeds, unless they were received or disposed of by the husband in his lifetime."

It will be observed that the statute provides that the wife shall not be endowed of land sold to satisfy a lien or incumbrance created before marriage, or created by deed in which she joins.

In interpreting this statute it has been held that the wife was not entitled to dower in the land sold to satisfy a lien created by mortgage in which she joined; the mortgage being a "deed," within the meaning of the statute. Schweitzer v. Wagner, 94 Ky. 458, 22 S. W. 883, 15 Ky. Law Rep. 229. In this case the land was sold to satisfy three mortgages in which the wife joined. The statute, however, provides that if there is a surplus of land or proceeds of sale, after satisfying the lien, she may have dower out of the surplus of the land, or compensation out of such surplus of proceeds, unless they were received and disposed of by the husband in his lifetime. Here the land was sold to discharge the mortgages in which the wife had united. Under this statute, whether John McClain was sane or insane, she is entitled to dower out of the surplus of such proceeds as were not received or disposed of by him in his lifetime. As the proceeds of the last sale bond were not received or disposed of by him in his lifetime, it follows that the statute applies, and that Mamie L. McClain, the widow of John McClain, is entitled only to dower in such proceeds. By giving the widow dower out of the surplus of such proceeds, it is plain that the Legislature intended that the surplus of such proceeds should retain the character of realty. That being true, she is not entitled to one-half thereof absolutely, as in the case of personality.

Judgment affirmed.

WEST KENTUCKY COAL CO. et al. v. KUYKENDALL'S ADM'R.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 276*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a master for the wrongful death of a servant, evidence held to show that the proximate cause of the servant's death was a disobedience of orders.

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 248*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DISOBEDIENCE OF ORDERS—EFFECT.

Where a servant of an electric light company was killed by a high tension wire because of his disobedience of orders, the master was not liable where it did not learn of the danger in which the servant had placed himself by his negligence in time to avoid the injury.

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 243*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY OF SERVANT TO EXERCISE CARE.

In handling so dangerous an instrumentality as a high tension electric wire the utmost care must be used, not only by the master, but by the servant, and the servant or his personal representative cannot recover where his negligent disobedience of orders caused personal injury or death.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Union County.

Action by W. M. Kuykendall's administrator against the West Kentucky Coal Company and the Sturgis Electric Light Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Allen & Miller, of Morganfield, and Clay & Clay, of Henderson, for appellants. George S. Wilson, of Owensboro, and Morton & Morton, of Morganfield, for appellee.

HOBSON, C. J. The West Kentucky Coal Company and the Sturgis Electric Light Company operate an electric light plant in Sturgis, Ky. They had a crew of men consisting of Otis Hoover, as foreman, William Kuykendall and Byers Nunn, who for two or three months had been engaged in wiring and installing electric light fixtures in dwelling houses in Sturgis, and on March 28, 1911, were so engaged in the residence of a Mr. Simpson. On that afternoon Hoover directed Kuykendall and Nunn to attach some wires which were to lead out of the Simpson house to the electric light wires leading into Dr. Humphrey's house. They went out to make the attachment. The wires leading into the Humphrey house were low tension wires carrying 110 volts of electricity, and there were along the street high tension wires carrying 2,200 volts of electricity. They did not attach the wires leading from the Simpson house to the wires leading to Dr. Humphrey's house, but attached them to one of the high tension wires carrying 2,200 volts of electricity. The next morning after they came back to work, and when they were getting ready to make some attachments in the Simpson house, Kuykendall picked up the two wires which he and Nunn had attached the evening before, holding one in each hand, and was instantly killed by the electricity. This suit was brought against the company to recover for his death. On the first trial of the case there was a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $15,000. The court granted a new trial, and on the next trial a verdict was rendered and judgment entered for $12,000. The defendants appeal.

[1] The only question we deem it necessary to consider on the appeal is whether the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendants. The foreman, Hoover, was sworn as a witness by the plaintiff, and his testimony is practically the only evidence offered by the plaintiff to make out his case. Hoover's testimony, so far as material, put in narrative form, is as follows: "As near as I can remember, I told Will Kuykendall, I am not sure whether Nunn was in there or not, but I told him to go out and connect the wires that go into Dr. Humphrey's residence. I had no conversation with him, only simply the directions I gave him. He did connect the wires at the point where he was directed to connect them. I knew there were three wires coming up that lead, and one of them was an arc light one. The wire that they connected to did not run into Dr. Humphrey's house. I never gave a thought about it at the time. I knew that Dr. Humphrey's house wires came up that lead, but I never thought but that these other wires went in there at the time. Taking the usual arrangement, it would look like the wire they connected to was a secondary wire or low voltage wire. I saw Mr. Nunn out on the pole while he was on the pole. I don't think they had time to make the connection to the wires up at Dr. Humphrey's residence while they were gone. When I left the Simpson house that evening, I passed under the pole where they had made the connection and passed under it the next morning. When Kuykendall came back to the house while Nunn was still up on the pole, he came in where I was, laughing, and said: 'I have got Sandy scared. I told him he was working on 2,200.' I said he ought to know better; we never run 2,200 into a house. He went to the window and said to Nunn: 'All right, go ahead. You are only working on 110.' Kuykendall and I about a month prior to this accident, or six or eight weeks, did some work on the pole near Dr. Humphrey's house; changed a cross-arm, and the wires ran the same then as at the time Mr. Kuykendall was killed. At that time the wires were attached there and came directly from that into Dr. Humphrey's residence. In working there we were bound to see where the wires went. I instructed Kuykendall to connect with the wires that went into the Humphrey residence, and if he had gone there he could have seen the wires. I did not discover that the connection had been made to the high tension wire until after the accident. He knew that low voltage wires were used in electric light wiring and furnished current to the residences, and that high voltage was reduced by means of a transformer."

Nunn testified, in substance, that he was not present when Hoover talked to Kuykendall; that Hoover simply told him to go with Kuykendall. There was a pole back of the Simpson house, also another pole at Main street about 150 feet away, and a pole near the Humphrey residence about the same distance away. Nunn said that when they got out to the pole back of Simpson's house

Kuykendall went down to Main street, and when he came back told him to connect with the wire there—that is, the wire on each side of the pole, and he did this—that he went up on the pole and did the work while Kuykendall stood on the pavement below, and that he worked under Kuykendall's directions.

If Kuykendall, instead of going to Main street, had gone to the other pole which was about the same distance away, he would have seen the wires leading into the Humphrey house, and could have made the connection as he was directed to do by Hoover. If the connection had been made thus, there would have been no danger in the wires the next morning, and he would not have been killed. He had worked on the pole next to the Humphrey residence with Hoover about six weeks before, and knew that the wires went from this pole into the Humphrey house. He seems to have assumed that these wires came from Main street, and for that reason directed Nunn to make the connection as he did, when as a matter of fact the wires that lighted the Humphrey house came from Adams street, and the wires that came from Main street were all high tension wires. The proof leaves no doubt that Kuykendall knew the difference between high tension and low tension wires, and that the entire cause of the trouble was his not making the connection to the wires which led into Dr. Humphrey's house. It is also evident that he would not have made the mistake if he had gone to the pole where he had worked a few weeks before and looked at the wires there. It is therefore insisted for the defendants that his death was due to his own failure to obey his instructions and his own want of care in failing to make the connection to the wires to which he was told to make it. But it is insisted for the plaintiff that the foreman, Hoover, knew that he had made the connection at the pole back of the Simpson house, and that this was notice to him that the connection had not been made to the right wires. These facts also appear: The night after this connection was made, the lights went out on that lead. The superintendent, the foreman, Hoover, Kuykendall, and Nunn, were all out looking for the trouble. They found the trouble to be in the cut-out block just across the street from this pole. They refused this cut-out block and put the plug back in the block and the trouble disappeared. It is insisted that these facts, as well as some things that happened at the Simpson house the next morning, were sufficient to put Hoover on notice that the connection had not been made right. But as a matter of fact he did not so conclude at the time. All the things that happened might have come from one of two different causes, and it was only after the accident that they were ascribed to the true cause. So summing the whole case up, we think the proximate cause of the unfortunate man's death was his making the connection to the wrong wire, and the proximate cause of this was his disobeying his instructions. It is insisted that there was negligence on the part of appellants in that Kuykendall was not warned or instructed as to the danger in handling the wires. But his own declaration shows he understood the danger. The thing he did not know was what wires ran into the Humphrey house, and this he should have learned before making the connection. They all knew there were high tension wires on this lead. They all knew that there was danger from these high tension wires. Kuykendall knew the Humphrey house very well. He had worked only a few weeks before on the wires leading into that house, and, when he was told to make the connection to the wires leading into the Humphrey house, he understood perfectly what he was told to do. His death was due to his assuming that the wires which came from Main street went into the Humphrey house, without going to the other pole and looking and learning for himself what wires went into the Humphrey house. It is true Hoover knew he had made the connection back of the Simpson house, but Hoover at the time did not have in his mind how the wires which went into Dr. Humphrey's house ran.

[2] The rule is that if a servant disobeys his orders, and by his disobedience brings a peril upon himself which he would not otherwise have encountered, the master in a case like this is not liable, unless he learns of the danger in which his negligence has placed him in time to avoid injury to him. Cleveland, etc., R. R. Co. v. Workman, 68 Ohio St. 509, 64 N. E. 582, 90 Am. St. Rep. 602; Rumians v. Keller, etc., 141 Ky. 827, 133 S. W. 860; Straight Creek Coal Co. v. Haney's Adm'r, 87 S. W. 1114, 27 Ky. Law Rep. 1117; Cincinnati, etc., R. R. Co. v. Yocum's Adm'r, 137 Ky. 117, 123 S. W. 247, 1200; Id., 143 Ky. 700, 137 S. W. 217.

[3] In handling so dangerous an instrumentality as currents of electricity of 2,200 volts, the utmost care must be used by those having charge of it, and a corresponding degree of care should be used by the servants for their own safety in handling it. A disobedience of orders not only endangers themselves, but endangers the lives of others. By the act of Kuykendall in making the connection to the wrong wire, the lives of a number of other persons were placed in imminent peril. His personal representative stands in no better position than he would if he had survived and brought an action for his injuries; and certainly one who puts others in such danger by disobedience of orders should not be allowed to recover for an injury which he himself received simply by reason of his failure to obey his orders, and make the connection to the wires leading into the Humphrey residence—a thing he would have had no difficulty in doing if he had walked down to the other place and looked at the wires before making the connection at the pole back of the Simpson house. We therefore conclude that under the evidence the court should have instructed the jury peremptorily to find for the defendant.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings consistent herewith.

MURPHY et al. v. NEWINGHAM et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 64*)—PAROL GIFT—OCCUPATION BY PERMISSION.

An unconditional parol gift of a well-defined body of land, accompanied by actual possession for 15 years or over, with claim of ownership, transfers the title as against the donor; but if the occupant enters under the owner's permission, expecting only that the owner will give the land to him, then his possession is not hostile and will not ripen into title.

2. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—PERMISSIVE OCCUPANCY—EVIDENCE.

Evidence held to sustain a chancellor's finding that plaintiff occupied the land in question by defendant's permission only, and not under an unconditional parol gift.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County.

Action by Alex Murphy and others against W. J. Newingham and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

O'Rear & Williams, of Frankfort, and F. W. Stowers, of Pikeville, for appellants. Butler & Moore, of Pikeville, and B. F. Combs, of Prestonburg, for appellees.

CLAY, C. John Rutherford owned a large body of land in Pike county, Ky., on Pigeon Roost fork of Pond creek. He had several children. As each of these children became of age, or was married, he settled them on different portions of his farm. Alex Murphy married Polly Rutherford, daughter of John Rutherford, in the year 1878. Nine children were born to them. Soon after their marriage, Alex Murphy and his wife, Polly, settled on the tract in controversy, which consists of about 202 acres of land. In the year 1903 John Rutherford gave to W. J. Newingham, Charles S. Thorn, and A. J. King an option on the coal lying on his farm, including the land in controversy. He executed a deed on August 12th to the persons holding the option. In October of the same year, the vendees in the deed sold and conveyed the coal to the Williamson Coal Company. Alleging that the land was given equally to Alex Murphy and Polly Murphy by John Rutherford, that Polly Murphy died in the year 1893, and her interest descended to their children, subject to Alex Murphy's curtesy therein, and that Alex Murphy and his children were the joint owners of the tract in controversy, this action was brought against W. J. Newingham and others to quiet plaintiffs' title. It was further alleged that, at the time defendants acquired title, plaintiffs were in adverse possession of same, and that the deed to defendants was champertous. By answer, defendants denied the allegations of the petition and pleaded title in themselves. They also set up certain facts in estoppel of plaintiffs' claim and alleged that they acquired title without notice or knowledge of plaintiffs' claim. On final hearing, plaintiffs' petition was dismissed, and they appeal.

The evidence for plaintiffs shows that, soon after the marriage of Alex and Polly Murphy, in the year 1878, they settled on the land in dispute. John Rutherford marked the lines for them. In 1884 John Rutherford gave the lands to Alex and Polly Murphy. Since that time they had paid the taxes on the land. After taking possession of the land, they built a dwelling house, which they added to from time to time. They also built tenant houses, barns, and outhouses. They planted a fruit orchard and cleared and fenced about 75 acres of land. They also cut and sold timber from the land in quantities for sawlog purposes. These acts of possession were known to John Rutherford. John Rutherford had other children, to whom he deeded the lands upon which they had settled. When Alex and Polly Murphy settled on the land, he stated that he intended to give it to them. Subsequently he pointed out their lines, and said the land was Alex's and Polly's, and not his. The foregoing facts appear from the testimony of Alex Murphy and other witnesses: On cross-examination, Alex Murphy stated that he knew that John Rutherford had optioned and sold the land in question to Newingham and others in 1903, and understood that he got $10 per acre for it. He saw Dr. Deaton make a survey of the land at that time. Upon being asked, "Did you object to Mr. Rutherford, or make any complaint to Mr. Rutherford's selling this land to Mr. Newingham?" he answered: "Yes, sir; I told him to make a reserve of the property around my house and property, that is, of the surface. Mr. Rutherford told me he intended to put me on level land." On redirect examination, he was asked, "What caused you to ask Mr. Rutherford to reserve you a boundary around your house in the sale to defendants?" He answered: "Because he tried to make me believe that I couldn't hold the land without a deed, and I was ignorant of the law. I claimed the land then as I do now."

For defendants, John Rutherford testified that he never gave anything to Alex Murphy.

He settled Alex's wife on the land, telling them to go live on it and have what they could make on it. So far as he was concerned, he did not intend to make a title until he got ready. He intended to let them live on it until he got ready to dispose of his estate. He also said that, at the time Alex and his wife were put on the land, he did not mark any boundary. For a while he paid the taxes for his children, but afterwards concluded that, as they were getting the benefit of the land, they ought to pay the taxes. He intended the title to pass to his children whenever he got ready to make it. He first made a will, but afterwards got dissatisfied and tore the will up. He then turned in and made deeds to some of his children. In 1903 he gave defendants an option on the land and afterwards deeded the land to them. He received for the coal on the land in controversy $2,000. He took $1,500 of this sum and paid for a tract of 25 acres of land which plaintiffs had purchased from W. A. Rutherford. Of the balance he gave $450 to Alex Murphy, who distributed it among his nine children, giving them $50 apiece. Witness retained $50 of the amount of the purchase price, because he felt like he was entitled to that much. The deed from W. A. Rutherford and wife was made to plaintiffs and put to record. Witness also conveyed the surface of the land in controversy to the children of Polly Murphy. He knew that Alex Murphy was selling timber off the land, and also knew that in the year 1881 Alex Murphy and W. A. Rutherford exchanged tracts. He permitted them to trade among each other, and permitted Alex Murphy to use the timber from the land for the purpose of raising his children. While he could not say for certain that plaintiffs knew of the option he gave to defendants, it was talked about at the time, and was generally understood by everybody. The surveyors boarded with him at the time the land was surveyed, and were there for a week or 10 days, and passed by Alex Murphy's house in making the survey. On cross-examination, witness stated that he bought a farm on Blackberry and gave it to his daughter Jane Hatfield. He deeded to William A. Rutherford the home place. He further gave to Parlee Riddle a portion of the land. He also gave to Floyd Rutherford's heirs a portion of his land. Witness said that at one time Alex Murphy and W. A. Rutherford swapped places for a while. Certain of the defendants also testified that they had no notice or knowledge of plaintiff's claim; that the title to the land was in John Rutherford.

A number of Alex Murphy's children testified to their acts of possession, and to the fact that they never made the trade with W. A. Rutherford for the 25 acres of land, and did not know what the $50 apiece was paid to them for. The husband of one of the girls testified that the 25-acre tract conveyed by W. A. Rutherford was worth only about $300.

[1] It is well settled that where there is an unconditional parol gift of a well-defined body of land, accompanied by an actual possession for 15 years or over, with claim of ownership, such possession ripens into title, and the donor cannot recover the land. If, however, one enters upon land by the owner's permission, expecting that the owner will give it to him, then such possession is not a hostile holding. Commonwealth v. Gibson, 85 Ky. 666, 4 S. W. 453, 9 Ky. Law Rep. 205; Thompson v. Thomson, 93 Ky. 435, 20 S. W. 373, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 513; Owsley v. Owsley, 117 Ky. 47, 77 S. W. 397, 25 Ky. Law Rep. 1186.

[2] The main question in this case is: Was there an unconditional parol gift of the land, or did Alex Murphy and his wife and children hold merely by permission of John Rutherford? Alex Murphy does not contend that John Rutherford gave him and his wife the lands at the time they took possession. He does say, however, that John Rutherford marked out the boundary, and that in the year 1884 John Rutherford made a gift of the lands to him and his wife. If the gift was made at that time, then the holding of the plaintiffs was adverse from that moment, and, having held the land for more than 15 years, their possession ripened into title. It appears that prior to his wife's death Alex Murphy controlled the lands, and that after his wife's death he controlled and managed the lands for the benefit of his children. Alex Murphy himself testifies that at the time of the sale of the coal to defendants he told John Rutherford to make a reserve of the property around his house—that is, of the surface—and that Mr. Rutherford told him he intended to put him on level ground. It is true that he afterwards stated that the reason he asked Mr. Rutherford to reserve the boundary around the house was that Mr. Rutherford tried to make him believe that he could not hold the land without a deed; that he was ignorant of the law, and claimed the land then as he did when he testified. Notwithstanding this explanation, however, his conduct on the occasion when the mineral was sold is certainly a circumstance going to show that his and his children's holding was merely by permission of John Rutherford, and was not adverse to him. In addition to this, we have John Rutherford's sworn statement that he never gave anything to Alex Murphy; that he placed him and his wife on the land, and gave them permission to occupy and use it for the purpose of supporting themselves and their children. He first intended to will it to them, but afterwards changed his mind. He did make deeds to those children to whom he gave title. He never made any deed to Alex Murphy or his children.

The evidence upon the question of a parol gift being equiponderant, and the circumstances and relations of the parties being such as to indicate a permissive rather than an adverse holding, we see no reason to disturb the finding of the chancellor.

Judgment affirmed.

SPERRY & HUTCHINSON CO. v. CITY OF OWENSBORO et al.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. LICENSES (§ 7*)—BUSINESS LICENSE—IMPOSITION—REQUISITES.

Under Ky. St. § 3290, subsec. 12, authorizing cities to impose license fees on franchises, trades, occupations, and professions, and providing for the collection thereof, a city is authorized to classify different kinds of business, provided a reasonable basis for classification exists, and to levy the tax on business as classified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15, 19; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. LICENSES (§ 7*)—BUSINESS—CLASSIFICATION—TRADING STAMP CONCERNS.

The business of a concern engaged in furnishing trading stamps to merchants to be redeemed with goods being entirely different from that of an ordinary merchant, there was a proper basis for classification by a city in fixing the amount of license tax on such business.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-15, 19; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

3. LICENSES (§ 15)—BUSINESS—REGULATION—POLICE POWER.

A concern engaged in furnishing trading stamps to merchants is engaged in a lawful business, and cannot be taxed by a city under the exercise of the police power, but may be taxed a reasonable amount, as any other lawful business is taxed under the city's power to tax franchises, trades, occupations, and professions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 30-35; Dec. Dig. § 15.*]

4. LICENSES (§ 7*)—BUSINESS TAX—REASONABLENESS.

An ordinance imposing a business tax in a city provided that a brewery should be taxed $50, a bottling establishment $25, soda fountain $10, restaurant $10, butcher shop, commission merchants, secondhand dealers, pawnbrokers, and auctioneers $25 each, and itinerant merchants, stockbrokers, private scales, and trading stamp concerns $300. Complainant did a trading stamp business in the city amounting to $5,000 per annum, with a net profit of about $500. Held, that the license was invalid as unreasonable, oppressive, and prohibitory.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Daviess County.

Suit by the Sperry & Hutchinson Company against the City of Owensboro and others to enjoin the enforcement of an ordinance imposing a license tax on persons engaged in the business of selling trading stamps. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Birkhead & Wilson, of Owensboro, and John Hall Jones, for appellant. R. S. Todd, of Owensboro, for appellees.

HOBSON, C. J. The common council of the city of Owensboro enacted an ordinance, which was approved by the mayor, levying license taxes on trades, professions, and occupations in the city of Owensboro during the year commencing on May 1, 1910, and ending April 30, 1911. Section 26 of the ordinance is in these words: "To engage in the business of selling or giving stamps, known as trading stamps, to be used in connection with the sale of goods, wares or merchandise, $300.00." The Sperry & Hutchinson Company brought this suit against the city of Owensboro and its officers to enjoin the collection of the tax on the ground that the ordinance is void, in that it is discriminatory, and the amount fixed to be paid is unreasonable, oppressive, and prohibitory. The appellant is a corporation formed under the laws of the state of New Jersey, and has complied with the laws of the state of Kentucky relating to foreign corporations doing business here. It is authorized to buy, sell, and exchange merchandise, to do a general advertising business, to contract and be contracted with. It is carrying on business in the city of Owensboro, where it maintains a store similar to other housefurnishing stores, stocked with goods, wares, and merchandise for household use and ornamentation, and it disposes of its goods in the following manner: It enters into contracts with various merchants in the city of Owensboro called subscribers, who desire to give their customers attractive articles of merchandise as an inducement for cash trade. Under these contracts, it furnishes its subscribers stamps which they agree to deliver to their customers at the rate of one stamp for each 10 cents represented in a cash purchase. It agrees with its subscribers that it will give in exchange for these stamps in certain specified numbers the articles of merchandise carried by it in its store. The subscribers pay for the stamps at so much a thousand; and it also delivers to them books in which the stamps are to be placed by the customers of the subscribers, and, when a book is filled, the book may be presented to it and an article of merchandise obtained. The subscribers are furnished with metal and card advertising signs to display in their stores to inform the public that they are offering this inducement for cash trade. For a number of years it has not been uncommon for a merchant to give coupons to his customers making cash purchases, and agreeing when a certain number of these coupons are presented to deliver to the purchaser free of charge some household article kept in the store. The business of the plaintiff seems to have taken its origin from this custom. It relieves the merchant of keeping the articles in stock to be delivered to his customers, and it offers the customers a wider range of choice in the articles to be obtained. In addition to this under the old system, the coupons issued at each store could only be redeemed at that store, but, under the plaintiff's plan, it furnishes its stamps to grocers, butchers, bakers, dry goods merchants, druggists, and all other trades, and the stamps obtained in any of these stores can be put in the same book, and presented to the plaintiff for redemption. In this way a book can be filled out very much more quickly, and all the stamps received by a customer anywhere may be used.

Section 4224, Ky. St., provides: "All resident or foreign trading stamp companies or corporations doing business in this state shall annually pay a license tax to the county court clerk of each county wherein such business is conducted, ten dollars." We had this statute before us in Commonwealth v. Gibson, 125 Ky. 440, 101 S. W. 385, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 51, and it was there held that a company conducting a general retail merchandise business that gave to a cash purchaser a check representing 4 per cent. of his purchase, which could be exchanged for articles in the store or for cash, did not come within the statute; and in that case the difference between a merchant and a company like the plaintiff was pointed out, it being held that the statute was intended to cover such a business as is done by the plaintiff. The circuit court dismissed the plaintiff's petition, and it appeals.

[1, 2] Under subsection 12 of section 3290, Ky. St., pursuant to section 181 of the Constitution, the city may impose license fees "on franchises, trades, occupations, and professions, and provide for the collection thereof." The business of the appellant is substantially different from that of an ordinary merchant. The city may classify business and levy the tax on business as classified. There must be a reasonable basis for the classifications; but, as appellant's business is entirely different from that of an ordinary merchant, we agree with the circuit court that there is a reasonable basis for the classification, and that the ordinance is not void on the ground that it is discriminatory. In Covington v. Dalhelm, 126 Ky. 26, 102 S. W. 829, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 466, and in Read v. Graham, 102 S. W. 860, 81 Ky. Law Rep. 569, it was held that an ordinance taxing grocers or milk vendors using a delivery wagon, and not taxing those who did not use a wagon, was void because based on no reasonable ground of classification. But that is not this case. Plaintiff is not a merchant selling goods as other merchants. It sells trading stamps to its customers, and redeems these stamps from their customers, under certain conditions, in merchandise. Stamps not presented for redemption are clear profit. Stripped of all circumlocution, it simply maintains a system by which purchasers for cash from its subscribers get a discount on their purchases. Its business is as distinct from that of a merchant as the business of a pawnbroker or factor.

[3] The objection that the tax is unreasonable, oppressive, and prohibitory presents a more difficult question. The taxing of trading stamp companies has led to a considerable amount of litigation. It is generally held that the business is a lawful business, and that it may not be taxed under the exercise of the police power. State v. Shugart, 138 Ala. 86, 35 South. 28, 100 Am. St. Rep. 17; Drexel v. Holland, 147 Cal. 763, 82 Pac. 429, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 588, 3 Ann. Cas. 873; Long v. State, 74 Md. 565, 22 Atl. 4, 12 L. R. A. 425, 28 Am. St. Rep. 268; O'Keeffe v. Somerville, 190 Mass. 110, 76 N. E. 457, 112 Am. St. Rep. 316, 5 Ann. Cas. 684; State v. Ramseyer, 73 N. H. 31, 58 Atl. 958, 6 Ann. Cas. 445; People v. Gillson, 109 N. Y. 389, 17 N. E. 343, 4 Am. St. Rep. 465; State v. Dalton, 22 R. I. 77, 46 Atl. 234, 48 L. R. A. 776, 84 Am. St. Rep. 818, and cases cited. But, while plaintiff's business may not be taxed under the police power, it may be taxed as any other lawful business is taxed under the power to tax franchises, trades, occupations, and professions. But an unreasonable or prohibitory tax under this power will not be sustained.

[4] In Fiscal Court v. Cox Co., 132 Ky. 738, 117 S. W. 296, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 83, we said: "It may be conceded that ordinarily the reasonableness of a license fee imposed as a tax is a question for the taxing power, and the courts will not interfere with its discretion. Hall v. Commonwealth, 101 Ky. 382 [41 S. W. 2, 19 Ky. Law Rep. 578]. This rule we think, however, is subject to the limitation that the tax imposed shall not amount to a prohibition of any useful or legitimate occupation. [Citing authorities.] While there are numerous authorities to the contrary, it will be found that the license fee involved in those cases was not prohibitive, and the courts simply declared the general rule that the reasonableness of the tax was a matter within the discretion of the taxing power." See, also, Hager v. Walker, 128 Ky. 1, 107 S. W. 254, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 748, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 195, 129 Am. St. Rep. 238; Chicago v. Netcher, 183 Ill. 104, 55 N. E. 707, 48 L. R. A. 261, 75 Am. St. Rep. 93. In Ex parte Hutchinson (C. C.) 137 Fed. 949, the court had before it the validity of a franchise ordinance, which imposed an annual tax of $100 on pawnbrokers, and $700 on trading stamp companies in Seattle. The ordinance was held invalid as to trading stamp companies on the ground that it was prohibitive. In view of the size of the two cities, a tax of $300 in Owensboro, a city of third class of this state, is more oppressive than a tax of $700 in a city the size of Seattle. In Humes v. Little Rock (C. C.) 138 Fed. 929, a license tax of $50 a week on all persons engaged in the business of selling or giving away premium stamps was held void as prohibitive. While this is an extreme case, it illustrates the principle that the courts will not sustain prohibitive regulations made under the guise of taxation. The plaintiff's business is not unlawful. It is a business which the state itself licenses. And, while the city may also tax it, the tax must be imposed in good faith under the taxing power, and not for the purpose of prohibiting the business. When we read the ordinance as a whole, it is hard to escape the conclusion that it was intended to prohibit the business. To illustrate, to construct or operate a brewery in the city is taxed $50; to conduct the business of putting up in bottles beer, wine, cider, pop, or other soft drinks is taxed $25; to maintain a soda fountain $10; to keep a restaurant $10; butcher shop $25; commission merchants $25; secondhand dealers $25; pawnbrokers $25; auctioneers $25. Excepting licenses for selling intoxicants, which may be regulated under the police power, the only thing we find in the ordinance high as $300 are itinerant merchants, stockbrokers, receiving orders for the purchase for a future delivery in margins, and private scales. We think it evident from the ordinance as a whole that the tax of $300 on stamp companies was intended to be prohibitive and break up the business. Appellant's gross business per annum under the evidence amounts to about $5,000, and its net profits amount to about $500 per annum. To tax such a business $300 per annum must have been intended to break it up, and it is not difficult to understand why this sentiment existed on the part of the merchants in the city who did not handle the stamps. It is true the business may increase, and there may be more profit in it than is shown by the evidence; but the ordinance was evidently aimed at it as it is, and no facts being shown, justifying such a tax on it, it must be presumed that the intention was to burden and so break up the business. We therefore conclude that the ordinance is void as imposing an oppressive and prohibitory tax.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a judgment as above indicated.

LOUISVILLE & N. R. CO. v. COMMONWEALTH.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. CORPORATIONS (§ 434*)—REAL PROPERTY—RIGHT TO VOTE—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS—CONSTRUCTION.

Const. § 192, prohibiting any corporation from holding any real estate, except such as may be proper or necessary for the carrying on of its legitimate business, for a longer period than five years under penalty of escheat, was not intended to deny to a corporation the right in good faith to acquire real estate for a proper and necessary future use, and to hold the same longer than five years. It is not so much the time for which real estate is held, as the purpose for which it is acquired, the intention with which it is held, the use to which it is to be put, and the necessity therefor, that determine the right of such corporation to hold it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 1763-1771; Dec. Dig. § 434.*]

2. ESCHAT (§ 3*)—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO ESCHAT—RAILROAD PROPERTY—REASONABLE AND PROPER USE.

In a proceeding to escheat a number of lots of land because held in violation of Const. § 192, prohibiting any corporation from holding real estate for more than five years, except such as may be proper or necessary for carrying on its legitimate business, lots lying along and near defendant railroad's right of way at an important and growing railroad point, including the only available site for a needed passenger depot, lots occupied by a section foreman and his garden under a custom of the company to furnish houses and gardens for section foremen, lots used for storing cross-ties, lots near its freight station, leased, until necessary for railroad use, to a lumber and coal dealer who was an extensive shipper and which accommodated business which otherwise would be a greater expense to the road, a lot on which there were frame buildings occupied by section foremen and sectionmen, a lot originally acquired as a borrow pit in constructing a cut-off, on the top surface of which the railroad had planted locust trees to be used for ties, a lot, partly covering the right of way, and occupied by an embankment, an oil depot, and locust trees, and narrow strips of land adjoining its right of way, planted with locust trees or occupied by section foremen, were necessary or proper for carrying on the company's legitimate business, and hence not subject to escheat, but a lot conveyed by the railroad reserving a lien on the purchase price to a company whose stock was originally held by the railroad, but which was afterwards distributed among such stockholders, not held for any present or reasonably necessary future use, was subject to escheat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. §§ 3-5; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

3. ESCHAT (§ 6*)—PETITION—NEGATING REASONABLE NECESSITY.

A petition by the state to escheat property held by a corporation for over five years, and not proper or necessary for carrying on its business, in violation of Const. § 192, need only describe the property, and allege that it has been held for more than five years, and that it is not proper or necessary for carrying on its legitimate business, and need not negative the idea of a reasonable necessity for future use; that being a matter of defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Escheat, Cent. Dig. §§ 7-17, 24; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shelby County.

Action by the Commonwealth of Kentucky, by, etc., against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and another. From the judgment, the Commonwealth and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company appeal. Reversed on original and cross appeals, and cause remanded, with directions.

Luther C. Willis, of Shelbyville, and Benjamin D. Warfield, of Louisville, for appellant. Geo. L. Pickett, Pickett & Barrickman, and Beard & Marshall, all of Shelbyville, for appellee.

CLAY, C. This is an action by the commonwealth against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company to escheat numerous parcels of land on the ground that they were held contrary to section 192 of the Constitution, providing that no corporation shall "hold any real estate except such as may be proper or necessary for carrying on its legitimate business for a longer period than five years, under penalty of escheat." Several of the tracts are town lots located in the city of Shelbyville. They are designated in the petition and discussed in the evidence as lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, and 9. By amended petition it was sought to escheat certain narrow strips of land lying out in the country and adjoining the railroad right of way; also a lot in Bagdad, Ky. The original suit, which was filed in 1907, was against the railroad company. On February 17, 1909, an amended petition was filed making the Louisville Property Company a party defendant. In the amended petition it was charged that the Louisville Property Company was organized by the stockholders of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, and was created, organized, and existed for the sole and only purpose of a buying and holding company for the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company; that the only purpose of its organization and existence was that the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company might own and hold real estate contrary to the laws of the state of Kentucky, and not necessary for carrying on its legitimate business, and the said corporation, Louisville Property Company, was organized and existed for the purpose of enabling the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company by that device to carry on its legitimate business contrary to the laws of the state of Kentucky. On final hearing the court escheated all of lot No. 1 except a strip 11½ feet wide adjoining its passenger station, and all of lots Nos. 4 and 5, and refused to escheat all the other lots and tracts involved. From the judgment escheating lots Nos. 1, 4, and 5, the railroad company appeals. From that part of the judgment dismissing the petition as to the other lots and tracts involved, the commonwealth prosecutes a cross-appeal.

[1] In the recent case of German Insurance Co. v. Commonwealth, 141 Ky. 606, 138 S. W. 793, where a question of escheat was involved, the court used the following language: "We do not think that a corporation is in all cases to be deprived of its real property merely because it has owned it for more than five years, without applying it to some proper or necessary use in connection with its business. The purpose of its acquisition, the intention with which it is held, and the use to which it may be and is designed to be put, are to be considered in connection with the time of the holding in determining whether or not the provision of the Constitution has been violated. * * * A corporation organized for business purposes, and with the power to carry on business enterprises, should be allowed the same liberty within the scope of its charter rights and subject to the limitations imposed by law as would be permitted to an individual engaged in a similar business. It is not the purpose of the Constitution or the law to place in the way of the success of corporations unreasonable obstacles, or to hinder them from acting as prudent business men would act under like or similar circumstances. Having this view of the privileges that corporations should enjoy, we do not think the Constitution should be so construed as to deny a corporation the opportunity to look forward to the time when its needs in the conduct of its business will be greater than at present or to deprive it of the right to prepare in advance for conditions that it may reasonably expect will come up in the future. If a corporation was not allowed to carry into execution plans that the good judgment of its officers believe to be essential to its growth and prosperity, it would discourage people from investing their money in these agents that are so indispensable to the business of the state and country. From these considerations and others that might be mentioned we conclude that the time limitation imposed by the Constitution was not intended to deny a corporation the right in good faith to acquire real estate for a proper and necessary future use in the transaction of its legitimate business, and hold the same for a longer period than five years, if it is so held with the intention in good faith of devoting it to a proper and necessary use, and it will be necessary for such purpose when so used. It is not so much the time for which real estate is held, but the purpose for which it was acquired, the intention with which it is held, and the use to which it is to be put and the necessity for this use, that determines the right of the corporation to hold it." The rule above announced was subsequently adhered to and applied in the case of the Louisville Property Co. v. Commonwealth, 146 Ky. 827, 143 S. W. 412, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 830.

[2] With these principles in mind, let us consider the various lots and tracts of land involved. In the first place, it is proper to say that Shelbyville is a prosperous and growing town, and an important railroad point. The traffic, both freight and passenger, to and from that point is large and is growing larger. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company has three railroads entering Shelbyville, to wit, the Shelby Branch, the Bloomfield Branch, and the Shelby Cut-Off. Having three sections of track at that point, it employs three foremen and three separate gangs of men. We shall consider the lots in their order.

Lot No. 1. This lot fronts on Main street 98½ feet, and is 234 feet in depth. The last-mentioned distance it lies on Eleventh street, and along the side of the Bloomfield Branch of the defendant's right of way. All of defendant's trains stop at Eleventh street, and at this point defendant maintains only a platform as a passenger station. In order to avoid driving upon the railroad track, 11½ feet of lot No. 1 are necessarily used by the patrons of the railroad to reach the station. Defendant's superintendent and section foreman gave it as their opinion that the railroad ought to have a regular depot building at that point instead of a platform, and lot No. 1 was the only available site for that purpose. If such a depot was erected, it would be necessary to use all or a larger part of lot No. 1. There is no evidence to the contrary. On these facts, we conclude that the defendant showed a reasonable necessity for a future use of the property, and that the court erred in escheating any portion of this lot.

Lots Nos. 2 and 3. Lot No. 2 fronts 50 feet on Main street, and extends back along Eleventh street for a distance of 178 feet. It adjoins the Bloomfield Branch of defendant's right of way. This lot is occupied by defendant's section foreman on the Bloomfield section. It was occupied by him before suit was brought, and has been continuously occupied by him since that time. Lot No. 3 lies near lot No. 2, and a portion of it is used as a garden for the section foreman, and the other portion of it is used as a place for storing cross-ties and ballast. The evidence shows that it was customary for the railroad company to furnish its section foremen with houses and gardens wherever practicable to do so. Defendant's witnesses testified that both these lots were absolutely necessary to the conduct of defendant's business at that point. There is no evidence to the contrary. We think the evidence sufficiently shows a past, present, and necessary legitimate use of these two lots. The trial court, therefore, did not err in refusing to escheat them.

Lots Nos. 4 and 5. Lot No. 4, consisting of a little over a quarter of an acre, adjoins the Shelby Branch of defendant's right of way. It lies only a few feet from defendant's freight depot. At present it is under lease to Hall & Sons, who use it in connection with land of their own in carrying on a lumber yard. Lot No. 5 also adjoins the Shelby Branch of defendant's right of way, and is leased to Hall & Sons for the purpose of carrying on a coal yard. The evidence shows that Hall & Sons are extensive shippers, and that the defendant leased lots Nos. 4 and 5 to Hall & Sons until it should become necessary for the railroad to use them. It also appears that the lumber and coal were hauled in carload lots, and that the presence of the lumber and coal yards near defendant's tracks was not only a convenience to Hall & Sons, but enabled defendant to handle the traffic more conveniently and at less expense, thus contributing to the successful operation of the road. The evidence also shows that there are tracks running to lots Nos. 4 and 5 rented by Hall & Sons. If the defendant did not have tracks to these lots from which to unload coal and lumber, it would have to provide other facilities at Shelbyville for that purpose, and, in order to do so, would either have to use the identical lots leased to Hall & Sons, or purchase for such purpose other land less favorably situated, for which it would have probably to pay an exorbitant price. Defendant's superintendent testifies that in the event of the double tracking of the Shelby Cut-Off, or the extension of the defendant's yards at Shelbyville, which the increased traffic and railroad development will require, both lots 4 and 5 would become necessary for the tracks and yards of the railroad company. The evidence being sufficient to show a reasonable necessity for the future use of lots 4 and 5, we do not think they should be escheated merely because the railroad in the meantime is leasing them to its shippers, in order not only to encourage the business of its patrons, but to enable it to handle the business more conveniently and at less expense. We conclude that the court erred in escheating lots 4 and 5.

Lot No. 6. On this lot there are six frame dwellings, occupied by section foremen and sectionmen. Here we have a past, present, necessary, and legitimate use of this lot, and the trial court properly adjudged that it was not subject to escheat.

Lot No. 7. This lot was originally acquired as a borrow pit to enable defendant to make a large embankment in constructing the Shelby Cut-Off. After the top surface was removed, defendant planted that part of the lot not embraced in its right of way in locust trees. The trees numbered about 2,000. The evidence shows a necessity on the part of railroad companies to grow their own trees for cross-ties, because of the increasing scarcity of timber, and the great difficulty of supplying their wants in the market. The evidence also shows that the defendant would need in its own business all the cross-ties that it could get out of the locust trees thus planted. As a reasonable and proper use has been, and is now being, made of this lot, and as the evidence shows there is a reasonable probability that it will again come into use as a borrow pit, we conclude that the court properly refused to escheat it.

Lots Nos. 8 and 9. The title to these lots appears to be in the Louisville Property Company, a corporation originally organized by the officers and stockholders of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. The Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company conveyed to it certain real estate owned by it in Kentucky, and certain real estate located elsewhere. In the conveyance a lien was reserved in favor of the railroad company to secure the purchase price. The indebtedness of the Louisville Property Company to the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company on December 1, 1910, was $1,721,111.57. When the Louisville Property Company was first formed, and for some time thereafter, all its stock was held by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company and its officers. In the year 1908 the stock of the Louisville Property Company was distributed among the stockholders of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, in accordance with their respective holdings of Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company stock. The trial court was of the opinion that the distribution of the Louisville Property Company's stock among the stockholders of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company was lawful and proper, and that neither before nor after that time was the Property Company a holding company for the use and benefit of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. As to the effect of such distribution of the Louisville Property Company's stock on suits brought thereafter we express no opinion. It is sufficient in this case to say that suit was filed in the year 1907. At that time the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company owned all the stock of the Louisville Property Company, and must be regarded for the purpose of this case as the real owner of the property conveyed by it to the Louisville Property Company. Being the real owner of the property in question at the time suit was brought, the subsequent distribution of the Louisville Property Company's stock among the stockholders of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company cannot defeat a recovery in this action if the lots in controversy were subject to escheat at the time the suit was brought. With this view of the case, it becomes necessary to consider lots 8 and 9 from the same standpoint as the other lots and tracts in controversy.

It is shown that lot No. 8 extends both north and south of defendant's right of way, and perhaps one-fourth of it covers the right of way. One-fourth of the lot is taken up by the embankment of the railroad. A portion of this lot is used by the Standard Oil Company as its oil depot in Shelbyville, in connection with the oil hauled by that company to that place, and was and is necessary for the defendant for that purpose. The evidence also shows that this lot adjoins defendant's right of way, and, in the event of double tracking, will necessarily be used for that purpose. A portion of the lot is also planted in locust trees for the purpose of getting timber for cross-ties. We conclude that a legitimate past and present use of this lot is shown, and a reasonable necessity for its future use. For these reasons this lot should not have been escheated.

No present or reasonably necessary future use of lot No. 9 being shown, it follows that this lot should have been escheated.

Additional Tracts. As to the narrow strips of land adjoining defendant's right of way, and described in the amended petition, the evidence shows that they are planted in locust trees for the purpose of raising timber for ties. As passing or side tracks are required, they will be necessary for that purpose. The evidence shows that the lot in Bagdad is occupied by a section foreman. It was proper to refuse to escheat those lots.

[3] The petition is not defective because it fails to negative the idea of a reasonable necessity for the future use of the property for railroad purposes. In such an action, all that is necessary is to describe the property and to allege that it had been held for a longer period than five years, and was not proper or necessary for carrying on the legitimate business of the corporation. The reasonable necessity for its future use is a matter of defense.

Judgment reversed, both on original and cross appeals, and cause remanded, with directions to enter judgment escheating lot No. 9.

PROVIDENT SAV. LIFE ASSUR. SOC. OF NEW YORK v. SHEARER.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. EVIDENCE (§§ 432, 434*)—DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE—RULE.

Despite the general rule rejecting parol evidence to vary a written contract, such evidence in an action to cover premiums paid under an insurance policy is admissible to show want of consideration and fraud, and thus vary the terms of the written policy and a note executed by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1981-1989, 2005-2020; Dec. Dig. §§ 432, 434.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§§ 432, 434*)—APPLICATION FOR INSURANCE—CONTRADICTION OF TERMS.

While Ky. St. § 679, provides that every policy of insurance shall have attached to it a correct copy of the application, and unless so attached the application shall not be received as evidence in any controversy between the parties, the application, when made a part of the policy, is part of the contract, and, if the contract is assailed upon the ground of fraud and want of consideration, the application must go with it, and hence in such case it is not improper to admit parol evidence to contradict the terms of the application.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 1981-1989, 2005-2020; Dec. Dig. §§ 432, 434.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—FRAUD—EQUITABLE ESTOPPEL.

Where, through the false representations of an insurance agent, plaintiff was induced to accept a policy and pay premiums thereon, his acceptance and retention of the policy which correctly stated the terms of the contract will not estop him from maintaining an action to recover such premiums.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—ACTIONS TO RECOVER PREMIUMS—FRAUD.

In an action to recover premiums paid on insurance on the ground that it was without consideration and induced by fraudulent representations, evidence held insufficient to support the verdict for plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

5. EVIDENCE (§ 596*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY—PAROL EVIDENCE OVERTURNING WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Parol evidence sufficient to overturn a written contract should be clear and convincing, especially where it destroys the written contract or gives to the attacking party advantages that he could not have obtained unless the conditions and stipulations of the writing constituted the real contract between the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2446-2448; Dec. Dig. § 596.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 198*)—ACTIONS TO RECOVER PREMIUMS.

In an action against an insurance company to recover premiums paid on a life policy alleged to have been induced by fraudulent representations, defendant, which carried insurance on plaintiff's life for five years, is entitled to compensation therefor on recovery by plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 457-467; Dec. Dig. § 198.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County, Criminal, Common Law, and Equity Division.

Action by Patrick H. Shearer against the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society of New York. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Wm. Marshall Bullitt and Alexander G. Barret, both of Louisville, for appellant. Hall & Adams, of Covington, for appellee.

CARROLL, J. In March, 1896, the appellee, Shearer, procured from the appellant company a 10-year term policy for $5,000 in which the company obligated itself to pay the amount of the insurance only in the event the insured died before the expiration of the 10 years. In October, 1905, a few months before this policy expired, the appellant company proposed to issue to Shearer a new form of insurance for $5,000 under the 20-payment life plan, the policy to be dated back to March, 1896, in order that Shearer might have the benefit of the premium rate based on his age in 1896 in place of the higher rate he would be required to pay if his policy was dated in 1905. As a result of conferences between Sprout, the agent of appellant, and Shearer, the latter on October 26, 1905, made a written application to surrender his old policy and take out the new 20-payment life, which was to be dated March 27, 1896, to correspond with the date of the old policy. Soon after this the application was accepted and the new policy issued. As a part of the plan by which the old policy was surrendered and the new one issued, Shearer executed his note to the company for $1,826; this amount representing the reserve against the policy, which under the law the company was required to have either in money or in a secured note. The application made by Shearer for the new policy contained among others this clause: "The Provident Savings Life Assurance Society of New York agrees to loan to the assured the sum of $1,826 upon the security of said policy, and the said amount shall be a lien upon said policy when issued until the same is paid, and it is also understood and agreed that the said assured is hereby authorized to sign a collateral loan note to secure the repayment of said sum in the form in use by said society." The note Shearer signed was dated October 26, 1905, and reads in part: "For value received, I promise to pay to the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society of New York, or order, $1,826, with interest at the rate of 5% per annum, payable on the 27th day of March in each year. * * * The policy and all amounts payable thereon are hereby assigned, pledged and hypothecated to said society. * * * The assured has the privilege of paying this loan at any time prior to the termination of the policy. Should the policy become payable while this note is outstanding, the amount of the note, with any additional loans, and all interest due thereon, shall be deducted by said society from the amount due on this policy."

The new policy issued to Shearer obligated him to pay on the 27th day of March in each year an annual premium of $287.60, and Shearer paid these premiums for four years, which carried this policy up until March 27, 1910, at which time the fifth premium became due. On March 7, 1910, Shearer wrote to the company a letter in which he said, in substance, that he understood the value of the policy at the expiration of the 20 years would be $5,000 less the amount of the note he had executed for $1,826, and requested the company to advise him what the total amount of the indebtedness against the policy at that time was, and what it would be on each succeeding year until the expiration of the 20 years. In answer to this the company on March 16th wrote him and gave him the information he inquired for. On March 22d Shearer paid to the company $71.90 in cash, and executed his note for $215.70, the remainder of the premium due on March 27, 1910. This note was due on June 27, 1910, and on June 25th Shearer advised the company that he had concluded not to carry the insurance any longer, and did not pay the note. In January, 1911, he brought this suit against the company to recover from it $1,222.30, the full amount of the premiums he had paid each year from 1906 to 1910, inclusive, with interest thereon from the date of each payment, and in addition thereto $750 which he alleged was the value to him of the old policy which he surrendered to the company. His action was based on the ground that the company by false and fraudulent representations induced him to surrender his old policy and accept in place of it the new one. He averred that it was represented to him that the note he executed would not be a lien against the policy or an indebtedness against him, and that it was only required that he execute it to go through the form of complying with certain laws of the state of New York. He further averred that it was represented to him that the new policy in 20 years from its date, or in March, 1916, would become a paid-up policy for the face value of $5,000, with a cash surrender value of $3,620, and that he was induced by these representations to surrender his old policy and accept the new one, and did not learn of the deception and fraud that had been practiced on him until 1910 when he received the letter before mentioned from the company advising him that the note he executed was a lien against the policy and would be deducted from it. To this suit the company made a number of defenses, and upon a trial before a jury a verdict was returned in favor of Shearer for the premiums paid by him in 1906, 1907, 1908, 1909, and 1910, with interest on each from the date of its payment. A reversal is asked on several grounds, but we will only notice two—one that the request of appellant for a peremptory instruction should have been granted, and the other that the verdict is flagrantly against the evidence.

[1] In support of the proposition that a verdict should have been directed in its favor, the argument is made by counsel for appellant that it was not competent to contradict, by parol evidence, the stipulations in the note of $1,826, or the conditions of the application made by Shearer, because it is said the terms of a written contract cannot be impeached by parol evidence. The rule is elementary that the terms or conditions of a written contract, in the absence of fraud or mutual mistake in its execution, cannot be varied, or contradicted, or added to, or subtracted from, by prior or contemporaneous parol agreements or arrangements between the parties to the written memorial. Farmers' Bank of Wickliffe v. Wickliffe, 131 Ky. 787, 116 S. W. 249; Anthony v. Hudson, 131 Ky. 185, 114 S. W. 782, 133 Am. St. Rep. 231; Salzer v. Salzer, 141 Ky. 648, 133 S. W. 556; Sackett v. Maggard, 142 Ky. 500, 134 S. W. 888.

But the broadest application of this rule does not deny to a party the right to attack, in its entirety, with parol evidence, a contract for fraud or want of consideration. Any written contract, without reference to what form it may be put in, and without regard to the circumstances attending its execution, can be assailed as a whole with parol evidence for fraud or for want of consideration. If this were not true, a written contract, however fraudulent or destitute of consideration, could be enforced, and the party who signed a written obligation would be helpless to protect or defend himself against its enforcement, although he might be able to show, by the most convincing parol evidence, that it was procured by fraud or that there was no consideration for its execution. The exception that we have stated to the general rule rejecting parol evidence to vary a written contract is too well settled to need more than the mere citation of authorities. Stone v. Ramsey, 4 T. B. Mon. 236; Tribble v. Oldham, 5 J. J. Marsh. 137; Doyle v. Offutt, 135 Ky. 296, 122 S. W. 156; Cummings v. Cass, 52 N. J. Law, 77, 18 Atl. 972; Page on Contracts, § 1207; Greenleaf on Evidence, § 284; Lavalleur v. Hahn, 152 Iowa, 649, 132 N. W. 877.

[2] Equally untenable is the proposition that the admitted evidence was made incompetent by section 679 of the Kentucky Statutes providing, in substance, that every policy of insurance shall have attached to it a correct copy of the application, and, unless so attached, such application shall not be received as evidence in any controversy between the parties. The argument upon this point is that, as the application signed by Shearer stipulated that this note should be a lien upon the policy, it was not competent to contradict by parol this condition. Generally speaking, this is true, but when the entire contract of which the application is a part is attacked for fraud, as may be done, and the contract set aside upon this ground by parol evidence, if it be sufficient in quantity and quality, the application, being a part of the contract, must go with it, and the rule laid down in Southern States Mutual Life Ins. Co. v. Herlihy, 138 Ky. 359, 123 S. W. 91, and Prov. Savings Co. v. Withers, 132 Ky. 541, 116 S. W. 350, has no application. The court, therefore, did not commit error in refusing, at the instance of appellant, to take the case from the jury, as of course should have been done if the parol evidence offered by Shearer was incompetent.

[3] Nor should Shearer be estopped to seek a cancellation on the ground that he elected to keep the policy after notice of its conditions as the facts do not bring the case within the principle laid down in Hartford Life Ins. Co. v. Hanlon, 139 Ky. 346, 104 S. W. 729.

[4] The contention that the verdict was flagrantly against the evidence is more meritorious. The case for Shearer is put upon the ground that he was induced to surrender his old contract of insurance and accept the new by the false and fraudulent representations of the agent of appellant—and upon which he relied—that the note for $1,826, executed by him, would not be a lien upon the new policy or an obligation that he would be required to pay. The only evidence introduced to support this contention was the testimony of Shearer and his son, both of whom stated that the agent said that the only reason for requiring the note was to enable the insurance company to comply with certain laws of the state of New York, and that the note would not be a lien upon the policy or an obligation that the maker would be expected to pay. In contradiction to this evidence there is the written application signed by Shearer in which it is expressly stipulated that the note (describing it) shall be a lien upon the policy until paid, and the note itself sets out that Shearer agrees to pay the amount of it, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent., and that the policy is assigned and pledged to secure it. In addition to this, the evidence shows that each year before the annual premium became due the company sent Shearer a notice informing him when his premium would be due, as well as the interest on the note. The interest, however, was never paid. The agent who negotiated the transaction also flatly contradicts Shearer and his son and testifies that both of them fully understood the terms and effect of the writings, and that he made no statement whatever in conflict with these papers. As a circumstance tending strongly to support the testimony of the agent, it appears that, if Shearer's understanding of the contract was correct, he would have insurance when he was the age of 57 at the same rate that insurance was issued to persons 47 years of age, and in addition to this the policy would have a loan, as well as a cash surrender value, much larger than such policy would ordinarily have.

[5] The parol evidence sufficient to overturn a written contract should be clear and convincing, and especially should this be so when the parol evidence not only destroys the written contract but gives to the party attacking it advantages that he could not have obtained unless the conditions and stipulations of the writing constituted the real contract between the parties. Our opinion is that the parol evidence in behalf of Shearer, an intelligent, educated man, was not sufficient, under the circumstances of this case, to overcome the written evidences of the contract deliberately executed by him. The contract made by Shearer was not harsh or unreasonable. There was no hurry, or overreaching, or other badge of fraud in its execution. Shearer continued for about five years to receive protection under it, and annually, during this time, paid his premiums, and paid the last one in part after he had become dissatisfied with the policy, if he did not actually know all its conditions and terms. Written contracts would be virtually as insecure as parol contracts if they might be set aside under circumstances and facts such as appear in this case. We think the verdict was flagrantly against the evidence, and that the lower court should have granted a new trial on this ground.

[6] There is another feature of this case that needs to be noticed. If the judgment appealed from should be allowed to stand and the company be required to return to

Shearer the premiums he paid, with interest thereon, the necessary effect would be to give Shearer the full benefit of the policy during the time it was in force without any cost to him. During this time Shearer was protected by the policy, and if he had died the company would have been compelled to have paid the amount it agreed to pay in the contract of insurance. It is therefore very plain that, if this contract is to be canceled and rescinded, it should be done upon equitable terms. The insurance company should not be required to carry insurance upon the life of Shearer for nearly five years without receiving any premium therefor, nor should Shearer be allowed to recover the premiums and yet not pay the insurance company anything for the insurance he had upon his life during the period covered by these premiums. Therefore, if, upon another trial of the case, there is a verdict against the insurance company, as there was on the last trial, the lower court, before entering a judgment on this verdict, should ascertain from the pleadings and evidence the amount that Shearer should pay the company for the insurance he had during the time the policy was in force, and deduct this amount from the finding of the jury, and enter judgment for the remainder. He may also ascertain and give Shearer credit by the value of his old policy, if it had any, when he surrendered it. The parties, on a return of the case, may file such additional pleadings, and take, at the proper time, such evidence as may be necessary to enable the court, if the contract is rescinded, to rescind it upon equitable terms.

The judgment is reversed, with directions for a new trial in conformity with this opinion.

MEYER v. UNION LIGHT, HEAT & POWER CO.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. NEGLIGENCE (§ 23*)—"TURNTABLE DOCTRINE"—KNOWLEDGE OF OWNER.

The "turntable doctrine" is based upon the idea that a dangerous instrumentality has been constructed where children were in the habit of congregating, or at a place inviting to children, to the owner's knowledge, so that he ought to have anticipated that they would be attracted to it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Negligence, Cent. Dig. §§ 33, 34; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

2. NEGLIGENCE (§ 24*) — LANDOWNER'S KNOWLEDGE OF DANGER.

Plaintiff, a boy 10 years of age, while playing near a church lot, climbed over the brick wall surrounding it to get a ball, and accidentally caught hold of electrical apparatus placed in the yard by defendant, which injured him. Plaintiff was enabled to climb over the brick wall, which was 7 feet 8 inches high, by first climbing upon some rock piled against it, and thence upon a board fence close to the wall, and thence over the wall; but defendant had no knowledge that the rock was piled against the wall, or that a boy could climb over it, or that boys were in the habit of entering the churchyard from the adjacent lot. Held, that defendant was not liable for plaintiff's injuries, having no reason to anticipate that children would go into the churchyard and be injured.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Kenton County, Common Law and Equity Division.

Action by B. A. Meyer, Jr., by his next friend, against the Union Light, Heat, & Power Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Myers & Howard, of Covington, for appellant. Robert C. Simmons, of Covington, for appellee.

NUNN, J. Appellee was paid for lighting a church on Fifth street, in the city of Covington, and for the purpose of doing this it suspended its electric light wires from near the top of the building, down the east wall thereof, through a transformer which was located within about 1½ feet of the ground, and then into the basement of the building through a window directly under the transformer. This transformer, as we understand it, was for the purpose of regulating the electric current going into the building. There was built, we presume by the church people, on the east side of the church building a brick wall, about 7 feet 8 inches high. This wall began at the northeast corner of the building, extended east several feet to a board fence; thence ran south to a point where it connected with another wall of the church building, thus inclosing a small yard wherein appellee's electric wires and transformer were located. The board fence, which was about 3 feet lower than the brick wall, connected with the northeast corner thereof, and continued on the same line as the north wall of the small inclosure. It appears that for about two years prior to the injury herein complained of loose rock had been piled up against the rear of this brick wall and board fence to a depth of about 3 feet; that by going upon this rock, then to the top of the board fence, then to the top of the brick wall, an entrance could be easily had into this yard by going down a plank, one end of which was resting upon the ground within the yard, and the other against and near the top of the wall. Appellant, who was about 10 years of age at the time, and another little boy were playing ball in the vacant lot which was immediately back of the wall and board fence. One of them threw the ball, and it fell into the churchyard and stopped at a point near appellee's wires and transformer. Both of the boys started after the ball, but appellant reached it first, picked it up, started to return to his play, but stumbled in some way, lost his balance, and in an attempt to save himself from falling caught hold of the electric wires with his right hand, and the electric current burned his fingers, thumb, and arm, rendered him unconscious for a time, and crippled him for life.

Appellant instituted this action by his next friend to recover for his injuries, which he alleged were caused by appellant in negligently placing its wires and in leaving them unguarded, as they were dangerous, and further in allowing the insulation on the wires to become so decayed that it dropped off, leaving the wires exposed, thus rendering them more dangerous.

The testimony, without contradiction, showed the facts above stated, and that a number of children, before and after school hours and on Saturdays, used this vacant lot for a playground; that they would frequently enter the churchyard in playing their games; that this had been going on for at least two years prior to appellant's injury; and that none of them knew, especially appellant, that there was any danger in touching appellee's wires or transformer. Appellant's testimony showed that the transformer should have been placed 12 or 14 feet above the ground, instead of within $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet thereof; that the wires should have been incased in a pipe of some kind, or guarded by a netting in some way, so that a person could not come in contact with them; and that the insulation on the wires should have been kept in repair.

At the conclusion of the testimony, upon appellee's motion, the court gave the jury a peremptory instruction to find for appellee. This instruction was given upon the idea, as we understand it, that there was not the slightest proof showing that any one connected with appellee, or any of the church people, for that matter, had any knowledge or information that appellant, or any of the children mentioned, had been in the habit of entering this churchyard or that they had entered it at all for any purpose.

Appellant's counsel contends that the case should have been submitted to the jury, as the boy's testimony showed that appellant had so placed and left its wires and transformer as to render them dangerous; that the court had a right to assume that appellee knew of, or at least had a right to anticipate, the use of the yard by the boys, as the proof showed that it had been so used, without objection from any one, for the past two years. He further contends that the placing and leaving of the wires and transformer for more than two years, as heretofore described, was, of itself, actionable negligence on the part of appellee, and that if appellee had given them the attention required by ordinary care it would or must have known of the passway into the yard, and that the children were using the yard for play. For these reasons he claims he was entitled to an instruction authorizing the jury to find for him, if appellee knew of or had reasons to anticipate that the boys were in the habit of using the churchyard. This is the real question in the case, and it is one not easy of solution.

As stated, there is not the slightest testimony showing that appellee had any knowledge or information that the boys were in the habit of entering the churchyard from the adjacent lot when playing there; nor had it any reasons to anticipate their going into the yard, except that boys of their age might be expected to go into any inclosure they could enter.

[1] The rule of law governing such cases has not been extended as far as claimed by appellant's counsel. The "turntable doctrine" was established upon the idea that something dangerous to children had been constructed at a place where children were in the habit of passing or congregating, or at a place easy of access and inviting to children, and that these facts were known to the owner of the dangerous structure. In the case of Bransom's Adm'r v. Labrot, etc., 81 Ky. 638, 50 Am. Rep. 198, the administrator was allowed to recover for the death of a child, which was caused by the overturning of a lumber pile, and the court quoted with approval, in that case, from Hargreaves v. Deacon, 25 Mich. 1, the following: "The owner of private grounds is under no obligation to keep them in a safe condition for the benefit of trespassers, idlers, bare licensees, or others who may come upon them, not by invitation express or implied, but for pleasure or to gratify their curiosity however innocent or laudable their purpose may be." That opinion proceeded, however, by saying that the rule quoted did not apply to that case, as the lumber pile had been situated on the lot for many years, and, by license of the owner, the lot was used by the public as a passway and by the children as a playground, meaning, of course, if the lot where the lumber was piled had not been so used with the knowledge of the owner of the lumber, the rule quoted would have applied. The cases announcing this doctrine do it upon the idea that the dangerous instrument is attractive and inviting to children, and that the owner thereof, for these reasons, might have reasons to anticipate that children would congregate at the place the thing is located and receive injuries. That rule cannot be applied in the case at bar, as there was nothing attractive about the place where the boy was injured. He went there for the purpose only of securing his ball. The inclosure was simply a yard by the side of the church building and was inclosed, as heretofore described, without any doors, gates, or other opening to permit ingress. It was not shown that appellee, or any person in charge of the church and yard, had any knowledge or information of the stone or rock being piled up against the fence and brick wall, or that there was a plank placed on the inside of the inclosure, so that the boy could go from the top of the wall to the ground inside the yard.

The case of Graves v. Washington Water Power Co., 44 Wash. 675, 87 Pac. 956, 11 L. R. A. (N. S.) 452, is very similar to the one at bar. In that case a boy, 15 years of age, climbed up a pier of a bridge, a distance of about 30 feet, where he was injured by coming in contact with a wire charged with electricity. The claim was made that the braces on the pier formed a kind of a lattice work, which served as a ladder and made the structure an attractive one to the boy, who, it is asserted, went up to a point where pigeons nested and received his injury as stated. In that case the court refused to allow the boy to recover, and said: "The things which constituted the attraction which, it is claimed, drew him to this place were features connected with the river, the bridge, and the pigeons, and were matters for the existence of which appellant was not responsible." In the case at bar the boy's only attraction to the place where he was injured was the recovery of his ball.

The case of Mayfield Water & Light Co. v. Webb's Adm'r, 129 Ky. 395, 111 S. W. 712, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 909, 18 L. R. A. (N. S.) 179, 130 Am. St. Rep. 469, is also very much like the case under consideration. In that case a little boy was killed by coming in contact with an electric wire strung on poles 18 feet above the ground. He reached the wire by going up the guy wires and the pole. This court said the owner need not anticipate that children will reach such wires by climbing poles or walking up guy wires. In that case the wire, at the point where the boy was injured, was defective, and this makes the case peculiarly applicable to the case at bar.

[2] It follows that the lower court did not err in giving the peremptory instruction, as appellee's transformer and wires were located inside the yard, which was inclosed by a solid brick wall 7 feet 8 inches high; and it had neither actual nor constructive notice of any use of the premises by any one.

Judgment affirmed.

COOMES BROS. v. GRIGSBY & CO. et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 295*)—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Evidence held not to sustain a finding that certain mules and hogs were ever the property of defendants, or were transferred by them to their mother to defraud their creditors.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 867-875; Dec. Dig. § 295.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS—EQUITY CASE.

While the Court of Appeals gives considerable weight to a chancellor's fact findings, and it will not reverse where the evidence conflicts on a mere question of credibility, still, when on the face of the record his judgment is not supported by the weight of the evidence, it will be reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3970-3978; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

3. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1009*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

While a verdict will not be disturbed unless palpably against the evidence, a chancellor's findings have not the same weight, as he does not hear and see the witnesses.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Nelson County.

Action by Grigsby & Company and others against Coomes Brothers. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded for a judgment dismissing petition.

Nat W. Halstead, E. E. McKay, and S. W. Eskew, all of Bardstown, for appellants. C. T. Atkinson and J. Smith Barlow, both of Bardstown, for appellees.

HOBSON, C. J. The firm of Coomes Bros. made an assignment on November 10, 1910, to W. T. Spalding for the benefit of their creditors. The firm was composed of three brothers, Bowman, William, and Floyd Coomes; the latter being an infant. At the time of the assignment, the firm owed Grigsby & Co. a debt of about $500 which was unsecured. Grigsby & Co. brought this action against the Coomes brothers, their mother, Annie E. Coomes, and the assignee, W. T. Spalding, charging in their petition that the firm owned two mules worth $325 and ten hogs worth $94.95, which they had not included in their schedule or turned over to the assignee, and had fraudulently turned over to their mother, Annie E. Coomes. Answers were filed controverting the allegations of the petition, and on final hearing the circuit court adjudged the plaintiff the relief sought in their petition, directing the assignee to take charge of the property and hold it for the benefit of the creditors of Coomes Bros. From this judgment the mother, Annie E. Coomes, and Coomes Bros., appeal.

Jeff D. Coomes, the father of the Coomes brothers, and the husband of Annie E. Coomes, died in the spring of the year 1910, largely indebted. After his death the exemptions allowed to the widow and the infant children under the statute were set apart. There were six boys and two girls, and, as we understand the evidence, only two of the boys were of age. Bowman, William, and Floyd were cultivating a farm which they had rented and on which they lived not far from their father's, and were also doing business as Coomes Bros. in baling hay and the like. The father had bought his farm, but he had not paid for it, and the widow and the infant children remained on this. The proof for the defendants by Mrs. Coomes and her sons is, in effect, that she desired to put in a considerable crop of wheat on the farm, and, not having teams enough to put the crop in, desired to buy two mules to be used in putting in the wheat crop; that she had her two sons to buy the two mules for her, they and she executing the note for the purchase money. The mules were brought to her place, and used in putting in the wheat crop by the younger boys, and were kept on her place. They were never used by Coomes Bros., and were in her possession at the time of the assignment. C. R. Barnes, from whom they bought the mules, states practically the same facts as they do as to what the trade was, testifying that they told him their mother was purchasing the mules and that they asked permission to take the mules to her place so that she might see them before the trade was concluded.

The proof as to the hogs by the defendants is that Mrs. Coomes, at the suggestion of her sons, concluded in August that she ought to get some hogs to make her meat for another year; that Coomes Bros. owed her about $40, and at her suggestion one of them bought the ten hogs from a neighbor, paying thereon $44, and agreeing to pay the balance, $50. Her son testifies that he told the person from whom he bought the hogs that they were for his mother. He testifies that nothing of the sort was said. The remainder of the price of the hogs was not paid or secured until after the assignment, when Mrs. Coomes and W. T. Spalding, as her surety, gave her note for it. The hogs, like the mules, were taken to Mrs. Coomes' place and were there in her possession from the time of her purchase until this controversy arose.

On the other hand, the plaintiff proved by two witnesses that, on the day of the assignment, the elder Grigsby asked C. R. Barnes if the Coomes brothers owed him anything, and Barnes said they owed him a note for $325 for a pair of mules; that he was safe, as he had their mother on the note as security. Barnes says that he said: "I sold them a pair of mules out there a few weeks ago, but look to Mrs. Coomes for that; Mr. Grigsby asked me if she was on the note, and I said 'Yes.'" He also testifies that a day or two after this, when Grigsby called his attention to the mules not being in the schedule, he said, "Well, I suppose not because they said they bought them for their mother, and wouldn't suppose they would list them as a part of their assets." Frank Coomes testified that he had a talk with the Coomes brothers about the pair of mules, and asked them what they gave for them, and they said $325, and he asked them why they were not working them, and they said they did not care to butcher them; they were young mules. P. B. Crume, the man from whom the hogs were bought, also testified that, at or about the time of the assignment, some of the Coomes brothers had a conversation with him in which they said, if he said nothing about them buying the hogs from him, that nobody would know they had bought them, and they would turn the hogs over to their mother, or give them to their mother; that they said the hogs would not have to go into the assignment. He also testified that when he went over to see about the hogs after the assignment they claimed that the hogs were bought for their mother, and that she said that they had not fulfilled their contract by giving him the note, and whatever the boys did about the hogs would be all right with her. He was then proposing to take back part of the hogs inasmuch as he had not been paid all the purchase money. He also testified that, in speaking about the mules, Mrs. Coomes said she thought they would be thrown into the assignment. She referred to them in that way, while she seemed to think the mules ought to belong to her. "She said, 'I expect the mules will have to go into the assignment,' and that the mules were bought for her, and 'why they would have to go in I don't know.'" R. W. Havelan testified that he had a conversation with William or Bowman Coomes on the day of the administrator's sale of his father's property, and that he said if there was a crowd enough there he was going to sell his mules, and that after the sale he told him there were no mule buyers there, and he did not sell any mules.

[1] This is, in substance, the evidence heard on the trial. We think it is totally insufficient to show that the mules or hogs were the property of Coomes Bros. or were fraudulently transferred to their mother by them. The testimony as to what Barnes said about the mules is only competent to contradict his testimony, and his testimony is confirmed by the testimony of Mrs. Coomes and her two sons and a number of circumstances. That Mrs. Coomes in fact used the mules, and that she claimed them as her mules long before there was any idea of an assignment, is proved by a witness who lived on the place. The statements of Coomes Bros. shown by the plaintiffs are at best very uncertain evidence, and, when all the facts and circumstances are considered, the great weight of the evidence is in favor of Mrs. Coomes. It is undoubtedly true that both Mrs. Coomes and her sons, not knowing the law applicable or their rights under the law, were in doubt where they stood after the assignment was made, and that their ignorance and apprehension led them to say the things that were proved by the plaintiffs. But these utterances are not sufficient to overcome the undoubted fact that both the hogs and the mules were taken to Mrs. Coomes' place when they were bought.

and put in her possession and kept in her possession and control; that she needed them, and, so far as the evidence shows, the boys did not need them. It was not unnatural that the mother so lately widowed should have her boys do the trading for her, and it was not unnatural that they should speak of the property as the mules and the hogs they had bought. The evidence as to the hogs is not as clear as that as to the mules; but, summing it all up, we are satisfied the transaction was in good faith and was not made with any view of defrauding or affecting in any way the creditors of Coomes Bros. At that time they were doing considerable business, and no thought of an assignment was in their minds.

[2] It is true that in an equity case we give considerable weight to the finding of the chancellor on a question of fact, and that we will not reverse his judgment on a mere question of the credibility of the witnesses where the evidence is conflicting. But as we have held in many cases, we read the record for ourselves, and, when on the face of the record the chancellor's judgment is not supported by the weight of the evidence, it will not be affirmed. Deatley v. Tolle, 96 S. W. 920, 29 Ky. Law Rep. 1111; Howell v. Union Grocery Co., 113 S. W. 912; Northrup v. Summers, 132 Ky. 156, 116 S. W. 699; Sommer v. Ross, 116 S. W. 1181; Quigley v. Beam, 137 Ky. 325, 125 S. W. 727; Prewitt v. Glasscock, 137 Ky. 779, 127 S. W. 145; Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Madisonville Savings Bank, 141 Ky. 374, 132 S. W. 540.

[3] The verdict of a properly instructed jury will not be disturbed unless it is palpably against the evidence. The judgment of the chancellor is given considerable weight, but it is not treated as the verdict of a properly instructed jury, for the reason that he does not see and hear the witnesses and must simply determine the case from the record, and when his judgment is not in accord with the weight of the evidence it will be reversed.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for a judgment dismissing the petition.

CROSTHWAITE v. CROSTHWAITE et al.
(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 55*)—PROBATE—HEARING—EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF TESTATOR.

Evidence held sufficient to show that testator was not competent to make a will.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 137-161; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1043*)—HARMLESS ERROR—REFUSAL OF CONTINUANCE.

Where a hearing in a will contest was on November 14th set for November 20th, and the contestee moved for a continuance on the ground that she was in a nervous condition, incapable of advising her counsel or appearing as a witness, and on the ground of the absence of a material witness, and the court refused a general continuance, but postponed the trial four days, at which time both sides announced ready, and all of the witnesses desired by contestee were present and testified in her behalf, and she was able to testify and advise her counsel, the refusal to grant a general continuance was not error.

3. JURY (§ 142*)—ESTOPPEL TO OBJECT—CHALLENGE OF JUROR FOR CAUSE.

A juror summoned in a will contest, where the mental capacity of the testator was in issue, was challenged for cause, and stated that he knew testator well and had read of the contest on the ground of his mental incapacity, and that whether he had an opinion as to such incapacity would depend on when the will was made, the date of which he did not then know, and counsel for appellant did not then inform him as to the date of the will, so that he might question him as to his capacity at that date. Held that, after an adverse verdict, the appellant was estopped from complaining of the error, if any, in overruling the challenge for cause.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 500, 630; Dec. Dig. § 142.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—OPINIONS—EXAMINATION OF WITNESS.

Where witnesses in a will contest were examined in detail as to their qualifications to have an opinion on the mental capacity of testator, and were permitted to state that he knew the objects of his bounty and the value of his estate and had a disposing mind, the refusal to permit them to say whether testator was of sound or unsound mind was not error, since the question had been fully answered.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Fayette County.

Will contest between Matt Crosthwaite and others and Lula D. Crosthwaite. Judgment for contestants, and Lula D. Crosthwaite, contestee, appeals. Affirmed.

A. F. Byrd and J. F. Wallace, both of Lexington, for appellant. T. T. Forman, Forman & Forman, W. C. G. Hobbs, and Nat Hobbs, all of Lexington, for appellees.

CARROLL, J. This is a contest over the will of Perry Crosthwaite, who died in Lexington in April, 1911, leaving an estate worth between $23,000 and $25,000. In March, 1910, at the time he made the will in controversy, he was 86 years old. In his will, after directing the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, and nominating his executor, he gave to his daughter, Lula D. Crosthwaite, the appellant here, $10,000. To his daughter Jennie R. Hobbs he gave $1,000. To his wife, Mary, he gave the sum of $100. The balance of his estate he devised equally to his six children, Matt, Lula D., Sam H., Harry M., and William Crosthwaite, and Jennie R. Hobbs, share and share alike. He also gave to his daughter Lula D. Crosthwaite all of his household and kitchen furniture that she might desire to have. In the will he assigned as a reason for giving to his daughter Lula D. $10,000, in addition to her share of the residuary estate, "her years of tender affection in nursing and caring for me, and for her great sacrifice in caring for me during my years of sickness and health." As a reason for only giving his wife $100 he said in his will: "I have been a kind and loving husband to her, and during our married life have deeded to her real estate and personal property. I have advanced her money and kept up her property in repair and given her all the money she desired during our married life, and she has an abundance of property in her own name to keep her comfortable the rest of her days." The will, when offered for probate in the county court, was rejected, and from the order rejecting the will Lula D. Crosthwaite prosecuted an appeal to the circuit court. Upon a trial in the circuit court before a jury a verdict was returned, finding that the paper offered was not the will of Perry Crosthwaite, and from the judgment on this verdict Lula D. Crosthwaite prosecutes this appeal.

Four grounds are relied on for reversal: (1) Because the verdict of the jury was flagrantly against the evidence, and a new trial should have been granted by the lower court; (2) because the court erred in refusing a continuance of the case on request of appellant; (3) because the court failed to sustain the challenge of the appellant to one of the jurors for cause; (4) because the court erred in failing to permit Burgin, Miller, and other witnesses in behalf of appellant to testify as to the soundness of mind of the testator.

[1] Taking up these assigned errors in the order in which they have been stated, the first one makes it necessary that we should state briefly the evidence introduced by the parties to the contest. The testator, as before stated, made the will in contest about a year before he died, and when he was 86 years of age. He had been married twice, and his six surviving children were the issue of his first wife, who died some 30 years before he did. He was married to his second wife, who survived him, 20 years or more before his death; but no children were born of this marriage.

The appellant is a maiden lady, and was about 55 years old when the will was written. For many years she had suffered severely from a nervous ailment, and is shown by the evidence to have rather an excitable, nervous disposition, and little or no capacity for earning her own living. She had always made her home with her father, who made comfortable provision for her support, furnishing her not only with the necessities but with some of the luxuries of life, and if the testator had been of disposing mind the provision made for her could not be considered either unnatural or unreasonable.

All the witnesses agree that the last wife of the testator, who has a comfortable estate in her own right, is a most estimable lady, and was at all times kind and attentive to her husband, and especially faithful in the performance of her wifely duties in the latter years of his life. It is also conceded that the testator, until about four years before the will was executed, was an active, capable business man; but that about 1907 he commenced failing mentally as well as physically, and continued to decline until his death.

The paper in controversy was the only will the testator ever made, and several witnesses testified that he often said that the law made as good a will as he wanted, although there is evidence that he expressed his intention on more than one occasion, before the paper in issue was executed, of making suitable provision for the appellant, and it is also shown that after the execution of this paper he said he had made provision for her. It is, however, quite evident that the testator never seriously contemplated making a will, and this theory is abundantly supported by the uncontroverted fact that he never attempted to make one until he was 86 years of age. It appears from the evidence that the appellant, in December, 1909, drafted, as she testifies, at his request, a paper intended to be a will, in which he made the same provision for her that was made in the paper offered as his will. This paper, written by appellant, was some time afterward taken to her attorney, J. Franklin Wallace, and he, after consulting with the testator, wrote the paper in issue and gave it to appellant, who retained it until it was signed by the testator, in March, 1910. On the day the paper was signed by the testator, his wife was absent from home, as appellant knew, and she testified she selected this date because she was absent.

One of the attesting witnesses, Dr. F. O. Young, had been for 25 years the family physician of the testator, and was intimately acquainted with him, both personally and in a professional capacity. He states that he was telephoned by the appellant to come to the house of the testator, and that when he arrived there he saw for the first time the will, which was in the possession of appellant. Asked to relate what transpired and to describe the condition of the testator, he said: "I do not know that I can tell everything about it. I read the will over to him. At first Miss Lula said there wasn't any use to read it to him; just let him sign it, and I said, 'No, I will read it to him.' and I read it to him, and he sat there in a dazed kind of condition. After I got through, I don't remember who asked him to sign it. Anyhow, it was pushed over to him, and a bottle of ink passed to him, and he, in a very trembling condition, signed it." He further testified that the testator at the time was suffering from senile dementia and was in a very feeble condition, both mentally and physically; that he did not make any comment whatever when he signed the paper and did not request any person to witness it, and did not recognize him at first when he went into the room. He also testified that, in his opinion, the testator did not have sufficient mind to know the meaning of the paper, and that he knew when he attested the will as a witness that the testator was not capable of making a will; that after it was written and signed he took possession of the paper at the request of appellant, the testator not giving any direction about it. Asked why he signed the paper believing at the time that the testator did not have sufficient mental capacity to execute a will, he said: "I don't know why I did. I wished often I had not." He further said that he did not know the importance of his signature, or that it would be necessary to prove that the testator was of sound mind before the paper could be probated as his last will.

The other attesting witness, Thresa Horine, testifies in substance that she was a servant in the house of the testator and was called on, in connection with Dr. Young, to witness the will; that at the time she had been employed in the family for nearly a year. She said that she had never had any business conversation or transaction with the testator, and that on more than one occasion she noticed he failed to recognize members of his family, and particularly his son, Sam Crosthwaite, who lived in the house with him. This witness further said that at the time the will was signed the testator was quite feeble, but was sitting up in a chair by the bed, and that during the time she was there it was his habit to get up about 9 o'clock in the morning and then go to bed at 11 and get up again about 2 in the afternoon and again retire between 4 and 5.

A number of other witnesses, business and professional men, who were intimately acquainted with the testator, gave convincing evidence as to his mental and physical failing for three or four years before his death. Some of them testified that he would get lost on the streets of Lexington where he had lived for many years, and others said that he often failed to recognize his nearest and best friends, and yet others that he did not know what estate he owned.

On the other hand, several witnesses of intelligence and character, who were well acquainted with the testator, testified that he was competent to make a will; but we think the evidence shows that he was not, and so we cannot direct a new trial on the ground that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence.

[2] The next assigned error is the failure of the trial court to grant a continuance of the case. It appears from the record that on the 14th of November, 1911, the case was set down for trial on November 20th. On this date the appellant moved for a continuance, and, in support of this motion, filed her own affidavit and the affidavit of her counsel and her physician. One of the grounds for continuance was that appellant was in a nervous, delicate condition and incapable of giving to her counsel the advice and assistance they needed in the trial of the case, and unfit, on account of her temporary mental and physical condition, to appear as a witness. Another ground was the absence of material witnesses. Upon considering this motion the court refused a general continuance of the case, but postponed the trial four days. When it was again called for trial, both sides announced ready; all of the witnesses appellant desired were present in person and testified in her behalf, except one, whose deposition was read, and the appellant was present in court, and judging from her evidence, which we have carefully read, was fully competent and qualified, not only to make a good witness in her own behalf, but to give to her counsel such advice and assistance as an intelligent client could. The court did not commit any error in overruling the motion for a general continuance.

[3] The next alleged error is the failure of the trial judge to sustain a challenge for cause to Charles Gaitskill, who was summoned as a juror. It appears from the record that this juror was challenged for cause, but the court overruled the motion to excuse him for cause, and, when a panel of 18 qualified jurors was offered to counsel on both sides, this juror was not stricken from the panel by either side, although each side, peremptorily and as a matter of right, excused three of the jurors. What occurred, when this juror was examined and challenged for cause, appears in the bill of exceptions signed by the trial judge, and also in a bystanders' bill, made up at the instance of counsel for appellant. In the bill of exceptions signed by the judge it is recited that: "In selecting and impaneling a jury for the trial of this case, Charles Gaitskill, one of the jurors who tried this case, stated under oath when being examined by the attorneys and by the court, touching his qualifications as a juror to try the case, that he was acquainted with Perry Crosthwaite during his lifetime, and knew him well, and that he had read in the papers published in Lexington an account of the making of the will in contest and that there was a contest over his will as to his mental capacity. When asked by counsel for appellant as to whether he had an opinion as to the mental capacity of said Perry Crosthwaite to make a will and dispose of his property, he answered that it would depend upon when the will was made. Now, the juror was not informed as to the date of the making of the will, and made no further answer as to whether he at the time had an opinion as to that subject. When asked by the court as to whether he had any opinion that would interfere with an unbiased verdict, after he had heard the evidence and the instructions of the court, he replied that he had not, and the court thereupon overruled the challenge for cause." In the bystanders' bill it is set out that this juror said he had formed an opinion as to the merits of the case from what he had heard and read of it, and also from his personal acquaintance with the testator, but did not know whether he had ever expressed the opinion. The bystanders' bill also recites that this juror, when asked by counsel for appellant as to whether he had an opinion as to the capacity of the testator to make a will, answered that it would depend on when the will was made, but that he was not informed as to the date of the making of the will.

It would seem from this that counsel for appellant were not at the time very desirous of removing this juror from the panel, because they could easily have informed him as to the date of the will, and the juror could then have readily said whether he had an opinion as to the capacity of the testator to make a will at that date. If this information had been given to the juror by counsel for appellant and he had said that, in his opinion, the testator was not competent to make a will in March, 1910, we have no doubt that the trial judge would, on his own motion, have excused the juror, and certainly he would have done so upon the request of counsel for appellant.

It is, of course, of the highest importance to parties to litigation, as well as to the correct administration of justice, that jurors selected to try a case should be without bias or prejudice for or against either of the parties, and be entirely free from any fixed opinion that might lean their judgment to one side or the other. But counsel for the unsuccessful party will not be heard to complain, after they have lost the case, that a juror was disqualified for service, when they accepted him with knowledge of his disqualification or failed to show his disqualification by asking such questions as they at the time knew would develop it.

If a party knows that a juror is disqualified, or knows, from answers made by a juror when examined touching his qualifications, that he can be disqualified by giving him information as to some material fact that the juror is at the time ignorant of, but that will certainly be developed on the trial, and he fails to challenge the juror or refrains from asking him questions that he knows will disqualify him, he will be estopped, after an adverse verdict, to obtain a new trial on the ground that the juror was disqualified to sit in the case. When a party knowingly and freely takes the risk of accepting as favorable to him a juror that he could have removed, he must take the consequences, and, if it develops that the juror had some bias or leaning, he cannot complain. If this were not true, it is manifest that the party who saw proper to take his chances on getting a verdict with the juror that he might have removed would be given an unfair advantage over his opponent. The record does not show appellant entitled to complain of the error, if there was one, in overruling the motion to challenge this juror for cause.

[4] Another ground urged for reversal is that the trial court refused to permit several witnesses offered by appellant to answer the question whether in the opinion of the witness the testator was of sound or unsound mind. All of the witnesses who were asked this question were examined in detail as to their qualifications to have an opinion touching the mental capacity of the testator, and they were permitted to say that in their opinion he had mind and memory sufficient to know the objects of his bounty, the value and character of his estate, and to dispose of it according to a fixed purpose of his own. After being permitted to answer every pertinent question that could throw light on the knowledge of the witness as to the competency of the testator, and allowed to express an opinion favorable to his ability to make a will, it was not error to refuse to permit witnesses to say whether the testator was of sound or unsound mind, as this question was fully answered in the other answers given by them.

Upon the whole case we do not find any error that would justify us in disturbing the judgment of the lower court, and it is affirmed.

JUDGMENT (§ 606*) — OBSTRUCTIONS — RIGHTS OF ACTION — PERMANENT INJURIES.

Where the builders of a railroad wrongfully blasted rock into a river so as to divert its channel and in case of high water cause a riparian owner's land to be overflowed, separate actions may be recovered for each of the recurring injuries, and a recovery by the landowner will not bar his grantees.

CLAY, O. In the year 1910 and 1911 the Washtoto & Black Mountain Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kentucky, was engaged in constructing a railroad along the Poor fork of the Cumberland river. The contract for doing the work of grading, excavating, etc., was let to the Callahan Construction Company, which in turn contracted with J. M. Brooks & Sons to do the work. John L. Turner and Kenton Cornett owned a small tract of land on the opposite side of the river from where the grading, blasting, and excavation were being done. Upon this property are situated an ordinary storehouse, a barn, and a gristmill and suitable millrace. Charging that the railroad company, the contractor, Callahan Construction Company, and the subcontractor, J. M. Brooks & Sons, blasted rock out into the river and so diverted the flow of the stream as to cause it to run over their land and injure their mill and other property, plaintiffs, John L. Turner and Kenton Cornett, brought this action to recover damages. At the conclusion of the plaintiffs' evidence, the court directed a verdict in favor of the defendants. Judgment was entered accordingly, and plaintiffs appeal.

It appears that the property in question was purchased by plaintiffs from J. J. Huff by deed dated January 23, 1911. Prior to that time the construction of the railroad at a point just opposite the property had been begun. At this point there was a cliff of solid stone formation. To reduce the cliff to the required grade it was necessary to do considerable blasting. In doing this large quantities of stone were thrown into the river just opposite the mill property. The stone fell out into the river for a considerable distance. The defendants made no effort to remove it. The result was that the natural flow and current of the river was changed, and the water so diverted that it ran over the land of plaintiffs and injured both the land and the mill. Whether or not any blasting was done after plaintiffs purchased the property in question does not satisfactorily appear. It does appear, however, that nearly all of the blasting had been done prior to that time. After that time there was a high tide in the river, and considerable damage was done to the mill property.

After Huff sold to the plaintiffs, and on May 3, 1911, he himself brought suit against J. M. Brooks & Sons and the Callahan Construction Company to recover for damages to the property. He compromised the suit for the sum of $55. The receipt which he gave recited that the sum given him was in full settlement and compromise of all damages done to his property by J. M. Brooks & Sons or the Callahan Construction Company on account of J. M. Brooks & Sons' blasting and building the Washtoto & Black Mountain Railroad through his premises, and in full settlement of the damage suit brought by him against J. M. Brooks & Sons and the Callahan Construction Company in the Harlan circuit court on May 3, 1911.

Defendants insist that as the blasting was all done, and the property permanently injured, prior to the time of its purchase by plaintiffs, the right of action for such injury was in Huff alone, and that, as plaintiffs purchased the property in its depreciated condition, they are not entitled to recover. If this were a case of a permanent structure, lawfully and properly built, the contention of the defendants would be sound, for in that event there could be only one recovery for all damages, past, present, and future, and the vendor, Huff, alone would be entitled to recover. L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Lambert, 110 S. W. 305, 33 Ky. Law Rep. 199; L. & N. R. R. Co. v. Orr, 91 Ky. 109, 15 S. W. 8, 12 Ky. Law Rep. 756; Hay v. City of Lexington, 114 Ky. 669, 71 S. W. 867, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1495; Richmond v. Gentry, 136 Ky. 319, 124 S. W. 337, 136 Am. St. Rep. 255; Stickley v. C. & O. Ry. Co., 93 Ky. 323, 20 S. W. 261, 14 Ky. Law Rep. 417. But even in the case of a permanent structure, if the structure be unlawfully or negligently built, and by reason thereof injury is inflicted from time to time, there may be recurring recoveries. City of Louisville v. Coleburne, 108 Ky. 420, 56 S. W. 681, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 64; Klosterman v. C. & O. R. Co., 56 S. W. 820, 22 Ky. Law Rep. 192; Finley v. Williamsburg, 71 S. W. 502, 24 Ky. Law Rep. 1338; Madisonville, Hartford & Eastern R. Co. et al. v. Graham, 147 Ky. 604, 144 S. W. 737. This is not a case of a structure. The act of the defendants in blasting the stone into the river, and permitting it to remain there to the injury of others, was not based on any semblance of right. Being unlawful and wrongful from the very outset, we see no way in which it may become right as to the owners of the land, so long as any recurring injury occurs, unless by release or grant, or the payment of a sum covering all damages, past, present, and future. Until this be done, or the nuisance be abated, recoveries may be had for each recurring injury. As recoveries may be had for each recurring injury, it follows that the right of action for each recurring injury is in the owner of the premises at the time the injury results, and a payment to a former owner after he has parted with title for injuries resulting to the property while owned by him is no defense to an action by a subsequent owner for injuries to the premises occurring after his purchase. As there was evidence tending to show an injury to the property after its purchase by the plaintiffs, and that this injury resulted from an unlawful act of the defendants in blasting the stones into the river and diverting its flow, it follows that the trial court erred in giving a peremptory in favor of defendants.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial consistent with this opinion.

ROWELL.

(Court of Appeals of Kentucky. Dec. 20, 1912.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 315*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PLEADING.

In an action by a passenger injured by the sudden stopping of the car on which she was riding, the fact that it was not derailed will not warrant a peremptory instruction because of variance, though her petition alleged that her injuries were caused by the carelessness of defendants in the construction and operation of the tracks and trains, and that the coach in which plaintiff was riding was wrecked, derailed, and thrown off the track; the negligence counted on not being the derailment.

2. CARRIERS (§ 320*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—QUESTION FOR JURY.

In an action by a passenger injured by the sudden stopping of a train, part of the cars of which were derailed by the opening of a switch, evidence on that issue of negligence held sufficient to go to the jury.

3. CARRIERS (§ 306*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—LIABILITY FOR ACTS OF SERVANTS.

Where the trains of one railroad company were run over tracks leased from a second, which were jointly used by it and a third, all three companies are liable as principals to passengers injured by the act of a switchman of the third company who opened a switch, under a train of the first.

4. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries caused by jolting resulting from a quick, sudden stop, where it appeared that plaintiff did not tell the railroad company's servants that she was injured, evidence that they did not assist her from the coach was improperly admitted.

5. EVIDENCE (§ 548*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—PHYSICIANS.

Where a physician examines one to qualify himself as a witness, he cannot state what the party detailed as the history of her case, although the rule is otherwise where the physician is called to administer treatment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2365; Dec. Dig. § 548.*]

6. EVIDENCE (§ 501*)—EXPERT EVIDENCE—OPINION EVIDENCE.

One, not a medical expert, cannot testify that prior to the alleged injuries plaintiff was a well woman, but should be required to state the facts and the difference in appearance of plaintiff before and after the accident.

7. CARRIERS (§ 317*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—EVIDENCE.

In an action against a railroad company for injuries caused plaintiff by the sudden jolt or jar of a train in stopping, evidence by other passengers that there was no such jolt or jar as would throw a person about in a seat is admissible.

8. DAMAGES (§ 132*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—EXCESSIVE DAMAGES.

In an action by a female plaintiff to recover damages for injuries claimed to have been caused by the sudden stopping of the railroad train on which she was a passenger, an award of $7,500 is excessive, where it appeared that her present condition might well be the result of previous trouble with her genitive organs, and the medical testimony tended to show that her claim of injuries from jolt or jar causing hemorrhages from the bowels was unfounded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Damages, Cent. Dig. §§ 372-385, 396; Dec. Dig. § 132.*]

9. CARRIERS (§ 319*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGERS—PUNITIVE DAMAGES.

Where the servant of a railroad company turned a switch under a passenger train which was in motion, causing a derailment, punitive damages are properly allowed; the conduct of the servant showing a wanton and reckless disregard for human life.

10. TRIAL (§ 125*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL—SCOPE OF ARGUMENT.

Leitchfield to Louisville, boarded one of the Illinois Central Railroad trains at Leitchfield. She was accompanied by her young son. She first got into the coach next to the rear coach, which was a chair car. Later on she took a seat in the chair car, near the front on the right-hand side. When it reached a point near Fourteenth and Magnolia streets in Louisville, the train, which, according to her evidence, was running rapidly, suddenly lunged forward and then backward. She was sitting in a chair putting on her cloak, and had her arms up. The jerk of the train caused her right side, near the waistline, and her arm to strike the chair or the window—she did not know which. The blow made her sick and dizzy, and gave her a pain in her head, back, and side. She remained in the coach until every one had left except an old man. Upon leaving the coach, she walked to Twelfth street, where she took a car for her sister's home at Eighteenth and Dumesnil streets. She reached her sister's home about 8:20. She drank a little coffee, sat up for about 20 minutes, and then retired for the night. She slept badly during the night, and next morning suffered from a hemorrhage of the bowels. After that she had continuous hemorrhages from the bowels up until about a month before the trial. On Saturday, the day after the alleged accident, she was still weak and nervous, and suffered pain from her back and side. She had four or five hemorrhages that day. On Sunday her condition was about the same. She had several hemorrhages that day. On Sunday afternoon she and her sister walked up to see Mrs. Talkington, who lived a few squares away. On Monday they spent the day with Mrs. Talkington. While there, she had a hemorrhage from the bowels. On Tuesday she returned to her home at Leitchfield because she was not feeling well. She did not call a physician until December 30th, when Dr. Clark was sent for. She went back to Louisville on January 23, 1911, to be treated by Dr. Woody, and remained there until February 12th. In May she again returned to Louisville, and went from there to Frankfort to see her mother. In November, 1910, she weighed 160 pounds, had a good appetite and good health. She was able to perform all her household duties, work in her yard and garden, and ride horseback. Since the accident she had suffered severe pain, and was unable to work. At the time of the trial, she weighed about 128 pounds. Plaintiff admitted that she suffered greatly from suppressed menstruation, but claimed that she never stayed in bed over two or three hours at a time. She admitted that the physicians had to give her something to relieve her condition.

Charlie Taylor, who formerly had been a freight brakeman in the employ of the Illinois Central Railroad Company, testified that on the day of the alleged accident he was on the east side of the Illinois Central Railroad track at Fourteenth street, up near what is called Magnolia street, when the train came into Louisville, and only a short distance from the place of derailment. A switchman, or Louisville & Nashville man of some kind, ran up to the switch, and was fooling with it. The switch was thrown between the baggage car and the first day coach. One car went on the main track, and one went down the siding where the Louisville & Nashville crew was. There was a smash-up, like a mess. The passenger train stopped on the other side of the crossing about 20 or 30 feet. The train was running about 15 or 18 miles an hour. The first day coach went down the siding and knocked some bars off of a Louisville & Nashville engine, and damaged the engine some—side-swiped it. It was a severe crash. The air hose came apart. The stop was sudden and unusual. On cross-examination he stated that, from the Southern crossing to the switch that was thrown, the distance was about 40 feet. He did not examine the hose to see if it had been broken, but thinks it must have been. The switch was a Louisville & Nashville switch, and the track was a Louisville & Nashville track on which the switch engine was standing. Did not know who the man that threw the switch was. He was there with the Louisville & Nashville crew. The first coach and the baggage car left the track, but the two rear coaches never left the track.

Jacob Ricketts stated that he was a car inspector of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. He inspected the cars on Fourteenth street near the Southern crossing about one hour after the accident. The front trucks of the baggage car were on the main track, and the rear trucks were on the siding. An equalizer bar on the baggage car was broken, and 10 siding boards on the baggage car were raked. The air hose was not broken. He examined the hose. The two rear coaches never left the rails. The rear coach was still on the main track. The inside rail under the combination car had turned over, leaving it sitting on the ground.

Dr. A. D. Willmoth, a Louisville physician who had been practicing for 16 years, and who made a specialty of surgery and diseases of women, testified that he examined plaintiff on about April 1, 1911. She was suffering from a hemorrhage from her womb, which was turned back slightly. The tubes and ovaries on either side were congested. The womb itself was movable, with the exception of a slight fixation, and the appendages were slightly congested. She was very tender over the right kidney, and was nervous and very weak. The womb was larger than it ought to be, and must have been painful while plaintiff was standing on her feet, as it had a tendency to produce a lagging sensation. The condition of the kidney was probably due to contusion. Plaintiff's pulse would go up when he touched there, and it gave her pain, showing that she really suffered pain in that region. In his opinion, her condition was permanent unless she was operated on. On cross-examination he stated that hemorrhages from the bowels might be caused by many things, such as severe dysentery or irritation. Any blow sufficiently hard to produce a hemorrhage of the bowels would most probably produce a rupture. Such an injury is either fatal very quickly, or the patient recovers in a short time. When he saw the plaintiff there was no evidence of injury of this kind. He found evidence of injury to the uterus only. It was doubtful if the blow received on the back in December would produce a tenderness in the kidney in the April following without displacing the kidney. Never knew of a case where a person sitting in a chair received an injury that resulted in displacement of the womb. This was usually caused by falling on the buttocks or feet. Didn't think the stopping of a passenger train twice as hard as usual would have produced the condition in which he found plaintiff.

Plaintiff's sister, Mrs. Houtchens, testified that plaintiff reached her house about 8 o'clock. Plaintiff seemed awful tired, worn out, and nervous. Did not eat much supper. Remained up about 20 minutes after arriving. She had a hemorrhage of the bowels Saturday morning. Went to Mrs. Talkington's on Sunday. Could then walk naturally. From her facial expression, she seemed to suffer pain. When she woke up, she appeared restless and nervous. Plaintiff returned to her home in January and remained about three weeks. She was then poorly, lying down most of the time, nervous, and having hemorrhages of the bowels. Plaintiff had lost flesh and was not able to get around much. When she returned in May, her condition was about the same as in January.

Dr. F. L. Wilhoit testified that he examined plaintiff and found her suffering from traumatic neurasthenia. She had a number of symptoms of that condition, such as irritability, headache, backache, inability to concentrate her thoughts and to read, straining of the eyes, and vasomotor disturbances. Her heart beating was very rapid; in the neighborhood of 98, when 72 was normal. Her respiration was fast and shallow. She had a tenderness over her right kidney and spine, and a good deal of congestion of the uterus, ovaries, and tubes, entailing a good deal of trouble at the menstrual periods, and lasting longer than it should last. She had lost some weight since he examined her in April. When examination was made she suffered pain, and was easily excited. She got out of breath from the least exertion. Was not able to take walks for any distance. Pain would necessarily accompany conditions which were found. Her condition on her last examination was worse than when he examined her nine months prior thereto. In his opinion, her condition was permanent. He testified also that plaintiff gave him a history of some hemorrhages at the time following the accident, and of the fact that she had suffered pain at various times, and had lost weight. On cross-examination he testified that he examined plaintiff for the purpose of qualifying himself as a witness. Anything that would deplete the system would render person subject to neurasthenia. He made no examination of the bowels, and found no evidence of hemorrhage of the bowels.

Five or six of plaintiff's neighbors testified that she was stouter before the injury, and was able to do all of her work then, but since the injury had not been able to do so. Two or three of them admitted on cross-examination that plaintiff, prior to the alleged injury, had an occasional sick spell which would confine her to the house, but not over a day at a time.

Dr. F. C. Woody testified that he examined plaintiff on January 25, 1911, in Louisville. He found her a tall, well-developed, healthy-looking young woman, apparently weighing in the neighborhood of 150 pounds. She looked worn and anxious, and was nervous. Her hands and arms trembled, which condition she said had come on her since the railroad accident. Her bladder was disturbed, and she was unable to hold her urine. She had cramps of the bowels between actions, and hemorrhages of the bowels at every action. Her appetite was bad, her tongue coated, and her digestion impaired. Looked worn from loss of sleep because she had had a headache that kept her awake. There was tenderness down the side of the neck, and especially in the back of the head. Her heart was normal, and there was nothing the matter with her left lung. Her respiration was a little shallow and catchy, which he found due to a tenderness in her right lung. Her right side was quite tender from the collar bone down. Her liver and abdomen were also tender, and the tenderness extended around to the back. On listening, he found a dullness and a sound of congestion in her lungs, showing that she had some pneumonia. Her ribs were very tender to the touch. Could not determine whether there was a fracture or not. She complained of great pain all up and down her spine, and pain in the lower part of the abdomen. She was menstruating at the time so you could not examine her to see what injury was there. During the early part of May he, Dr. Koontz, and Dr. McMurtry made an examination. Found the womb turned backward, showing some injury or infection. She was still having pain in her bowels and occasional hemorrhages, which he thought might be due to the position of the womb. What caused it, he did not know. Had thought that she would improve, but was disappointed at finding her looking so thin and worn. Her spine was very tender to the touch, and her condition never improved. Thought that her health would be permanently impaired. On cross-examination stated that the congested condition of the lungs had disappeared.

Dr. W. S. Clark stated that he had known plaintiff for three or four years, had been her family physician. Prior to her alleged injuries, she was a stout, healthy woman. When he was first called to treat her on December 30, 1910, she was suffering with a pain in her back and in her side. Her temperature was 102. Found her sixth or seventh rib on the right side broken near the spine. She was very tender along the spine, and very nervous. Saw her various times thereafter. Examined her during the month of April, 1911. She was still tender along the spine near the broken rib, but had no fever. Made a vaginal examination, but was unable to discover anything wrong there. She claimed to have had hemorrhages from the bowels, but he knew nothing as to this except what she said. When he first examined her, he thought she would recover, but she had not done so. She had lost a good deal of flesh, her appetite was bad, and she frequently had to take a narcotic before she could sleep. On cross-examination he stated that there was nothing wrong with her womb or female organs when the examination was made in April. He visited her frequently before the alleged injury. She had painful menstruation. Frequently he had to give her something to relax her. As soon as the period was established, she would be up. This condition rarely ever lasted over 12 or 14 hours. When he first saw her, in December, 1910, she probably had a slight attack of pneumonia. He gave her medicine ordinarily given to relieve a severe cold, and the congestion of the lungs cleared up in eight or nine days.

H. C. Houtchens, plaintiff's brother-in-law, testified that she came to his house about 9 o'clock. She looked tired and worn out. She retired in about an hour. On Sunday she seemed worse, and got worse all the time she was there. Then she came back to his home in about six months. Did not recall any visit in January, 1911.

The evidence for the defendants is as follows: Miss Sallie Heiner and Miss Ada May Meredith, who were seated just across the aisle from the plaintiff, testified that the train was going slowly at the time it stopped, and that there was no unusual jerk or jar of the train. Neither of these witnesses knew that the train was derailed until some one came into the train and informed them of this fact. They both say that the plaintiff was not thrown or jerked in any way.

Miss Bertha Morgan, a school-teacher, T.

E. Sanders, a concrete contractor, W. C. Hager, a journalist, Harry Jack, a journalist, and his wife, W. C. Lee, who travels for the Courier-Journal Company, C. M. Brame, who travels for the Bowling Green Nursery Company, and W. P. Vanderveer, a farmer residing at Hodgenville, all testified that they were on the train in question, and that the train was moving slowly and stopped in the ordinary way, without any unusual jar or jerk.

Mrs. Talkington testified that plaintiff visited her on Sunday afternoon and Monday following the derailment. Plaintiff told her of the derailment, but made no complaint of having been injured in any way, or of being unwell. Plaintiff had no hemorrhages at her house.

Dr. Lewis S. McMurtry, a specialist in the diseases of women and abdominal surgery, testified that he examined plaintiff under order of court on April 12, 1911. When he made the examination, Drs. Clark, Wood, and Willmoth were present. He found nothing the matter with her lungs, spine, bowels, or womb. There was no evidence of any injury to the bowels. He had never known, in a practice of 30 years, an instance of hemorrhage of the bowels from a blow on the surface of the body. Could not understand how a blow on the surface of the abdomen could produce a hemorrhage from the alimentary canal. If it were possible to give a blow causing such injury, it would be in the abdomen, and the plaintiff could not sit up or walk. Found plaintiff's uterus in its natural condition, and her ovaries and tubes normal and free from diseases and adhesions. Found no trouble with the kidneys. Never heard of such a thing as falling of the womb being caused by a blow to the womb while sitting down. Plaintiff, however, was not well. Her nutrition was not good. Her general nervous tone was below par. This may be due to a variety of causes, and is not an organic disease. Great pains during the menstrual period are often associated with neurasthenia. The duration of pneumonia from traumatism is from 12 to 14 days.

Dr. L. Koontz testified that he was a surgeon and examined plaintiff in connection with Dr. McMurtry on April 12, 1911. The examination was thorough. Found no evidence of any injury to the spine. Never knew of a hemorrhage of the bowels being caused by a blow on the outside of the body. We do find hemorrhages of the bowels from other causes. Plaintiff's uterus and tubes were in normal condition. There was no trouble with the lungs, spine, or kidneys. The reflexes were normal. Plaintiff had neurasthenia, and this was not caused by any organic trouble. The painful conditions during menstruation are evidence of neurasthenia.

[1] The defendants were not entitled to a peremptory instruction because the petition charged that the coach in which plaintiff was riding was derailed, while the proof showed that, as a matter of fact, it was not derailed, but remained on the track. The negligence specified in the petition is "the carelessness of the defendants and each of them in the construction, maintenance, and operation of the tracks, roadbeds, switches, and turn-outs and the operation of said trains and defects in said locomotives and cars" by which plaintiff's said injuries were produced and inflicted. It is true that the petition does allege that, by the joint and concurrent negligence and culpable carelessness of defendants, and each of them, the coach in which plaintiff was riding was wrecked, derailed, and thrown off the track, thereby seriously, permanently, and painfully injuring the plaintiff, etc. The derailment of the coach is not the ground of negligence relied on, but merely the result. The fact that the plaintiff alleged too much will not defeat a recovery.

[2, 3] There was evidence tending to show that the switch was turned under the train while in motion by a Louisville & Nashville switchman, and that the train itself was wrecked. If the train was wrecked by the negligence of the defendants, and plaintiff was thereby injured, she is entitled to recover, even though the coach in which she was riding was not derailed.

The railroads did not introduce any evidence to the effect that it was not a Louisville & Nashville switchman that threw the switch, or that the accident did not happen upon the Louisville & Nashville track. In the absence of such evidence, we think the testimony of Charlie Taylor was sufficient to take the case to the jury on that question. If it be true that the accident happened on an Illinois Central train, and that the switch was turned by a Louisville & Nashville switchman, and the tracks were leased by the Chicago, St. Louis & New Orleans Railroad Company to the Illinois Central Railroad Company, and jointly used by the Illinois Central Railroad Company and the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company, a fact which seems to be admitted by the pleadings, then we conclude that, for the negligence of the switchman, all three of the railroad companies are liable. McCabe's Adm'r v. Maysville & B. S. R. Co., 112 Ky. 861, 66 S. W. 1054, 23 Ky. Law Rep. 2328; I. C. R. Co. v. Sheegog's Adm'r, 126 Ky. 254, 108 S. W. 323, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 691; L. H. & St. L. R. Co. v. Kesssee, 108 S. W. 261, 31 Ky. Law Rep. 617.

[4] The court improperly permitted the plaintiff to testify that no one of the employes on the train on which she was riding assisted her off the train. She states that she did not inform any one that she was injured. Unless they knew that she was injured, there was no necessity for offering her any assistance.

[5] The court erred in permitting Dr. Wil-hoit to detail in part the history of her case as given by plaintiff. Where a physician examines a witness for the purpose of treatment, he may testify to what the patient said. Where, however, he examines a patient for the purpose of qualifying himself as a witness, he will not be permitted to do so. Dr. Wilhoit admits that he examined plaintiff for the purpose of testifying. That being true, what the plaintiff said to him was not admissible as evidence. C. & O. R. Co. v. Wiley, 134 Ky. 461, 121 S. W. 402.

[6] It was likewise improper to permit Mrs. Harrison Roberts, over defendants' objection, to pronounce the plaintiff "a well woman prior to the alleged injuries." She was not an expert, and should not have been permitted to give an opinion on such matters. She had a right to describe the appearance of plaintiff, before and after the accident, and to tell any facts she knew in connection with the plaintiff's ability or lack of ability to move about and perform her usual household duties, thus leaving to the jury to determine the conditions from the facts so testified to. Illinois Life Insurance Co. v. De Lang, 124 Ky. 569, 99 S. W. 616, 30 Ky. Law Rep. 753.

[7] When counsel for defendants asked Miss Bertha Morgan if there was any such jolt or jar as would throw a person about in the seat, the court should have permitted the witness to answer. The same ruling should have been made when the witness T. E. Sanders was asked, "Did that stop of the train jerk you or anybody there in your view, Mr. Sanders?"

[8] The weight of the evidence is to the effect that no unusual jar or jerk attended the stopping of the train on which plaintiff was riding, and that plaintiff was not jerked or thrown at the time the train stopped. Conceding, however, that she was, the evidence is by no means satisfactory that the injuries which she claims to have suffered were caused by any jar or jerk which she received on the occasion in question. Prior to the time of the alleged injury, plaintiff suffered greatly from suppressed menstruation; so much so that her own witness and physician testified that it was frequently necessary to give her medicine to relieve this condition. This of itself was sufficient to account for the congested condition of the uterus, and it is altogether improbable that this condition was in any wise contributed to by any shock that she received on the train. Nor is there any definite testimony tending to show that the hemorrhages of the bowels from which she claims to have suffered were probably produced by a blow. Old and prominent physicians testified that, in a number of years of practice, they never knew of such a thing. To have caused this condition, the blow must have been a very severe one, and it is hardly probable that the plaintiff, had she received such a blow.

would have failed to call the attention of some one on the train to the fact, or would have failed to mention it to her friend, Mrs. Talkington, with whom she spent the day. If it be true that she suffered greatly from suppressed menstruation, as she herself admits, and as Dr. Hall testifies, and if it be true, as Dr. Woody says, that she was subject to great flooding when her periods came, it is much more probable that the neurasthenia from which she is suffering is due to this condition rather than to any blow that she received on the occasion of the wreck. The congested condition of her lungs has passed away. Her rib, if it was fractured, has grown together. Her kidney is not shown to have been permanently injured. We therefore conclude that a verdict of $7,500, under these circumstances, is excessive.

Instruction No. 1 is not subject to the criticism that it assumes that the switchman operating the switch was the agent of the three railroad companies. The court told the jury that he was the agent or employé of the three defendants only in the event that the jury believed from the evidence that he was the employé of the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. On another trial the court, in submitting the questions set forth in instruction No. 2, will also submit the question whether or not plaintiff was thereby injured.

[8] It was not error to give an instruction authorizing the recovery of punitive damages against the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Company. If, as a matter of fact, the person turning the switch was the employé of that company and turned the switch under the moving train, his conduct showed such a wanton and reckless disregard for human life as to authorize the infliction of exemplary damages. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Smith, 135 Ky. 462, 122 S. W. 806.

[10] Our attention has been called to several instances where counsel for plaintiff went outside of the record in arguing the case to the jury. We have uniformly held that counsel, in making their arguments to the jury, should confine themselves to the law and the evidence, and should not go outside of the record for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the jury matters which have no bearing whatever on the questions at issue, and which are conveyed to the jury for the sole purpose of inflaming their passions and exciting their prejudice. L. & N. R. Co. v. Crow, 107 S. W. 808, 32 Ky. Law Rep. 1145; Ky. Wagon Mfg. Co. v. Duganics, 113 S. W. 129; I. C. Ry. Co. v. Proctor, 122 Ky. 92, 89 S. W. 714, 28 Ky. Law Rep. 598; L. & N. R. Co. v. Payne, 138 Ky. 274, 127 S. W. 993, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 1291. We deem it unnecessary to take up and consider the alleged instances of misconduct, but will content ourselves with calling the attention of counsel for the necessity of confining their arguments within the limits indicated.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for new trial consistent with this opinion.

DOLPHIN v. KLANN.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
Nov. 13, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1010*)—FINDINGS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

A finding by the court, rendered without the giving of any declarations of law, will not be disturbed where there is any evidence to support it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3979-3982, 4024; Dec. Dig. § 1010.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 33*)—PRESUMPTIONS—PLATS.

Under Rev. St. 1909, § 10290, requiring one laying out an addition to cause to be made an accurate plat particularly describing lots by numbers and their precise length and width, the law presumes that an accurate survey and marking on the ground formed the basis for a plat, so that the lots may be identified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 146-152; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. BOUNDARIES (§ 33*)—PLATS—SURVEYS.

A plat of an addition comprising land bordering on a railroad right of way showed that the course of the railroad was not straight. The lengths of the lines running east and west as boundaries of the lots were marked on the plat. The lots bordering on the railroad were irregular in shape, and the lengths of their boundaries were marked accordingly. An old fence was placed in accordance with courses and distances called for. Held to justify a finding that a survey was actually made before the making of the plat, and a surveyor seeking to establish different lines must show good grounds therefor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 146-152; Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

4. BOUNDARIES (§ 8*)—MONUMENTS—CALLS FOR DISTANCES.

An unmarked line is not a natural or artificial monument, and does not, when called for in a deed, overcome a call for distance; but the latter will prevail.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 8-41; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

5. BOUNDARIES (§ 8*)—SURVEYS—CALLS FOR DISTANCES.

Where a surveyor was not the county surveyor when he made a resurvey of a platted addition, and he did not give any data from which he made the survey, such as his starting points, the survey did not overcome the calls for distances in the plat.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 8-41; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

6. BOUNDARIES (§ 55*)—ILLEGAL SURVEYS.

A survey which violates the act of Congress requiring that, in subdividing fractional sections on the west side of a township, the surplus over 40 chains in width shall go to the west side of the section, is illegal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 278, 279; Dec. Dig. § 55.*]

7. EJECTMENT (§ 86*)—POSSESSION OF DEFENDANT—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

Where, in ejectment, defendant was in possession claiming under a plat of an addition as actually laid out on the ground, plaintiff could not recover except by affirmatively showing a better right.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Ejectment, Cent. Dig. §§ 238-245; Dec. Dig. § 86.*]

8. BOUNDARIES (§ 53*)—PRESUMPTIONS—SURVEYS.

Where a survey is illegal in a matter which the court knows about, it will not presume that it is correct in those particulars as to which it is not informed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 264-267; Dec. Dig. § 53.*]

9. BOUNDARIES (§ 10*)—ADDITIONS—PLATS.

A plat of an addition must be taken as a whole, and a corner will not be so changed as to cause a shifting of the position of all the lots in the addition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 90, 91; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

Blair, C., dissenting.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Greene County; Jas. T. Neville, Judge.

Action by John Dolphin against Bertha Klann. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded for new trial.

This is an ejectment suit to recover possession of a strip 12½ feet wide, which the plaintiff alleges is the east part of lot 20 in block 2 of Chamberlain's addition to Springfield. The defendant claims that the strip constitutes the west part of lot 21 in said block. It is agreed that plaintiff owns lots 19 and 20 and that the defendant owns lots 21 and 22, and the dispute is as to the boundary line. The case was tried without a jury. On the written request of defendant, the court made a special finding of the facts and found for plaintiff. The defendant has appealed.

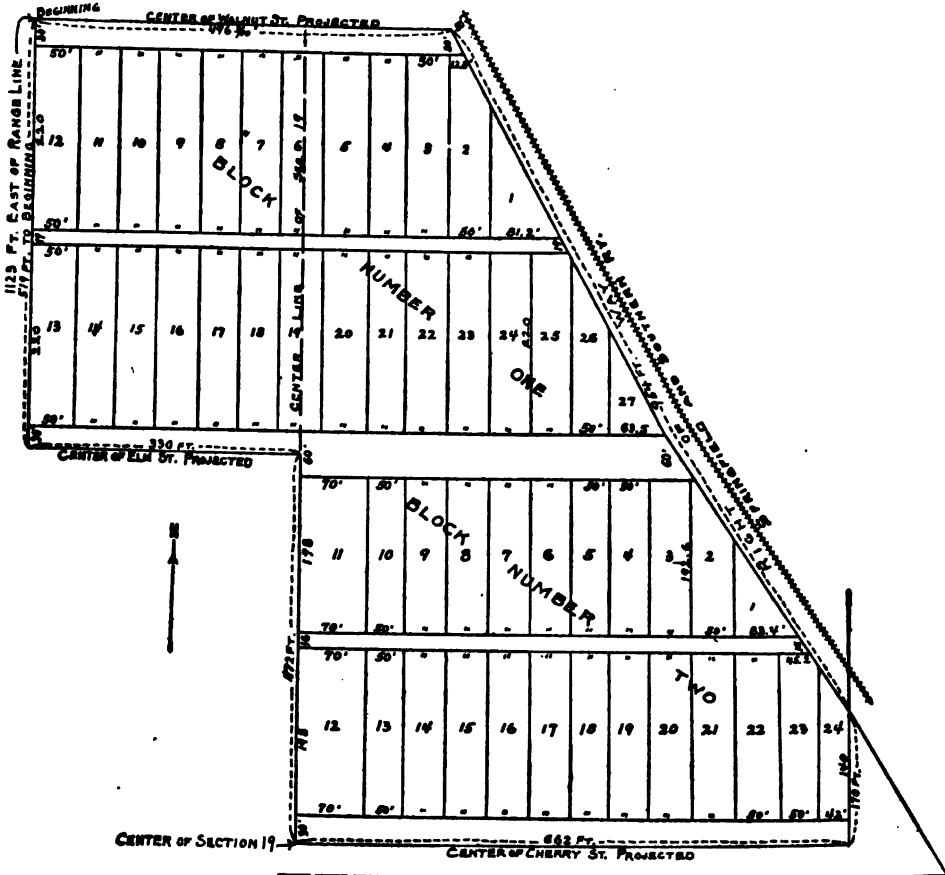

On March 21, 1887, one McCann conveyed to Chamberlain a tract of land described as follows: "Beginning in the center of Walnut street as laid down in Robberson's addition to the city of Springfield, Mo., eleven hundred and twenty-three (1,123) feet east of the range line dividing range twenty-one (21) and twenty-two (22); thence east along center of Walnut street projected four hundred ninety-six and three-tenths (496.3) feet to the west line of the right of way of the Springfield & Southern Railway; thence south and east on and along said west line of the right of way nine hundred fifty-four (954) feet to a point on the east line of the west half of the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section nineteen (19), township twenty-nine (29) north, range twenty-one west of the fifth (5th) P. M.; thence south on said line one hundred and seventy (170) feet to the center of Cherry street projected; thence west on and along said center of Cherry street projected six hundred and sixty-two (662) feet to the center of said section nineteen (19); thence north and along the line dividing the east and west halves of section nineteen (19) four hundred and seventy-two (472) feet to the center of Elm street projected; thence west on and along the center of said Elm street projected three hundred and thirty (330) feet; thence north five hundred and nineteen feet to the center of Walnut street projected; the place of beginning. Reserving for the ordinary purposes of roads and highways a strip of thirty (30) feet off the north and south side and sixty feet through the center portion running from the point where Elm street projected joins this tract of land to the right of way of the Springfield & Southern Railway."

On April 5, 1887, Chamberlain filed a duly executed and acknowledged plat of said addition in the office of the recorder of deeds, in which the land included was described just as in the deed to him. The plat is as follows:

where defendant claims that it is, and that on a part of that line as claimed by the defendant there was, shortly before the trial, an old fence which had inclosed defendant's garden.

The plaintiff claims that the east boundary of the W. ½ of the S. W. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of the section is 18 feet further east than is called for by the distance of 954 feet along the right of way, and that the description in the plat should be so construed as to hold that such line is the east boundary of the addition. Plaintiff also claims that the center of the section is 12½ feet further east than is called for by such measurements.

It is conceded by the evidence on both sides that the starting point and the distance along the north boundary of the addition are correct, and that by following the right of way of the railroad southeastwardly the distance of just 954 feet called for, and running thence south 170 feet just reaches the center of Cherry street, and that running thence west with Cherry street 662 feet just reaches an old post and wire fence, which runs a short distance north and is thence continued by a hedge fence; and such evidence of both sides shows that, with the boundaries of the addition thus run, the line between the plaintiff and defendant is

Mr Culler, who had been county surveyor for 3½ years, made a survey by which he located the line between the parties at the place contended for by the defendant.

Mr. Phillips, who had been county surveyor and city engineer and surveyor under the government, testified as follows: "Q. Now I will ask you, in accordance with that, where the west line of Mr. Dolphin's lot No. 19 would be, according to Mr. Culler's survey there? Where would it be in reference to the poles of the street railroad company in the street there? A. It would be in the neighborhood of 12 feet west. Q. In the street? A. Yes, sir. Q. Now it would come clear outside of the poles of the street railway there? A. I think so. Q. What lot was taken for that street? A. Eighteen. Q. Now Mr. Schmook asked you about the west line, is it? A. For a short distance it is an old post and wire fence running north, and then— Q. Well, next to Cherry street, what sort of a fence is it? A. At the southwest corner of the addition? Q. Yes. A. It is an old wire fence, and then runs into a hedge fence. Q. Where is that fence in reference to the center line of the addition there, the line mentioned in the description in the plat here? A. It is 12 feet further west. Q. I will ask you if you know whether on the east of that addition if there is a tract of land, according to Mr. Culler's survey if he is correct, if there is any land not claimed by anybody in the addition there? Is there a strip over there on the east? A. There would be; yes, sir. Q. Of how much? A. It would leave 18 feet over there. Q. Now take this fence on the west which you say—the hedge fence which you say is 12 feet west of the center line; how does that correspond with the line of the tract south of that, with the west line of Pickwick place? A. It would correspond very closely. Q. That fence or that line as you claim it does that correspond with the west line of Pickwick place? A. Yes, sir; it is on the line with those old trees, an old fence before the old fence was taken down. Q. The line through the center of the section as you found it there corresponds with the west line of Pickwick place? A. Yes, sir; it corresponds with the line of trees. Q. Have you surveyed that section 19 pretty generally? A. Yes, sir. Q. You know where the section lines are? A. Yes, sir."

He also testified: "Q. Now did you and Mr. Culler make that survey in the center of Walnut street along the railroad right of way 954 feet? A. We did. Q. Now when you came to the 954 feet were you to the center of Cherry street? A. Not quite. It don't quite reach the intersection of Cherry street. Q. Now when you got 954 feet you got to the section line, or the half section line, which is it? A. It is a quarter quarter line. But it don't reach it. Q. How many feet east or west of that quarter quarter line is it? A. About 18 feet. Q. Which way? A. This 954 feet stops short of it. Q. Now what section is that in? A. Nineteen. Q. That is in section 19. Is section 19 a section that contains lots? A. Yes, sir. Q. On the west? A. Yes, sir; fractional section. Q. The consequence is that they measured what would be to the section line if the forties were exact forties? A. Yes, except two feet. Q. Are the lots there full? A. They are more than full. They are 8 feet full. They have allowed 2 feet. Q. So this 954 feet call lacks about 18 feet, is it 18 feet west? A. The 954 feet strikes a point 18 feet west of this quarter quarter line. Then, if we run straight south, we would run parallel with this line 18 feet from it. Q. So that is 18 feet west of this quarter quarter line? A. Yes, sir. But if we stop at the 954 feet and proceeded from there, as we did, there is where we located the iron pin. Q. If you go on to where you strike the quarter quarter line before you turn south—well now the way you did, going the 954 feet, then the next call south is 170 feet? A. Yes, sir." Also: "Q. Then running southeast along the west line of the right of way 954 feet, and from there south to the center line on Cherry street, and from there west to the old fence, allows for all of the lots in this addition according to the plat fronting on the north side of Cherry street? A. Yes, sir. Q. And it was based upon that that you and Mr. Culler agreed and set this iron pin? A. We supposed that was the way it was surveyed. The Court: Q. If you go to the range line on Walnut street and then survey east 1,123 feet to the beginning point, and then make all the calls in this plat to the southwest corner of the addition, you will be in the center of Cherry street on the line of that old fence? A. Yes, sir. Q. You don't know whether it is west of the center of the section 12 feet or not? A. That is according to the distances given in the calls. Q. If you go the distances given in the calls, you will wind up on Cherry street on that line? A. Yes, sir. Q. But you will never strike the east line as called for as one of the calls? A. Possibly, not quite. Q. Did you survey that to see that the center of the section would be 12½ feet east of the old hedge fence? A. Yes, sir. Yes, I run both section lines through there." There is no evidence showing that there was ever at any time any monument or object marking the location of the center line of the section or of the east line of the W. ½ of the S. W. ¼ of the N. E. ¼ of the section at the places where the plaintiff claims that such lines are; and there is no evidence that such lines were ever so located by a survey except the evidence of Surveyor Phillips as above set out.

Plaintiff's evidence showed that the 18-foot strip on the east is not claimed by any one adversely to the owner of the adjacent lot, and there is no evidence that the 12½-foot strip on the west of the addition is so claimed. Prior to the filing of the plat, Cherry street was laid out and opened along the south line of the addition at the place called for by the plat.

John Schmook, of Springfield, for appellant J. T. White, of Springfield, for respondent.

ROY, C. (after stating the facts as above). [1] The verdict and finding having been for the plaintiff, and there being no declarations of law, the verdict should not be disturbed if there is evidence to support the finding. We hold there is no such evidence for the following reasons:

[2] I. Section 6569, R. S. 1879, now section 10,290, R. S., required that any one laying out an addition should "cause to be made out an accurate map or plat thereof particularly setting forth and describing; * * * all lots for sale, by numbers, and their precise length and width." There are two strong reasons for finding that the lots and streets and their location were accurately surveyed and marked out on the ground as a basis for the plat. The first reason is that the law presumes that such survey and marking were made. We have no case in this state expressly so holding; but in Burke v. McCowen, 115 Cal., loc. cit. 485, 47 Pac. 368, it is said: "The making and filing of the plat or map of the Ukiah North addition implies that said addition had been surveyed, and that the map or plat thereof filed September 18, 1889, was based on said survey, and that said survey was marked upon the ground so that the streets, blocks, and lots could be identified." That court then cites on the point McDaniel v. Mace, 47 Iowa, 510; Banker v. Caldwell, 8 Minn. 103 (Gil. 46); Jackson v. Freer, 17 Johns. (N. Y.) 29, 31; Jackson v. Cole, 16 Johns. (N. Y.) 261. Those cases are not all directly in point, but they support the general proposition.

[3] II. The plat bears on its face facts which, taken in connection with the conceded extrinsic facts, show that the plat was based on a survey not only of the boundaries of the addition but of the interior lot lines. The plat shows that the course of the railroad is not straight, but that it curves to the eastward as it goes southward. The lengths of the lines running east and west as boundaries of the lots are marked on the plat. The lots bordering on the right of way of the railroad are irregular in shape, and the lengths of their boundaries are marked accordingly. It would have been difficult, if not impossible, to correctly indicate such distances without such survey. We have a right to take notice of the historical fact that on the invention of wire fencing hedges were no longer planted in this state, and that the hedge fence at or near the southwest corner of the addition was there when the addition was platted. We have a right to draw the inference that such fence was adopted by the maker of the plat as the west boundary; in other words, as the center line of the section. It was right on the line called for by the courses and distances. The old fence inclosing a part of defendant's premises shows that it was placed there in accordance with such courses and distances disregarding the two lines as now claimed by plaintiff for the east and west boundaries of the addition. In Whitwell v. Spiker, 238 Mo., loc. cit. 638,

142 S. W. 251, it was said by Brown, J., speaking of government monuments and surveys: "These in thickly settled communities, and especially in cities, become obliterated, and their places are supplied by houses, fences, and other visible things that have been planted or adopted for that purpose. When this has been done, they may be used as landmarks for all, and their removal does not, of course, remove the land which has been bought and sold with reference to them." Any surveyor who undertakes to establish a different line should be required to show "good grounds for the faith that is in him."

[4] III. Even if it were true, as contended for by the plaintiff, that the east boundary of the addition running south from the railroad is 18 feet further east than called for by the distance given along the right of way, that boundary would not, in such case, be the east boundary of the addition. That line was never marked by any monument or object of any kind. Such an unmarked line does not constitute either a "natural monument" or "artificial mark," and does not, when called for in a deed, overcome the call for distance. It was so held by Valliant, J., in Guitar v. St. Clair, 238 Mo., loc. cit. 627, 142 S. W. 291, and in Koch v. Gordon, 231 Mo., loc. cit. 652, 133 S. W. 609. The same rule holds good as to plaintiff's claim that the center of the section is 12½ feet east of the fence. We hold that the call for 954 feet from the center of Walnut street along the right of way prevails over the call for an unmarked subdivisional line of the section, and that the courses and distances around to the southwest corner of the addition prevail over the unmarked line which plaintiff claims to be the center line of the section, and that would be the case even though it were the true line.

[5] IV. We hold that there is no evidence sustaining plaintiff's claim as to the location of the boundaries of the addition. The witness Phillips, on whose sole testimony the contention of plaintiff is based, was not the county surveyor for 3½ years at least before the trial. There is no evidence that he ever, while such county surveyor, located those lines. It was said by Gantt, J., in Granby Mining Co. v. Davis, 156 Mo. 422, 57 S. W. 126, that, where the interior corners of sections have been fixed by county surveyors, such corners as thus fixed will be binding in the absence of proof that such surveyor has violated the law in his methods. The survey or surveys alleged to have been made by Phillips are not shown to have been made by him while such surveyor. He does not give any data from which he made such surveys, such as his starting points, etc. In Jones v. Lee, 77 Mich. 42, 43, 43 N. W. 855, it was held that the testimony of surveyors as to their surveys where the data from which the surveys were run were not given has no force or effect, and that plats so made and in evidence did not give the data necessary to measure the rights of the parties.

[8-8] V. The surveyor Phillips did not explain how, in finding the center of the section, he allowed $7\frac{1}{2}$ feet surplus in the width of the west half of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the section. That makes a surplus of 30 feet in the width of the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the section. That is a violation of the act of Congress which requires that, in subdividing fractional sections on the west side of the township, the surplus over 40 chains in width shall all go to the west side of the section. Vaughn v. Tate, 64 Mo. 491; Knight v. Elliott, 57 Mo. 317. It thus appears affirmatively that the Phillips surveys were not legal. If it be said that the plat gives a surplus of two feet in the south boundary of the W. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the N. E. $\frac{1}{4}$, which is equal to 8 feet surplus in the width of the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of the section, we answer that such fact does not help the plaintiff. The defendant is in possession claiming under the plat as actually laid out on the ground, and the plaintiff cannot displace her except by affirmatively showing a better right. We have not overlooked the fact that, if the Phillips surveys were otherwise correct, the allowance of a surplus by Phillips was favorable to the defendant and threw the center of the section further west than it would otherwise have been. It should, however, suffice to say, that those surveys being illegal in the matters which we know about them, we will not presume that they were correct in those particulars as to which we are not informed.

[9] VI. Finally, moving the southwest corner of the addition $12\frac{1}{2}$ feet east of that fence will change the direction of the west boundaries of every lot in block 2. It will shift the position of every one of those lots to the eastward. It will change the width and contour of the fractional lots. It was said by Valliant, J., in Guitar v. St. Clair, supra: "The plat is not to be taken to pieces, it is to be taken as a whole, and the rights of the city and of individuals, in so far as they are derived from the plat, date from its filing." We hold that the plat cannot be warped to the right or left. To do so in this case would be to destroy the addition as laid out, and substitute another and a different one therefor.

The judgment is reversed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Pike County; D. H. Eby, Judge.

Action by Louis A. Strother and others against Franklin M. Barrow. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hostetter & Haley, of Bowling Green, and J. O. Barrow, of Vandalla, for appellant. T. B. McGinnis, of Bowling Green, I. C. Dempsey, of El Paso, Tex., and Tapley & Fitzgerald, of Bowling Green, for respondents.

LAMM, J. Ejectment. Defendant appeals from a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for an undivided two-sixths interest in a tract, situate in the hamlet of Ashley, Pike county.

Ashley was not laid out true to the cardinal points of the compass. Its subdivisions run from the northeast to the southwest. Among them is a square acre once belonging to Boyd, the common source of title. Boyd deeded 70 feet in rectangular shape off the southwest end of his acre to the Old School Presbyterian Church, putting the title in named trustees. The residue he deeded to his daughter, Mrs. Dorsey, and she conveyed to defendant. The church 70 feet passed by mesne conveyances (so plaintiffs claimed) to plaintiffs as trustees of the Ashley Church of the Methodist Episcopal Church South. It will be observed that plaintiffs, who sued for all, were awarded possession of an undivided two-sixths interest only, and abided the judgment. One phase of the dispute is over the boundary line between the church's 70 feet and Barrow's residue. Another is adverse possession. The parcel in controversy is a strip 11 feet wide at one end, 6 feet 10 inches at the other, and 3.16 chains long.

A map furnished by appellant is, so far as it goes, accurate enough to aid in grasping the situation, viz.:

The petition was conventional. The answer was a general denial coupled with two affirmative pleas (one the 10-year and the other the 30-year statute of limitations). The reply was conventional. At the close of plaintiffs' case and again at the close of the whole case, defendant interposed a demurrer to plaintiffs' evidence, which was overruled.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes 151 S.W.—61 and he saved the point. No other instructions were asked on either side. The trial was to the court without the aid of a jury, and, at defendant's request, the court made a finding of facts. Facts essential to the determination of questions raised will appear in connection with rulings thereon.

The assignments of error are: "(1) The court erred in refusing defendant's instructions in the nature of a demurrer to the evidence offered at the close of plaintiffs' testimony and at the close of all the testimony. (2) The court erred in refusing to give effect to defendant's adverse possession, which he affirmatively found to have continued from 1890 down to the date of the institution of the suit. (3) The court erred in finding that the strip of ground in controversy was not conveyed by the deed from Cary A. Boyd to Elizabeth Dorsey and by the deed from Elizabeth Dorsey to the defendant Barrow. (4) The court erred in interpreting the deed from the alleged officers of the Old School Presbyterian Church to the Universalist General Convention, a New York corporation. (5) The deed purporting to be from the Universalist General Convention, a corporation, to the trustees of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, dated October 25, 1905, was ineffective to convey any title and the acknowledgment thereto was fatally defective." Of these in their order.

[1] 1. Of the demurrers.

In effect, the demurrers search, under guise of a general form, errors specified in assignments 2, 3, 4, and 5. Hence a disposition of those specifications will be tantamount to an appellate ruling on the demurrers. Accordingly we pass by that assignment eo nomine, as filling no separate function on appeal.

[2, 3] 2. Of adverse possession.

The court found that defendant had been in possession under claim of title uninterrupted and adversely since the year 1890 up to the date of the suit, 1908. To break the force of that finding, it also found that the statute of limitations could not be invoked as a bar to plaintiffs' claim or to create title in defendant. Contra, that section 1886, R. S. 1909, applied to the facts—that section reading: "Nothing contained in any statute of limitation shall extend to any lands given, granted, sequestered or appropriated to any public, pious or charitable use, or to any lands belonging to this state." To break the force of that ruling, defendant contends that, assuming the original grant to the trustees of the Old School Presbyterian Church to be for a "pious and charitable use," yet on the facts here that use was abandoned; whereat (on such abandonment) the statute began to run and continued to run, although a pious use of the property was subsequently resumed. In outline such is the controversy under this head.

We are of opinion the ruling nisi was correct. This, because:

(a) For present purposes it will be assumed that the strip in dispute passed by the deeds in plaintiffs' chain of title, and not by the deeds in defendant's. Whether that assumption be correct will be looked to presently. On that assumption, out of abundant caution, we reserve the question whether a stranger to conveyances creating a pious or charitable use can, in aid of his claim of adverse possession by limitation, raise the point of its abandonment. Whether the grantor who conveyed to the use or his descendants under the notion of a reverter may make the point, or whether some proper party suing in equity to regulate the use may assert rights under a nonuser or abandonment, we need in no wise consider. In this discussion we take the point as we find it, and shall assume, without deciding, that defendant can make it.

(b) From ancient times a pious use has been considered a charitable use. The quoted statute speaks of both, but in a broad sense the one includes the other. The principles of law governing one govern the other. Under the old English act, known as the "Statute of Charitable Uses (St. 43 Eliz. c. 4)" money and lands granted for the repair of churches created a charitable use. That act is part of our common law, but it has been held that its enumeration of charities is not preclusive. There are other objects deemed charitable in a legal sense (Buchanan v. Kennard, 234 Mo. 117, 136 S. W. 415, 37 L. R. A. [N. S.] 993), and a grant for the building of a church has always been considered as raising a charitable use; religion being but part and parcel of charity for purposes of jurisprudence. Indeed, defendant's counsel concede impliedly that the original grant from Boyd was to a pious use within the meaning of section 1886, supra. The deed from the common source of title, Boyd, passed the title in 1870 to named trustees, elders of the Old School Presbyterian Church in the town of Ashlley, in consideration of $1, and the further consideration of grantor's "love, regard, reverence, attachment and affection for said Old School Presbyterian Church." The grant ran to said elders and their legal successors in office. In ordinary warranty form its habendum clause reads: "To have and to hold the premises aforesaid with all and singular the rights, privileges, immunities and appurtenances thereto belonging or in any wise appertaining unto the said parties of the second part and unto their legal successors to be elected as aforesaid forever, in trust, for the use of the congregation of said Old School Presbyterian Church, and in trust, that the said parties of the second part and their successors to be elected, as aforesaid, shall have the control and direction of the use and occupancy of the building now being erected on said described lot, when erected, for the worship of God and the transaction of any business that has for its object the promotion of the Redeemed Kingdom."

Now, it is hornbook doctrine that grants for a pious or charitable use (as this evidently was) are favored by the law. The legal maxim is: The law favorem charity. Wing. 144. Another is: The church is to be more favored than a person. "Ecclesiae magis favendum est quam personae." So, too, the idea of perpetuity is of the very essence of such grant. "If the court considered that it was for the public benefit that the property in question should be devoted forever to fulfilling the purpose named, it held that purpose good. Thus it held good all trusts for promoting the established religion, also all trusts for keeping up schools and hospitals, and many other trusts. These trusts, for purposes which the law considers it for the public benefit to perpetuate forever, are called charitable trusts. This is the only general definition which can be given of the word charity." Tyssen on Charitable Bequests, p. 5.

[4] In judicially approaching, then, the question of abandonment, the right doctrine needs must be that the law looks with disfavor on the abandonment of a pious or charitable use. Therefore on a priori principles the evidence required to establish abandonment should be of a stringent and conclusive character, leaving no reasonable loophole for escape from the conclusion.

[5, 6] Abandonment of a pious use involves two elements, to wit: (1) The intent to abandon permanently; and (2) the physical fact of nonuser for religious purposes. These two elements must conjoin, and both be operative at the same time, or there can be, in the very nature of things, no abandonment. After a careful study of the record, we are of opinion the evidence did not satisfactorily show the presence of either element. The most that can be said for that evidence was that religious services at times languished, at spells was discontinued, and was then resumed. The fact of resumption itself suffocates the idea of an intent to abandon. There was some testimony that defendant used the back yard of the church premises to garden for a season or so, and one season stored potatoes in the church. He was janitor while the Universalists were in control, had the key, and what he did on his own initiative in making a wareroom of the edifice may tend to show desecration by him, but does not show abandonment of the pious use by owners. Shortly before the Universalists sold to the Methodists, they moved the Bible, organ, pulpit, bell, and most of the benches to a church they controlled in a neighboring village. On the heels of that denuding act, they conveyed to the Methodists by a deed couched in terms not only precluding the idea of abandonment, but re-consecrated the church to religious services.

Witness the following clause: "In trust that said premises shall be used, kept and maintained and disposed of as a place for divine worship," etc. The trial court found against defendant on the question of abandonment. There was testimony sustaining that finding.

[7] With a law case in that fix, we are bound by his finding on the fact. Donaldson Bond & Stock Co. v. Houck, 213 Mo. loc. cit. 426, 427, 112 S. W. 242. With abandonment eliminated, there can be no question but what section 1886, supra, avoids the application of any statute of limitations. The trial court rightly so ruled.

[8] (c) It is faintly argued (or suggested) that the Boyd deed to the Presbyterians should be construed to mean that the property must always be used by that particular congregation of the Old School Presbyterian Church, and that any use of the premises by some other congregation would be a violation of the trust imposed by the deed. But is not that an exceedingly narrow and sour view? No authority is cited to sustain it, and, if there had been, we would hesitate long before following it. In what just sense would it be an abandonment of a pious use to have one religious denomination take over by purchase the church edifice of another? Are not all Christian churches, whatever their peculiar tenets of mere creed, at bottom devoted to the same pious use—the cure of souls? Mr. Binney's definition of a charitable use which courts are fond of using, used by him in his argument in Vidal v. Philadelphia, 2 How. (U. S.) 127, 11 L. Ed. 205, is: "And whatever is given for the love of God or for the love of a neighbor in the Catholic and universal sense, given from those motives and to these ends, free from the stain and taint of every condition that is personal, private or selfish, is a gift for charitable uses." There are cases in which that definition has been held too restrictive, but we know of none holding that a grant coming within that definition would not raise a charitable use. This court has given a broader definition (Missouri Historical Society v. Academy of Science, 94 Mo. loc. cit. 466, 8 S. W. 348), viz.: "Any gift not inconsistent with existing laws, which is promotive of science, or tends to the education, enlightenment, benefit, or amelioration of the condition of mankind, or the diffusion of useful knowledge or is a public convenience, is a charity." In the light of the scope and intentment of such definitions, how could it be justly ruled that the mere transfer of title and the custody of a church of one Christian denomination to another is an abandonment of a pious use? Any Christian church is but a hospital for souls. A curate is but a physician to souls (à cure). So far as this court can see, all churches have that end in view as their raison d'être.

Finally, we recur to the question whether this defendant can make the point at all. Mark, those who made the grant do not complain. Those who received it are standing on it, and rest content. Vide St. Louis Public Schools v. Risley, 28 Mo. loc. cit. 419, 75 Am. Dec. 131, arguendo. This is not a proceeding in equity to regulate the misuse of a charity; and by what right does a stranger to the grant suggest its invalidity? Is that question not res inter alios acta as to him? So, under the proof, as a member of the Universalist Church he enjoyed the charitable benefits of the grant, and it comes with ill grace from him to now impugn it. None of these suggested questions are argued in briefs, and consequently they are reserved.

[9] 3. Did the court err in finding that the strip in dispute was not conveyed by, nor was it within the calls of, the deeds in defendant's chain of title?

We think not. In the first place, the conveyances under which defendant holds are junior conveyances to the original grant to the Presbyterians. Defendant purchased what remained of the Boyd acre after the 70 feet were conveyed off of the southwest end, and the conveyances in his chain refer to the Presbyterian deed, and, in terms, excepted the church tract therefrom. In the next place, the chief (if not the whole) force of defendant's claim rests on the statute of limitations and not on a grant by deed. Moreover, on defendant's theory the side of the church building is on the division line between the 70 feet and the residue of the acre. On plaintiffs' theory the little strip in dispute lies between the church building and defendant's grant. In this condition of things the surveyor of Pike county, Beauchamp, made a survey. The deeds in both chains of title call for corner stones, courses, distances, etc. He testified he found those stones and ran his lines in accordance with the calls of the deeds. He testified his survey was correct and based on plats, conveyances, cornerstones of former surveys, etc. He found, and so testified, that the disputed strip lies within the description in plaintiffs' chain of title, and not within that of defendant's. He was examined in connection with a plat which is not reproduced in this record. His testimony relates to a lettering on that plat indicating the distances, courses, cornerstones, beginnings, endings, etc., mentioned by him. It is now insisted that his cross-examination established the inaccuracy of his survey.

[10] The laboring oar was on defendant to impugn the official survey. Carter v. Spracklin, 151 S. W. 451, just handed down. But, absent the plat concerning which he testified and the lettering to which he referred, it is impossible to say that defendant's contention is correct, for much of the testimony is meaningless without the plat and letters. As the impossible excuses persons, so it excuses judges. Some of the precepts of the law (of its very bones and framework) are: No one is bound to do what is impossible.

2 Bou. 116. Impossibility is an excuse in law. "Impotentia excusat legem." Coke, Litt. 29a. We have enough to do, to do what we can, not what we can't. The point is ruled against defendant.

[11] 4. Of error in interpreting the deed from the Presbyterians to the Universalists.

As developed in appellant's brief and argument, error in this assignment hinges on the proposition that under that deed there was a break in the pious use. The idea seems to be that the grant in the Presbyterian deed was to "The Universalist General Convention, a corporation existing under the laws of the state of New York." The deed being silent on the business character of that corporation, and there being no reference in it whereby it can be seen on its face that the grant was for a pious use, we are asked to hold as a matter of law that it was a grant to a use not pious. The inference being that with such a break in the use, the title itself fails, and plaintiffs must be cast in a strictly legal action of ejectment. But we shall not so hold. When the Universalist General Convention subsequently conveyed title to the Methodists, it, at the first chance it had to speak on the point, described itself as a religious corporation. We take its word for it, absent countervailing proof. So the proof is that the Universalists when they acquired title actually used the edifice for church purposes, and that defendant had charge of it on behalf of that denomination of Christians. Do not acts interpret words? Not only so, but, absent proof to the contrary, as here, we would not be willing to hold (against the indications in the name of the corporation) that it was not an instrumentality of the Universalist Church, and was seised of the property to the use of that denomination. The presumption would be in the first instance that the Presbyterians would not intend to break the pious use by their conveyance. Surely defendant does not want us to rule (as a matter of law and without any proof) that the faith of that branch of the Christian Church is not a Christian or pious faith, or that their churches are not dedicated to a pious use. Learned counsel, taking us into their confidence, assure us that the Universalist faith "is a beautiful faith." If necessary, we would be willing to rule that it was a comfortable faith, and, if we were permitted to express a judicial hope, it would be the hope that it may turn out to be a true one in the great day of final accounts; for does not a very good book say we are all miserable sinners?

We pause to ask: May a mere earthly court (the which we admit we are) go out of its way to repudiate the sunny theological dogma, much doubted by some stout polemics, viz., that every man will be finally saved and dwell forever with the felicitous? No! Emphatically, no! Angels and ministers of grace, defend us! So the melancholy Dane exclaimed (when startled by a well-known apparition) and so say we. We say it in the form of a pious exclamation, because sometimes an exclamation is as good as a discourse, and let it go at that. Why should we decide the point when we have no jurisdiction of the subject-matter? Says Coke soberly (Coke, Litt. 232b): "There be three kind of unhappy men. He that hath knowledge, and teacheth not. He that teacheth, and liveth not thereafter. He that knoweth not, and doth not inquire to know." But that pronouncement is too broad as a rule regulating judicial discourse. Indeed, getting unanimity of opinion in questions of religious faith in the decision of cases has not been so easy as to invite a wide play of unnecessary exposition in ghostly matters. Agreeable thereto the inquisitive scholar may find abundant grounds in Boyles v. Roberts, 222 Mo. 613, 121 S. W. 805, and State v. Railway Co., 239 Mo. 196, 143 S. W. 785 (q. v.)

[12] 5. Of the deed from the Universalists to the Methodists.

The substance of the objection made to that deed (split into specifications in appellant's brief) is that its acknowledgment is bad, reading: "State of Minnesota, County of Hennepin—ss.: On this 25th day of October, 1905, personally came before me a notary public in and for the county and state aforesaid the above named Henry W. Rugg and G. L. Demarest, personally known to me to be respectively the chairman of the board of trustees of the Universalist General Convention, and the secretary thereof, and the officers they represent themselves to be and acknowledge to me that they signed the foregoing instrument in behalf of the Universalist General Convention and as chairman of the board of trustees and secretary for the uses and purposes therein mentioned. In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and seal, this day and year written." The testimonium clause of the deed and the signatures thereto run thus: "In witness whereof the chairman of the board of trustees of the said Universalist General Convention and the secretary thereof, have hereunto set their hands and seal of said corporation, the 25th day of October, 1905. Henry W. Rugg, Chairman of Board of Trustees. G. L. Demarest, Secretary. [Corporate Seal.]"

To that deed the corporation seal was affixed, as indicated. A mere glance shows that the certificate of acknowledgment does not conform to the form the statutes say "may be used" in acknowledging corporate deeds. R. S. 1909, § 2799. But he has read that statute to little purpose who concludes that the statutory form is necessary to a good acknowledgment. The language of the section in that particular is not mandatory, but permissive. It does not say the form must or shall be used, but that it "may be used." In the exposition of that statute it has been held that the acknowledgment to a corporate deed, if good before the statute was passed, would be good after it was passed. Huse v. Ames, 104 Mo. loc. cit. 102, 103, 15 S. W. 965. We look, then, to all related statutes, and to the exposition given them by appellate courts. There are cognate sections prescribing how a corporation may hold and can convey real estate, and what the certificate of acknowledgment must show. Comparing the mandatory requirements of section 2799 with sections 2790 and 3001—all strictly in pari materia—it will be seen that the certificate of acknowledgment complies substantially with the requirements of those sections. In St. Louis Public Schools v. Risley, 28 Mo. loc. cit. 419, 75 Am. Dec. 131, it was ruled that, when the common seal of a corporation appears to be affixed to an instrument and the signatures of the proper officers are proved, courts are to presume that the officers did not exceed their authority, and that when an act is within the powers of a corporation, and its existence is witnessed by an instrument clothed with the formalities requisite to bind it, there is no hardship in the rule which imposes on one objecting to its validity the necessity of showing that it was without the assent necessary to its existence. The logic of that holding precludes the necessity of showing corporate assent, or the order of a board of directors, in the first instance. In Perry v. Price, 1 Mo. loc. cit. 649, it is ruled that, a corporation being an invisible body, it cannot manifest its intention in its deed by any personal act or oral discourse, and speaks only by its common seal. The logic of that ruling stresses the use of the corporate seal. Though private seals are abolished, yet the use of a corporate seal on a corporate deed remains an essential. R. S. 1909, § 2773. In City of Kansas v. Railroad, 77 Mo. loc. cit. 185, a doctrine of the Risley Case, supra, was reaffirmed to the effect that in aid of a certificate of acknowledgment reference may be had to the instrument itself or any part of it; and that it was the policy of the law to uphold certificates when substance is found and not to suffer conveyances, or the proof of them, to be defeated by technical or unsubstantial objections. In Eppright v. Nickerson, 78 Mo. loc. cit. 485 et seq., will be found an acknowledgment of a corporate deed, less substantial than the one in this case, which was held good. In Railroad v. City of St. Louis, 66 Mo. loc. cit. 247, may be found an apposite pronouncement, viz.: "As the one company had the right to sell, and the other to purchase, it follows that the deed, under the seal of the corporation and signed by the proper officers of the company, is prima facie evidence that the officers did not exceed their authority, and, if the assent of the stockholders to such conveyance was not had, it devolved upon the defendants to show that fact." The logic of that ruling is to simply invoke the cardinal maxim that things are presumed to be rightly done. Hartwell v. Parks, 240 Mo. loc. cit. 546, 144 S. W. 793. So Thompson, J., in Missouri Fire Clay Works v. Ellison, 30 Mo. App. loc. cit. 72, lays down this proposition: " * * * Authority on the part of the president and secretary to execute a deed for the corporation need not be affirmatively shown by a party claiming under the deed, but, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, such authority is presumed." See Musser v. Johnson, 42 Mo. 74, 97 Am. Dec. 316, and Shewalter v. Pirner, 55 Mo. 218, arguendo. The signatures of the officers are sufficiently attested by the certificate in question. The assent of the directors will be assumed under the doctrine of the cases cited, and a corporate seal attached to the deed is of substance in determining the sufficiency of the acknowledgment as to corporate intent. We have not undertaken to state the specifications of the objections to this acknowledgment seriatim. It is sufficient to say that all of them are disposed of against appellant in the foregoing discussion. The point is ruled against defendant.

With this ruling, the cause is determined in favor of plaintiffs. Let the judgment be affirmed. All concur; GRAVES, P. J., in result.

JEWELL v. STURGES et al.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1. Nov. 14, 1912. On Rehearing Nov. 28 and 30, 1912.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 88*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—DEFECTIVE PLACE TO WORK.

Plaintiff, an iron roller, was injured while working in defendant's plant by being caught in the loop of a hot bar of iron, due to the absence of an iron post intended to be set in the floor to prevent such an injury. Defendant company furnished all the instrumentalities for the manufacturing operations. Held, that defendant was liable for plaintiff's injuries, whether plaintiff was an employé of defendant or of the head roller who, under a contract dictated by a labor union, did all the actual work of manufacture in the mill according to a certain piece work schedule, and employed, discharged, and paid plaintiff and the other workmen under him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 144-152; Dec. Dig. § 88.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 88*)—NATURE OF RELATION—SERVANT OF INDEPENDENT CONTRACTOR—INJURIES—LIABILITY OF OWNER.

Where an owner undertakes to furnish the place and the appliances with which an independent contractor is to perform his contract and retains possession and control over the place and appliances, the owner will be liable for injuries to the servants of a contractor by reason of the unsafe character of the place; the contractor and his employés under such circumstances having the same right that an ordinary employé has to demand of the owner a reasonably safe place to work.

Graves, P. J., and Lamm and Ferrias, JJ., dissenting.

In Banc. Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; Jos. E. Guthrie, Judge.

Action by Jesse Jewell against Benjamin Sturges and the Kansas City Bolt & Nut Company. Judgment for plaintiff against the Kansas City Bolt & Nut Company, and it appeals. Affirmed.

Because of a dissent in division, the case was transferred to the court in banc, and after a rehearing the latter adopted the divisional opinion of WOODSON, J., as the opinion of the court in banc, which is as follows:

"This case was here on a former appeal, and the opinion affirming an order of the circuit court, granting the plaintiff a new trial, is reported in 231 Mo. 176, 132 S. W. 703, 140 Am. St. Rep. 515. The facts of the case were fully stated in detail by the court in the opinion before mentioned, and for that reason they will be but briefly stated here; reference is made to that case for a statement of the facts as they appear by the record in this appeal.

"Briefly stated, the defendant was a large manufacturing concern which manufactured various products made of iron and steel, and among other things it made rods, bolts, and nuts. A part of the work necessary to produce those articles was to heat and roll large bodies of iron through the rolling mill, which constituted one of the departments of the defendant company's plant. That was accomplished in the following manner: 'Scrap iron was bundled up, bound together, and heated to a white heat in a furnace. It was then run through a set of rolls by other employés, called "roughers," and thus formed into billets some three feet in length and three inches thick; it was then passed to another set of employés, called "strainers and catchers," of which plaintiff was one, who passed it through other sets of rollers several times, reducing it each time in thickness and increasing its length until it reached the desired dimensions. The rolls at which plaintiff was engaged stood in an east and west direction, containing several sets of rolls about 15 feet in length. The plaintiff occupied the north side of the string of rolls. Those working with him were on the south side of the string of rolls. Those on the south side would take a billet from the roughers and place the end of it in the rolls; the rotary motion of which would convey it to the north side, where the plaintiff would catch it with a pair of iron tongs, and place the end of it in another set of rolls beneath the ones from which it had just passed, and it would be carried back to the south side by the same means and reduced in thickness and extended in length, as previously stated. This method was continued until the bar was some 30 or 40 feet in length, when the process of "repeating" was begun; that is, the plaintiff would catch the end of the bar with a pair of tongs as it came through at the east end of the rolls and carry it around north in a semicircle and place the front end in the rolls at the west end of the string which so ran as to carry the bar back to the south side. By this process the bar would be coming through at the east end of the string of rolls to the north side, and at the same time it would be going through the rolls to the south side at the west end of the rolls.' The foregoing quotation is taken from the statement of the case in the former opinion.

"The evidence showed that some 8 or 10 feet back from the set of rollers there was a hole made in the floor of the mill in which an iron post was designed to be inserted, when the 'repeating' process, before mentioned, was being carried on. This was intended to prevent the catcher from being caught in the loop of the bar and drawn up to and crushed by it against the rollers in case the rear end thereof should for any reason hang in the roller. That, at the time of the plaintiff's injury, said post was not in position, but in lieu thereof an iron spindle and some other materials were placed on the floor near said hole. That while the plaintiff was engaged in the performance of his duties as a catcher, the rear end of a rod caught in the roller, and the loop thereof surrounded and knocked said iron spindle and other materials aside and caught the plaintiff just above the ankle of the foot and drew it up against a tub of water, which was setting between him and the rollers, and so burned, bruised, and mangled his leg that, after suffering excruciating pain and mental anguish for a year or more, it became necessary for his limb to be amputated just above the ankle. The second trial resulted in a verdict for the plaintiff for $18,000, of which he remitted $3,000, leaving $15,000, for which judgment was entered, and in due time the defendant appealed.

"All of the questions except one presented by the record on the former appeal were carefully and fully considered and disposed of by this court in the opinion before mentioned. Counsel for the defendant at the second trial, retried in the circuit court all the questions passed on by this court on the former appeal, and have rethrashed them out here on this appeal, and request us to reconsider them at this time. After a careful re-examination of the questions of fact and law presented by this record, we are satisfied that the conclusions reached, when the case was here before, were correct, and no good would be accomplished by restating or passing upon them again.

"We will content ourselves at this time by first restating the question not passed upon in the former opinion, and, second, the substance of the evidence bearing upon it, all of which was not introduced at the former trial, namely, that the plaintiff was not working for the defendant at the time he was injured, but was employed by and was working for the Blue Valley Lodge No. 2 of the National Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, and that in consequence thereof defendant company was not liable to the plaintiff for the injuries received by him.

"The evidence in this case covers more than 400 pages of printed matter, and a large portion of it relates to this question, and we will therefore only be able to set out the substance of part of it and the effect of other portions, which is as follows: A contract between the defendant company and said Association of Workers, which is as follows: The portions of said document introduced in evidence being in the words and figures following:

"Sheffield, Mo.

"Western Scale.

"Memorandum of Agreement.

"We, Kansas City Bolt & Nut Co., of the first part, and Blue Valley Lodge No. 2, State of Missouri, National Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, of the second part, do hereby agree that the following scales of prices, based upon the actual sales and shipments of iron or steel, as arranged for in conferences, shall govern the wages of the several departments as herein stated, commencing July 1, 1902, and ending June 30, 1903.

"It is further agreed that no scale shall go below the base price named on the rate selected.

"It is understood: First. That iron mills (except sheet mills) working steel shall pay price and one-half price for steel, but this shall not apply to mild steel, that is, working that steel of which the output of the mill shall be as great as when working iron of the same sizes; but when the output of steel is but three-fourths ($\frac{3}{4}$) of the output of iron, the rule price and one-half shall apply.

"Second. On all mills working iron or steel weighing one hundred and thirty (130) pounds, or over, extra help shall be furnished to the heater, the same to be paid by the company.

"Third. The time in scrapping and bushing, also finishing departments, shall in no case exceed nine hours and fifteen minutes from the regular time the mill begins to roll until the first furnace commences to charge the last heat. This shall not apply to mills working shorter charging hours; this not to apply to boiling departments (except scrapping and busheling); also other departments working under the three-turn system. The time for meals on following-up mills shall not be counted in.

"Fourth. Wherever deviations from the Western Iron Scale, signed for by any manufacturer and the Amalgamated Association, are made and evidence is produced to prove it, the Amalgamated Association and manufacturers agree to make every effort to correct the same, provided the trains and furnaces are similar, but if the deviations continue to be tolerated by the Amalgamated Association, all other mills shall receive the same. All manufacturers and workmen governed by this scale hereby agree not to make any deviation from the scale agreed to.

"Fifth. Finishing mills will be allowed to work three turns when practicable. On finishing mills working or desiring to work three turns, eight hours shall constitute a day's work. Rolling shall not start earlier than 5 a. m. Monday morning, and first furnace shall cease charging at 11:30 a. m. on Saturday. The last furnace shall not charge later than one (1) hour after the first furnace, and close the week's work. On all mills working three turns a third roller shall be employed.

"Sixth. All ten-inch guide and hook mills with one furnace averaging $35.00 per turn or more, or with two furnaces $65.00, per turn or more on a 9¼ hour system, based on a 1-cent card rate, the eight-hour system shall be adopted. On bar and twelve-inch mills averaging 60,000 pounds on one (1) furnace, and 85,000 pounds on two (2) furnaces per turn on the 9¼-hour system, the eight-hour system shall be adopted."

"(Signatures omitted.)

"It was agreed that the base price at a one (1) cent card rate, based on actual sales of bar iron, as per conference agreement, with extras, shall be the straight one dollar and twenty-one cents (\$1.21) per ton for rolling, sixty-one and seven-tenths ($61\frac{7}{10}$) cents for heating, thirty-two and three-fourths ($32\frac{3}{4}$) cents per ton each for roughing, and catching on guide, 10-inch, hoop and cotton tie mills with two (2) per cent additional for each one-tenth ($\frac{1}{10}$) advance or decline on said card from one (1) to two (2) cent card rate.

"The rollers, heaters, roughers and catchers shall each be paid by the company. It is understood, however, that this arrangement shall in no way detract from the authority of the roller in controlling all hands on mill, including hiring and discharging, and, as heretofore, the roller shall be held responsible for the work done. Bar mill heating price to govern base sizes alone.

"Arthur Palmer, the night boss roller, testified that: 'Q. Now this book speaks of the authority of the roller in controlling all hands in the mill. Now what is it you call the mill? A. That is the train of rolls, and all the furnace men, and so forth. Q. That means the working part of it that is done from this furnace? A. Yes, sir. There were two furnaces on the mill, and the roller has charge of the heaters and all hands on the mill. Q. All hands engaged in rolling iron? A. Yes, sir. Q. When Jesse Jewell, the plaintiff, was injured there? A. Yes sir. Q. In what capacity? A. As roller—foreman, rather. Q. Who employed you? A. Mr. Sturges. Q.—Mr. Benjamin Sturges, the defendant here? A. Yes, sir. Q. By "roller" you mean a subroller under Mr. Sturges? A. Yes, sir. Q. How long had you been working under Mr. Sturges? A. Well, about, possibly, eight years. Q. At this same plant? A. Yes, sir. Q. Were you a member of Blue Valley Lodge No. 2, National Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was Mr. Sturges also a member? A. Yes, sir. Q. And were you the roller on the shift on which Mr. Jewell was engaged at the time he was injured? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who paid Mr. Jewell? A. Mr. Sturges. Q. State whether or not there was an inspector employed by the company to inspect this iron? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where did he work? Where did he inspect it? Where was the inspection made? A. Well, it was after it got cold—after it got sheared and cold—it was taken to the scales and unloaded, and as it was unloaded it was inspected. I presume that is the way they inspected it. Q. Now, do you know whether this rolling work was done under this kind of an agreement, from year to year, from 1896—1895 and '96—on down to the time Jewell was hurt? A. Yes, sir. I believe the agreement has always been there, the same—about the same. Q. And they were made before the expiration of the year; the one for the succeeding year would be made before the expiration of the one for the present year? A. Yes, sir. Q. So they were continuously working under the scale? A. Yes, sir."

"John P. McLaughlin testified: 'Q. What position, if you know, did defendant Benjamin Sturges on December 9, 1902, and for a number of months previous thereto, hold in the rolling mill of defendant? A. He was the man that had the whole charge of the mill. Q. Whose duty, if you know, was it to inspect the machinery, appliances, tools, and safeguards, if any, furnished the employes? A. Now, in regard to that question, I would like to make a little explanation. Q. Answer it in whatever way you believe to be true. A. It is customary, when a roller gets a position as a roller on a mill, he has full charge of that mill; the mill is under his care; everything is under his care; and, as a rule, whatever appliances he recommends, whatever appliances he needs, will be given to him.'

"Benjamin Sturges, one of the defendants, who had been employed in this mill for two years prior to the date of the injury, testified: 'Q. Some of the men, I believe the evidence showed, were paid by the company direct? A. Yes, the heaters and roughers. Q. Who would employ them—hire them? A. I did. Q. Did you have the right of discharging too? A. Yes, sir. Q. Superintendent of them, while they were doing their work? A. That is, these rollers and— Q. Which? The heaters and roughers, and men that were paid by the company, did you direct them in their work too? A. Oh, yes; yes, sir. Q. Now you received so much a ton for the finished product of iron rolled in that mill? A. Yes, sir. Q. Whether it was rolled by your shift or any other shift? A. Any other. Q. Did you have three shifts when you first started in? A. No, sir. Q. And then you paid the strainers, scrapers, finishers—these men were paid by the scale—and then you employed some laborers who were not paid by any scale? A. Yes. There was some of them not in a scale at that time. Q. You employed several men of that kind? A. Yes. Q. You went and came as you thought the business demanded? A. Yes. Q. Did you leave any record in the office of the time you spent there? A. Well, I think they have a record. They used to have a man at the gate. Q. You didn't make any record? A. No, sir. Q. And didn't pass in at the gate and check in? A. I passed through the gate. Q. You did not check in? A. No, sir. Q. When you came in or when you went out? A. No, sir; none of the mill men did. Q. None of the men you paid? A. None of the rolling mill men. Q. Mr. Sturges, I believe you stated this; I want to be perfectly sure about it. You collected the money from the company for the entire output of the three shifts, based on the ton? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you paid out to the men their money for the three shifts, whether you worked on the shift or not? A. Except the heaters and roughers. Q. What men were under your pay—you paid that way? A. Yes, sir.'

"S. Y. High testified: 'Q. Now, Mr. Sturges got a profit off of the work of all three shifts, did he not, of the rolls? A. I don't know what Mr. Sturges made on his rolls. Q. Well, you paid Mr. Sturges a certain amount? A. He was paid a certain amount, per ton; yes. Q. And then he paid for having the work done out of that? A. Part of it; yes. Q. And what he had left, after paying that, he kept? A. Why, sure. Q. Do you know how much was paid to Mr. Sturges in any one year for the amount of work that he did? Do you know? A. No, sir; I do not. Q. Who paid him? A. He was paid from the office. Q. Did you know anything about how much his compensation was? A. I did not. Q. Did you ever inquire into how much he was getting for that work? A. No, sir. Q. And how much his profits were over and above what he paid his rollers and strainers and finishers, and all those people he had to pay? A. I could answer in this way that they tried to find out how much he did make, and nobody could find out. That's all I know about it.'

"Jacob Knapp testified: 'Q. Yes, you were employed by the company as a weigher for the company? A. Yes. Q. To receive this iron from the rollers, and weigh it? A. Yes, sir. Q. And there were two of you worked there—two shifts of weighers? A. Yes, one for day and one for night. Q. And there were three shifts of rollers, catchers, and strainers and so forth? A. Yes. Q. And then this iron was brought up to you, and you kept the weighing of each one of these shifts separate? A. Yes, sir. Q. Did you keep each heat separate? A. Yes. Q. And then you marked that up on a board, as required by the rules of the union? A. Yes, sir.'

"The uncontradicted evidence also showed appellant, the Kansas City Bolt & Nut Company, owned the entire plant and everything connected therewith where respondent was working at the time of his injury. They owned the plant and furnished their own machinist to keep the same in repair, and furnished all the material that went into the output. The company also furnished everything in the way of tools and implements in use, and kept them in repair; also furnished the engineer, fireman, and all others who were necessary to furnish power with which to run the entire plant; also the appliances with which all the employes worked, and made all repairs in all departments, when called upon to do so. Sturges, the codefendant, occupied the position of head roller, who employed respondent to work in the mill after consultation with Superintendent High. The mill at the time in question was being operated under a contract made between the Kansas City Bolt & Nut Company and the 'Blue Valley Lodge,' a labor organization of men employed or engaged in working in the rolling mills. There is no evidence in the case that Jewell belonged to Blue Valley Lodge. He states that he did not remember whether he had deposited his card in the Blue Valley Lodge after he came from Chicago where he had worked, but that he was a member of the Amalgamated Association, and Blue Valley Lodge was a branch of that association."

Rees Turpin and A. P. Woodson, both of Kansas City, for appellant. Ralph S. Latshaw, Reed & Harvey, and Yates & Mastin, all of Kansas City, for respondent.

WOODSON, J. (after stating the facts as above). Upon the evidence before stated, counsel for appellant insisted below and requested the court to declare, as a matter of law, that the relation of master and servant did not exist between it and the respondent at the time of his injury, and for that reason, among others, he was not entitled to a recovery in this case. In other words, the appellant insists that the Blue Valley Lodge No. 2 of the National Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, and Benjamin Sturges, the head roller, were, at the time of the injury, independent contractors, and that the respondent was an employé of it, and not of appellant, and consequently the relation of master and servant at said time did not exist between the appellant and the respondent, and for that reason the former was not liable to the latter for the injuries sustained by him. The court refused that instruction, and submitted that question, by proper instructions, to the jury, who found it in favor of the respondent.

When the case was here before, it was decided that the question of the relationship existing between the appellant and the respondent was one of fact which should be submitted to the jury under proper instructions from the court, provided the evidence upon that question was conflicting, which at that time we were unable to decide, for the reason that the contract under which Sturges, the head roller, was working in the rolling mill was not before the court. The same question is urged upon our attention again, and, if we correctly understand counsel for appellant, they do not challenge the correctness of the instructions submitting that question to the jury, except for the reason assigned that there is no evidence upon which to base it. At the second trial the contract between said association and the appellant was introduced in evidence and is preserved in the record which may be found set out in the statement of this case.

[1] Conceding without deciding the question that the contract means what counsel for appellant contends, namely, that the Blue Valley No. 2 Lodge of the National Amalgamated Association of Iron, Steel & Tin Workers, was an independent contractor for the production of the rods, bolts, and nuts mentioned in said contract, and that respondent was employed by and was working for the latter, and not for the former, at the time of his injury, nevertheless the trial court, under the evidence, properly refused said instruction for the reason that the uncontradicted evidence shows that the appellant company owned the entire plant, including the roller mill in question, furnished the place where the respondent worked, that it furnished the machinists to make the repairs, and that it was its duty to keep the place and the instrumentalities with which he worked in repair, and that it furnished the engineers, firemen, and all others who were necessary to generate the heat and power for the entire plant, the mill included. The uncontradicted evidence showed that the direct cause of the respondent's injury was the negligent failure of the appellant to furnish the stanchion post mentioned in the evidence, and not from any negligence of Sturges or any one whom he represented.

[2] In discussing this question in the former appeal in the case (231 Mo. loc. cit. 195, 132 S. W. 707, 140 Am. St. Rep. 515), the court said: "In the case at bar, what was the proximate cause of the injury? Clearly it was the failure of the company to maintain the iron post described in the petition. If it had been there it would have been a physical impossibility for respondent to have sustained the injuries of which he complains. That being true, then the question presents itself: Was the company negligent in failing to maintain the post at the place and in the manner stated in the petition? In order to properly determine this question, we must consult the evidence bearing upon that question. It is undisputed that the appellant company owned the entire plant in question and had exclusive control over every department thereof, including the rolling mills; that is (whatever may have been the relation that existed between the appellant company and Sturges, whether that of contractor or vice principal), the company had possession of and control over the building in which the mill was located, as well as the mill itself, including the engines, boilers, and machinery connected therewith. The company also operated the entire plant, including the mill, and made all necessary repairs throughout all of the departments of the plant. Sturges and his assistants had nothing to do with those matters, except to manufacture the iron bars mentioned in the evidence in the building and on the mill which was thus owned, controlled, and operated by the company; but, as previously stated, this record does not disclose whether Sturges was an independent contractor in doing that work or whether he was an employé and foreman of the company in charge of that work. Under this view of the case, the company undertaking to furnish and furnishing the place where, and the instrumentalities with which, the work was to be performed, the law imposed upon it the duty to exercise ordinary care in seeing that the place where Sturges and his assistants were to work, and that the instrumentalities with which they were to labor, were reasonably safe for that purpose, even though it be conceded that Sturges was an independent contractor. This is true for the reason that, if the owner undertakes to furnish the place and the appliances with which an independent contractor is to perform his contract, and retains possession and control over said place and appliances, then the contractor and his employés have the same right that an ordinary employé has to demand of the owner that they be reasonably safe for the purpose for which they were furnished. Geismann v. Missouri Edison El. Co., 173 Mo. 654, 73 S. W. 654; Ryan v. Railroad, 190 Mo. 621, 89 S. W. 865, 2 L. R. A. (N. S.) 777; Clark v. St. Louis & Suburban Ry. Co., 234 Mo. 396, 137 S. W. 583; Clark v. Union Iron & Foundry Co., 234 Mo. 436, 137 S. W. 577. The last two cases are just handed down by this division of the court, and are now pending in court in banc. The precise question now under consideration was fully considered in the Clark Case, and for that reason it is useless to further extend this discussion along that line. The only reason why the owner is not liable in damages for injuries sustained by an employé of an independent character is because the owner has no control over the actions of the contractor, whether they be negligent or not. But in the case at bar, as before stated, Sturges had no control over the place in which, or the instrumentalities with which, he was manufacturing the bars. And, since it is practically undisputed that respondent was injured in consequence of the absence of the post, we may drop the question of independent contractor and proceed to the consideration of the question, Was it negligence on the part of the company to have failed to furnish and maintain the post in question? The petition alleged, and the evidence of respondent tended to prove, that the ordinary, usual, and safe way to operate rolling mills of this class while the process of 'repeating' was going on was to have an iron post firmly set and maintained in the floor of the building in which the mill is located some 10 or 12 feet from the string of rolls, around which the bar was to pass in a semicircle, of sufficient strength to stop the movement of the bar whenever the end thereof should for any cause become caught in the rolls, and thereby prevent the loop of the bar from catching the employés by the feet or legs and drawing them up against the framework of the rollers."

By reading the contract before set out in the statement of the case, it will be seen that it does not materially change the nature of the case from what it was when previously here, for the evidence at the first trial showed, as it does here, that the appellant retained absolute possession and control of the entire plant, the rolling mill included; that it furnished the place for and the instrumentalities with which Sturges and his employés performed their duties; and that the appellant made all necessary repairs of every kind and description about the entire plant, the mill included, and also furnished the heat and power which was necessary to produce the manufactured articles mentioned in said contract. Sturges and those whom he represented, if any one, had nothing to do with, nor was he under any obligation to furnish the place where, or the instrumentalities with which, his employés did their work; nor was he or they under any legal obligation to keep those matters in repair. The evidence conclusively shows that those duties were reserved to the appellant and were not imposed by contract or otherwise upon Sturges, except when he might be guilty of misfeasance; but in this case the jury found he was not guilty of misfeasance, but, had he been, that fact would not have relieved the appellant of liability if its negligence had contributed with that of Sturges in producing the injury, much less can it escape liability where its negligence as the evidence shows, was the sole cause of the injury.

The second trial of the case was conducted in harmony with the views of this court expressed in the former opinion.

Finding no error in the record, the judgment of the circuit court is affirmed. All concur, except GRAVES, P. J., and FERRISS and LAMM, JJ., dissenting.

On Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. Now at this day the court, having seen and fully understood the appellant's motion for a rehearing herein, doth order that said motion be, and the same is hereby, overruled on condition that plaintiff within 10 days remit $5,000 of his judgment as of the date of the verdict, otherwise the motion will be sustained.

WOODSON and KENNISH, JJ., dissent.

November 30, 1912.

PER CURIAM. Pursuant to the order of this court made on the 26th day of November, 1912, conditionally overruling the appellant's motion for a rehearing herein, comes the said respondent this day, by attorney, and enters a remittitur herein in the sum of $5,000 as of the date of the original verdict, part and parcel of a judgment heretofore entered in this cause in the circuit court of Jackson county. Now, therefore, the court doth order that the appellant's motion for a rehearing herein be, and the same is hereby, overruled.

STATE v. STAPP.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 2.
Dec. 10, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 494*)—EVIDENCE—EXPERTS—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

The jury had a right to find that an abortion four weeks after the use of instruments on the womb of prosecutrix was caused thereby, notwithstanding uncontradicted expert testimony that it could not have been so caused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1081; Dec. Dig. § 494.*]

2. ABORTION (§ 11*)—EVIDENCE—"ADMINISTER."

Evidence that accused delivered pills to a pregnant woman with instructions to take them the following day, without any evidence that she ever swallowed any of them, was insufficient to support a conviction for administering a drug with intent to produce an abortion, since to "administer" a poison or other thing is to cause it to be taken by compelling a person by violence to swallow it, or by delivering it to one receiving it voluntarily into her system.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abortion, Cent. Dig. § 22; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 195-197.]

3. ABORTION (§ 13*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—"ADMINISTER"—"GIVE."

Where the evidence showed that a person accused of administering a drug with intent to produce an abortion gave pills to the prosecutrix with directions to take them the next day, an instruction that to "administer" drugs to a person meant to "give" them to such person was erroneous, since while to "give" drugs to a person may in some cases include the idea that the drugs are taken into the stomach, it could not have that meaning in view of the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Abortion, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3094-3098.]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*)—APPEAL—PREJUDICIAL ERROR.

Where accused was charged with using instruments and administering drugs to produce an abortion, and expert testimony that the abortion could not have been caused by the use of the instruments was uncontradicted, the erroneous submission of the issue relative to the administration of drugs was prejudicial, since the jury probably convicted on that ground.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154-3157, 3159-3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 785*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Even if an instruction, on a trial for abortion, that the fact that the prosecutrix was implicated, may be taken into consideration in determining her credibility is proper, its refusal is not error, since it contains no legal proposition, but is purely a comment on the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1774, 1776-1781, 1889-1894; Dec. Dig. § 785.*]

6. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 60*)—PARTICULARS OF OFFENSE.

An indictment charging accused with administering drugs to a pregnant woman and using instruments on her body to produce an abortion, but not alleging whether or not either the woman or a quick child died, is insufficient, since it does not show whether the offense is abortion or manslaughter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 182, 266, 267; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

7. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 125*)—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSES.

The administration of drugs and the use of instruments to produce an abortion are separate offenses, and hence should not be charged in one count of an indictment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 334-400; Dec. Dig. § 125.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ray County; F. H. Trimble, Judge.

Joseph Stapp was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Appellant is a physician and was convicted under an indictment charging him in one count with having administered drugs to a pregnant woman, and also with having used instruments upon her body, all with the intent to produce an abortion. There is no allegation in the indictment as to whether the death of the woman or of a quick child was caused by the abortion. Elizabeth Bales testified that she, being about four months pregnant, went, in company with Reed Taylor, the author of her trouble, to the office of the defendant about 10 o'clock at night on June 26, 1910; that Taylor first had a talk with the defendant out of hearing of the witness; that the witness then entered defendant's office, and defendant told her that he had learned from Taylor that they (witness and Taylor) were in trouble and that he had told Taylor that he (defendant) had helped others and would help them; that defendant used instruments in her womb, and gave her some pills with instructions to take them the next day. There was no evidence that she ever took (swallowed) the pills. No inquiry was made of her at the trial as to whether she ever took the pills into her stomach. The abortion occurred on July 24, 1910. She was not confined to her bed until the day on which the abortion occurred, but stated in her testimony that she could "hardly go." Several physicians testified as experts that an abortion would not occur from the use of instruments so long after such use, and there was no medical evidence to the contrary. Reed Taylor corroborated the evidence of Miss Bales as to the visit to defendant's office and the purpose of such visit. The defendant testified and denied the charge in toto. The court refused a demurrer to the evidence asked by the defendant, and also refused the following instruction asked by him: "The jury are instructed that the prosecuting witness is a competent witness, but the fact that she was implicated in the alleged transaction may be taken into consideration by the jury in determining the credibility to be given to her testimony." The jury were instructed to find the defendant guilty if they found that he, under the circumstances and with the intent mentioned in the instructions, administered to her any drugs or used upon her any instruments by inserting them in her womb. By instruction 3 the jury were told that the word "administered" meant the giving to her any drugs for the purpose of producing an abortion.

Lavelock & Kirkpatrick, of Richmond, for appellant. Elliott W. Major, Atty. Gen., and John M. Dawson, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

ROY, C. (after stating the facts as above).
[1] I. We are confronted with the fact that the abortion did not occur until four weeks after the alleged use of the instruments. The expert testimony was all to the effect that such result would not follow after so long a time. The jury were not necessarily bound by the expert evidence, and had the right to find that the abortion was caused by the use of the instruments notwithstanding such expert evidence. But on this record we cannot say that they did so find. They may have found that the abortion was caused by the drugs. Yet there is no evidence that she took the drugs into her stomach.

[2] Instruction No. 2 authorized them to find the defendant guilty if he administered the drugs with such an intent. There was no evidence on which to base it.

[3] Instruction No. 3 told the jury that to "administer" drugs to a person meant to "give" them to such person. To "give" drugs to a person under some circumstances may possibly include the idea that such drugs are taken into the stomach. It could not have any such meaning in this case, because the evidence was that defendant gave her the pills with directions to take them the next day. The jury may have failed to find that any instruments were used; and, under those instructions, may have found the defendant guilty because he had delivered to her the pills regardless of whether she ever swallowed them. We cannot presume that she swallowed any of the pills. She was on the stand, and counsel for the state did not ask her whether she swallowed them, and she made no statement on the subject. Bishop on Statutory Crimes, § 747, says: "To administer the poison or other thing is to cause it to be taken. It may be by forcing it down the woman's throat, or by violence compelling her to swallow it. Or it may be by delivering it to one who receives it into her system voluntarily, having, or not, asked for it." We hold that there was no evidence on which the defendant could be convicted of administering drugs to the prosecuting witness.

[4] From the circumstances of the case, we think it more than probable that the jury convicted the defendant on that ground. The error was directly prejudicial to the right of the accused.

[5] II. As to whether instruction F asked by defendant should have been given, Bishop says: "The woman is admissible as a witness within principles explained in another connection. We have seen that, generally, in our states, she is not technically an accomplice, whose evidence, therefore, is within the special rule requiring confirmation. But it is by some deemed that, 'inasmuch as she was in a moral point of view implicated in the transaction, it would be proper for the jury to consider that circumstance in its bearing upon her credibility,' rendering a caution from the court, to this effect, judicious and proper, and evidence confirmatory particularly appropriate. And some tribunals appear to regard her, as to confirmation, substantially the same as a technical accomplice. Yet, in reason, the difference is wide; for an accomplice swears under the temptation of earning thereby his own immunity, while she does not. She discloses her own disgrace; and, where no evil motive appears for it, this fact may, in reason, strengthen her credibility. Yet plainly the special temptations of the particular case should be taken into the account, and the attention of the jury may well be directed to them." It will be noticed that the writer says that the attention of the jury "may well be directed to them." He does not state that such instruction must be given. None of the cases cited by that writer require that such an instruction should be given. We consider such an instruction useless. It contains no legal proposition and is purely a comment on the evidence.

[6] III. The indictment does not charge the commission of any offense. Manslaughter, under the terms of section 4458, occurs only in case of the death of the woman or of the quick child. The offense of abortion is committed only when such death does not occur. There is no allegation that such death did or did not occur.

[7] It is well to call attention to the fact that administering drugs with such intent is an offense, and that the use of instruments with such an intent is also an offense, and that the indictment attempts to charge both such offenses in the same count.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

BLAIR, C., concurs.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

McCOLLIN v. JAMES BLACK MASONRY & CONSTRUCTION CO.

(Supreme Court of Missouri, Division No. 1.
Nov. 30, 1912. Rehearing Denied
Dec. 24, 1912.)

MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 149*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—NEGLIGENCE—"RIGGING."

The foreman in charge of the construction of a building directed employes who had just raised a column from the first floor to the second to bring to the first floor all the rigging, consisting of ropes and blocks and chains. The rigging hung above a rope supporting a scaffold in use. The employes not only removed the rigging, but untied the rope, causing the scaffold to fall, injuring an employe working thereon. Held, that the foreman was not guilty of actionable negligence in giving the order, since the word "rigging," when applied to the handling of heavy loads of timber, metal, or stone, means the tackle, lines, and fastenings with which the work is accomplished, and the order did not refer to the rope supporting the scaffold.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; C. C. Allen, Judge.

Action by John E. McCollin against the James Black Masonry & Construction Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Henry A. Baker and Campbell Allison, both of St. Louis, for appellant. Jones, Jones, Hocker & Davis, of St. Louis, for respondent.

BROWN, C. The petition states that the defendant is a Missouri corporation engaged in the general contracting business, and one Anton Pape was its foreman; that the plaintiff is a bridge and structural iron worker, and was on December 19, 1905, employed by defendant in that capacity in erecting a building in St. Louis under the direction of said Pape as foreman. The petition then proceeds as follows: "That while plaintiff was at work as aforesaid, on said day, he, in obedience to the order of said foreman, was on a plank scaffold, suspended below the second floor of said building, one end of which plank scaffold was resting on and supported by an X brace, and the other end was resting on and suspended by a rope, which rope was passed through a girder above the said plank scaffold and was wound three times around a floor beam or girder of the second floor, and then securely tied by two "half-hitches" to a wire cable just above the said second floor; that while plaintiff was thus on said plank scaffold and at work as aforesaid, without any knowledge, fault, or negligence on plaintiff's part, said foreman, Anton Pape, although he well knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that plaintiff was at work on said scaffold, as aforesaid, carelessly and negligently ordered and directed two of the employees of the defendant then at work on the said building under the direction of the said Pape, to take up the rigging (which rigging included the said rope supporting the plank scaffold on which the plaintiff sat as aforesaid), thereby ordering and directing the said workmen to take up and remove the said rope supporting the plank scaffold on which the plaintiff sat, as aforesaid, and that the said workmen, in obedience to the said order and direction, and in execution thereof, untied the said rope tied to the wire cable as aforesaid, and uncoiled the same, or permitted it to uncoil, from around the said girder, whereby the end of said scaffold which was being supported by said rope, as aforesaid, suddenly and without warning of any kind to plaintiff, was permitted and caused to drop, in consequence of which said negligence, plaintiff fell to the floor below." He then proceeds to describe his injuries, and asks $10,000 for damages. The answer contains a general denial.

The plaintiff proved that at the time of the accident he was engaged with others under the direction of Mr. Pape, in the work of reconstructing a building in St. Louis by substituting a heavy steel girder, three feet in depth, to support the second floor, in place of a wooden floor beam in use for that purpose, so that all supports might be removed and the entire room left in the clear. The supports had already been removed from beneath the wooden beam, and it was supported at the end near the place where the accident occurred by a wire cable wrapped around it, extending up through the second floor and fastened at the next floor. The steel girder consisted of two members placed side by side separated by pieces of metal between them, called "separators." These had already been placed in position, supported in some manner not clearly described, underneath and parallel to the wooden beam, and were ready to have the separators inserted, and be bolted together. This was to be done by the plaintiff and Mr. Connelly, members of the force at work on the building under the direction of Mr. Pape, who told them to construct a scaffold from which to do the work. Mr. McCollin got a yellow pine plank about 2 inches thick, 10 inches wide, and 16 to 18 feet long, and laid on the floor directly under and parallel to the girder, while Connelly went up to the second floor with a rope, which he passed through the space between the members of the girder. Mr. McCollin then took it and tied it securely to the north end of his plank, placed the south end in an X brace about three feet below the bottom of the girder, and then swung up the other end by the rope so as to level it. Mr. Connelly then wrapped his end of the rope three times around the wooden beam at a point near the wire cable that supported it from the floor above, and then made two half-hitches around the cable, fastening it securely. Mr. McCollin then sat upon the scaffold, the bottom of the girder just clearing his head, to put in and tighten the bolts in the lower half of the girder, while Mr. Connelly did the same work on the other half from above. They completed the scaffold and got to work at about 3 o'clock in the afternoon, stopping for the evening about half past 4. They went to work the next morning at 8 o'clock, and about a quarter before 10, while Mr. McCollin was pulling the wrench to tighten a bolt, the scaffold went from under him and he fell; his foot going through a hole in the floor, and fracturing his leg badly above the ankle. His first look was at the scaffold. The scaffold knot still held around the plank and the knot consisting of half-hitches around the wire cable was untied, the turns taken off the beam, and the weight of the rope over the steel girder held it suspended about a foot from the floor. The evidence tended strongly to show that the rope was well fastened and would not have become untied without manual interference; that two men named Jones and McVey were working on the second floor; that between 9 and 10 o'clock the morning of the accident they raised a column from the first to the second floor and put it in place. Mr. Pape then ordered them "to take down all the rigging that was up there and go down on the first floor." The rigging consisted of ropes and blocks and chains. There were several pieces of colls, and one rope was rigged up in a set of falls and tackle blocks directly over the place where the rope which supported the scaffold was tied. There were also some lashings or short pieces of rope used to tie on to anything to hook the falls into, and other pieces of rope that were used as hand lines. Mr. Jones, who testified, saw the rope that was tied to the cable that supported the wooden girder with two half-hitches. The plaintiff asked questions calculated to elicit testimony that the rope supporting the scaffold was "rigging" within the meaning of this order, which was excluded by the court and exceptions taken by the plaintiff. When the order was given, Mr. Pape, Mr. Jones, and Mr. McVey were all standing on the second floor; both Mr. McVey and Mr. Jones being near the rope that supported the scaffold. This was five or ten minutes before the accident. Mr. Jones, upon his cross-examination, testified that he did not untie this rope. He was not asked, either on direct or cross examination, whether he saw Mr. McVey untie it, and Mr. McVey was not introduced by either party.

At the close of plaintiff's evidence, the court, at the request of defendant, instructed the jury to find for the defendant, and the correctness of this ruling constitutes the only question here for review. It will be observed that the only negligence charged in the petition is that of Mr. Pape, the foreman, in giving the order "to take up the rigging." One thing is therefore evident: That, unless the order given by Mr. Pape constituted negligence, the court was right in holding that there could be no recovery. The order as proved was in the following words: "Bring down all the rigging that there is up here and come down on the first floor."

Like most language, this expression is to be construed with respect to the circumstances in which it was used. The man to whom it was addressed had just been raising a column from the first floor to the second. The fall, or movable pulley of the tackle, with its hook, hung above the same knot that became untied. This tackle, with the lashings by which it was fastened to its support or took hold upon its load, and the hand lines with which the column had been steadied and swayed to its place when the time came to set it down, were all there, and constituted the rigging used by the men who did the work. Having accomplished their task, nothing is more natural than that they should have been directed to remove it to some other place for use or storage. The word "rigging" is a common English one, and when applied to the handling of heavy loads, whether of timber, metal, or stone, or other similar material, means the tackle, lines, and fastenings with which the task is accomplished, without regard to the material, whether metal or vegetable, from which they are fabricated. In this case it would be an absurdity to hold that it referred to the ropes in use to support the building or structures in use at the time. Had the men to whom the order was given proceeded to unfasten the wire rope which supported the wooden floor beam so as to let the second floor down into the room below, it would not have shown a more fundamental misconception of a plain order than did the unfastening of the rope which was tied to it and supported the scaffold in use below.

Although in our opinion the evidence tends strongly to show that the rope supporting the scaffold was untied and cast off by the workmen on the second floor of the building, there is no evidence of negligence of the foreman in giving the order in evidence. It follows that the judgment of the trial court must be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

PER CURIAM. The foregoing opinion of BROWN, C., is adopted as the opinion of the court. All concur.

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 406*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIONS.

Where a person accused of defiling a female child confided to his care testified that he was impotent, the testimony of a witness that accused told him that he visited the house of a woman of ill repute was competent as an admission on the issue of impotency, even if it was not competent for purpose of impeachment because a proper foundation was not laid.

2. WITNESSES (§ 277*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION OF ACCUSED IN CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS.

Cross-examination of a person accused of defiling a female child concerning a visit by him to the house of a woman of ill repute was proper as tending to discredit his testimony that he was impotent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 925, 979-984; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 480*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—COMPETENCY OF EXPERTS.

The sustaining of an objection, unless the witness further qualified himself, to a question asked a doctor as to whether in his opinion accused could have had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, was proper where the witness had stated that he had paid but little attention to the girl and was hardly qualified to answer.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1069; Dec. Dig. § 480.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*) — APPEAL — REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

While it is the province of the jury to weigh the testimony and determine the facts, when the question of the sufficiency of the evidence is properly presented, an appellate court must determine it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3074-3083; Dec. Dig. § 1159.*]

5. RAPE (§ 52*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

Accused was charged with rape on a female under 14 years of age, and with defiling a female under 18 years of age confided to his care. He was convicted on the second charge. The only evidence on the issue of rape tended to show a ravishment by force, and on this theory evidence was admitted that the prosecutrix made complaint promptly after the commission of the crime. Held that, although the conviction was not for rape, the sufficiency of the evidence to support it should be tested by the rules applicable in cases of rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 78-82; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

6. RAPE (§ 54*) — EVIDENCE — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

A conviction for rape may be had on the uncorroborated testimony of the prosecutrix; but if her testimony is contradictory, or not convincing, or leaves the mind clouded with doubts, it must be corroborated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 83, 84; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

7. RAPE (§ 52*) — EVIDENCE — WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

Where the testimony of the prosecutrix was not corroborated and was contradictory and improbable, her reputation for truth, veracity, and morality was seriously impeached, and no testimony was offered to sustain it, the evidence did not support a conviction for defiling a female child.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71-74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Bates County; C. A. Calvird, Judge.

F. H. Donnington was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. O. Jackson, of Butler, and Silvers & Silvers, of Kansas City, for appellant. Elliott W. Major, Atty. Gen., and John M. Atkinson, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

KENNISH, J. The defendant was tried in the circuit court of Bates county, at the February term, 1911, under an indictment containing two counts. The first count charged him with carnally knowing Esther Cronkhite, a female child under the age of 14 years, and the second charged him with defiling Esther Cronkhite, a female under 18 years of age, who had been confided to his care. The jury returned a verdict of not guilty on the first count and a verdict of guilty on the second. Defendant was sentenced to four years in the penitentiary and appealed to this court.

The evidence for the state tended to show the following facts: At the time of the alleged offense the defendant was 37 or 38 years of age and weighed over 200 pounds. He was a hard working man, had been married three times, and had a daughter 18 years of age. His second wife died in March, 1907 and in May of that year he married her sister, who had been making her home at his house prior to the death of his second wife. In August, 1909, defendant and his wife went to Kansas City and procured, through the mediation of the Detention Home, three children of one R. T. Cronkhite, a laborer, whose wife was dead. The children were Esther, the prosecutrix, who was 12 years of age on January 2, 1909, Forest, a boy aged 10, and Alice aged 2. The arrangement made with the father of the children was that defendant and his wife were to take them and care for them as their own. The children were taken to defendant's home on a farm in Bates county and all three remained there until Christmas, 1909, when the father went to visit them and insisted on taking the youngest back home with him. A few days later he did take the baby to his home in Kansas City, and did not see Esther or Forest again until after the indictment herein was returned.

The testimony of the prosecutrix was to the following effect: The defendant "took advantage" of her five times during February and March, 1910; once during the first week in February, three times in the latter part of that month, and once on the 1st day of March. On each of these occasions her brother Forest, the defendant's wife, and Mahan, a farm hand employed by defendant, were all away from defendant's home, leaving defendant and her alone in the house. The first three times defendant's wife had gone to town, and the last two times she was visiting a neighbor. When the second offense was committed, which was in the latter part of February, Mahan was in the field plowing corn. The first time defendant "took advantage" of her he called her upstairs, in the daytime, caught her by the hands, laid her on the bed, and attempted to ravish her. She screamed, fought, and resisted in every way she could, and he did not accomplish his purpose. When, about three weeks later, he did succeed in defiling her, and also on three subsequent occasions when he forced her to yield to him, the circumstances were precisely the same as at the time of the first assault; defendant either called or sent her upstairs to the same room, in the daytime, caught her by the hands, laid her on the bed, and forcibly ravished her, while she resisted in just the same manner as at the time of the first attempt. In the first attempt there was no penetration whatever, but she bled a few drops. The second time there was penetration, from which she suffered pain; but she did not bleed. Defendant warned her if she told what he had done it would mean sudden death, and she never informed any person of what had happened or complained to any person of the treatment she had received, except her brother Forest. She told him of each offense on the road to school. In each instance that was the first opportunity she had to tell him, although three of the offenses were committed on Saturdays when there was no school and would be none until the following Monday. She remained at defendant's home until she and Forest were taken away by the sheriff on June 13, 1910, which was the day before the grand jury returned the indictment against the defendant, and between March 1st and June 13th defendant made no attempt to violate her person. After the commission of the third offense and before the commission of the last one, defendant's wife went to the town of Adrian and remained from Friday until Sunday, and during that time defendant did not molest her.

On cross-examination she testified that, after defendant defiled her, he whipped her and her brother for stealing money from the hired man and lying about it and for playing truant from school. She denied that she stole the money, but testified that Forest confessed it, and then defendant whipped both of them for stealing and lying and for truancy. In a deposition taken eight months before the trial, she denied that defendant whipped her. She admitted that both she and Forest wanted to get away from defendant's home because of "the mistreatment." In her deposition she testified that both she and the boy wanted to leave defendant's place because his wife beat them, and in that connection the following questions and answers appear in her deposition: "Q. Did you and your brother Forest talk about trying to get away from Mrs. Donnington? A. Yes. Q. Did you both agree that if you could tell about Mr. Donnington this would help you get away? A. Forest told. Q. Did he tell this so you could get away? A. I don't know." She admitted that while living in Kansas City she shot at a man, but her testimony does not disclose the circumstances of the shooting. In the course of her cross-examination, the following occurred: "Now, do you remember an old Swede named Swanson? A. Yes, sir. Q. You used to visit him occasionally? A. I visited his wife. Q. His wife? Why, he was a widower. A. I did his washing for him. My oldest brother always took the clothes to him." She admitted that in a conversation with defendant's mother soon after he was arrested she was asked why she did not tell the mother about defendant's misconduct when the mother visited his home, and that she answered by saying: "Oh, I forgot it. I didn't think about it."

In her deposition, taken two months after defendant was arrested, she stated that when the first assault took place the defendant told her to lie down upon the bed, and she refused to do so; that he threatened to whip her unless she did as he told her, and she then lay down upon the bed. At the trial her testimony was that on that occasion he placed her upon the bed by force. In the deposition she said that when the first assault was made she did not know that there was any blood upon her garments until she went to bed that night. At the trial she testified that the defendant noticed the blood on her garments and made her go downstairs and wash them immediately after the assault took place. Asked to explain this discrepancy in her testimony, she said: "I just got it wrong the other time." In the deposition she testified that she did not know in what month defendant first assaulted her; that he "took advantage" of her five times, but she could not tell when either assault occurred. At the trial, eight months later, she fixed the time of each offense positively; one during the first week of February, three in the latter part of that month, and the last one on the 1st day of March. After prosecutrix left the witness stand, she was recalled by the state and explained that, when she said Mahan was plowing corn in February, she meant he was plowing up cornstalks. Being cross-examined, she admitted that the prosecuting attorney had asked her in the meantime if it was not cornstalks instead of corn that the man was plowing in February. She was then asked on what part of the farm he was plowing, and answered, "The south end." Asked if she did not know there were no cornstalks on the south end of the farm at that time, she answered, "He was in the west end."

No evidence whatever was introduced by the state tending to corroborate the prosecuting witness. It does not appear that she became pregnant, or that a medical examination was ever made to ascertain whether or not she had been deflowered. It was not shown by any other witness that she suffered any pain or shock as a result of the alleged repeated outrages, or that she made complaint to any person, although she was attending school during the month of February, 1910. Her brother Forest, to whom she testified she made prompt complaint each time the offense was committed, and who was eleven years old at the time of the trial, was not called as a witness.

The defense was a denial by defendant, and testimony contradicting prosecutrix as to many circumstances in connection with her version of the commission of the different offenses; that prosecutrix was a slender, undeveloped girl—had not reached the age of puberty; that it would have been impossible for defendant to have defiled her without so injuring her as to cause intense pain and suffering; that defendant had been completely impotent since the month of April, 1908; also, that the reputation of prosecutrix for truth and veracity and for morality was bad.

Defendant's wife and Mahan, the hired man, testified that Mrs. Donnington was away from home but twice in February, 1910, and but once in March. One of the times to which they testified she was away from home was in the latter part of February, when she went to Adrian on Friday and remained until Sunday. Prosecutrix testified that defendant was guilty of no improper conduct while his wife was away on that trip. Defendant's wife corroborated him as to his impotency subsequent to April, 1908. He was also corroborated in this respect by Dr. Hall of Adrian and by Dr. Dawson of Kansas City, both of whom testified that an injury of the scrotum received by defendant several years before, and an operation that was performed therefor, would tend to render him partially or completely impotent. Mahan testified that neither he nor any other person did any plowing on defendant's farm during the month of February, 1910. He further testified that, after defendant whipped prosecutrix and the boy for lying and stealing, prosecutrix said to the witness that she would "get even with defendant for whipping her." Three witnesses from Kansas City, who had known prosecutrix when she lived there with her father, testified to her bad reputation for truth and veracity and morality. Two of them, Mrs. Miller and Mrs. Burch, were engaged in city mission work for the Dunkard Church in Kansas City, and prosecutrix came under their observation in their mission work. They based their testimony on what they heard from people living in the vicinity of her father's home. The other witness, Mrs. Hagen, lived in the immediate vicinity of the Cronkhite home in Kansas City. The defendant called a number of witnesses who testified to his good reputation, and the state, in rebuttal, produced several who testified to the contrary on that issue. Other material facts will be stated in connection with the points decided.

[1] I. The defendant was asked on cross-examination if, returning from Butler to his home in 1910, he did not state to Paul Jenkins that he had visited the house of Clara Hussy, a woman of ill repute, and that he was going to "get some from her." He denied making the statement, and in rebuttal Paul Jenkins was asked by the prosecuting attorney if the defendant made the foregoing statement to him, under the circumstances mentioned. The witness answered affirmatively, but fixed the date in 1909. The defendant moved that the testimony of Jenkins be stricken out for the reason that the time fixed by the impeaching witness was a different date from that named in laying the foundation for impeachment. The court overruled the motion, and error is assigned upon such ruling. The testimony sought to be stricken out was competent as an admission against the defendant upon the issue of impotency, even though not for the purpose of impeachment, and we think the court properly overruled the defendant's motion.

[2] Neither was it error to prove by cross-examination of defendant that he had visited the house of Clara Hussy. He had testified that he was impotent, and relative to that question it was the right of the state to prove his behavior in that respect by cross-examination. That he visited such a place, in connection with his admission to Jenkins as to his intentions, was proper cross-examination, as a circumstance tending to discredit his testimony as to his impotency at the time of the alleged offense.

[3] II. Dr. Hall, as a witness for the defendant, was asked to state whether in his opinion the defendant could have had sexual intercourse with the prosecuting witness. An objection to this question was sustained by the court, and defendant complains of such ruling as error. The court gave as a reason for the ruling that the Doctor had stated that he had paid but little attention to the girl, and was hardly qualified to answer the question, adding, "Unless he further qualifies himself, the objection will be sustained." The witness did not further qualify, as suggested by the court, and we think the court correctly sustained the objection.

[4] III. One ground of the motion for a new trial is that the verdict is against the weight of the evidence and is not supported by the evidence. This assignment calls for a consideration of the testimony upon which the verdict of guilty rests. In the discharge of this duty we are not unmindful of the settled rule of appellate procedure that it is the province of the jury to weigh the testimony and to determine the facts. Nevertheless, when the question of the sufficiency of the testimony is properly presented, an appellate court cannot escape responsibility by shifting it to the jury. The heinousness of the crime charged herein and the strong feeling against one accused of such crime, under the surrounding facts of this case, independent of the question of guilt or innocence, have such an influence against the person on trial that courts, in a spirit of caution born of experience, closely examine and scrutinize the testimony upon which a conviction has been secured.

[5] The defendant was charged with and put upon his trial for two offenses, namely, rape, and defiling a female under his care and protection. While the former, on account of the age of the prosecutrix, did not require proof of force, yet the only testimony for the state upon that issue tended to show a ravishment by force, and therefore any testimony competent in corroboration of the prosecutrix in forcible rape was competent in this case. Upon this theory alone the state was permitted to introduce evidence tending to prove that the prosecutrix made complaint promptly after the commission of the crime. And although the conviction was not upon the count charging rape, both offenses were submitted to the jury upon the testimony, and we think its sufficiency to sustain the verdict should be judged by the rules applicable in rape cases.

[6] In the recent case of State v. Tevis, 234 Mo., loc. cit. 284, 136 S. W. 341, this court, speaking through Brown, J., announced the law upon the question of corroboration of the prosecutrix in such cases, as follows: "A conviction in cases of either incest or rape may be had upon the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecutrix, but when the evidence of such prosecutrix is of a contradictory nature, or, when applied to the admitted facts in the case, her testimony is not convincing, but leaves the mind of the court clouded with doubts, she must be corroborated, or the judgment cannot be sustained. State v. Goodale, 210 Mo. 275, loc. cit. 290 [109 S. W. 9]; State v. Brown, 209 Mo. 413 [107 S. W. 1068]."

The same subject is discussed, and the rules by which courts should be guided are set forth, in Kelley's Crim. Law & Prac. § 541, in the language following: "The credibility of the witness, and whether her statements be true or not, must be left with the jury. If her reputation for chastity and morality be good, and she made complaint at her first opportunity, or shortly after the fact, and the accused fled, any such facts would go to strengthen her testimony. On the other hand, if her reputation for truth, morality, or chastity be bad; if she concealed the injury for any considerable time; if she might have been heard, and yet made no outcry—these facts would tend to show that her testimony is false or feigned. So, if she voluntarily continue friendly intercourse with the accused after the fact without complaining against him, this would tend to render her story improbable. The state may not only show any marks of violence seen upon her person to corroborate her story, but may prove that she made complaint recently after the alleged offense."

[7] There is such an utter absence of testimony corroborative of the prosecuting witness, in the record before us; so many contradictory statements in her testimony given at the trial, as compared with that given in her deposition; such improbability in her version of the crime; and her reputation for truth and veracity and for morality was so seriously impeached by women who well knew her and her reputation in Kansas City, while no testimony was offered to sustain it—that we are not willing to let a verdict stand for so grave a crime, upon such unsatisfactory evidence. We shall not dwell upon the weakness of the case against the defendant by going over the testimony in detail. We think it sufficient to say at this time that the decision of the case has been withheld because of the thorough and most careful examination and re-examination we have made of the testimony. We are not disposed to end the case by reversing the judgment and discharging the defendant, for the reason that upon a retrial the state may be able to introduce testimony in corroboration of the prosecutrix; but we do not hesitate to say that, unless a stronger case is made against the defendant upon a second trial, an instruction directing a verdict should be given.

Other errors are assigned, which we have examined and found to be without merit; but, in view of the disposition made of the case, we do not deem it necessary to discuss them.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded.

FARRIS v. ST. LOUIS & S. F. R. CO.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 23, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 23, 1912.)

1. RAILROADS (§ 327*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS —DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN.

The duty to look and listen for approaching trains, including the obligation to see and hear, before attempting to cross a highway crossing, is absolute; failure to do so, if there be opportunity, being negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1043-1056; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

2. RAILROADS (§ 327*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS —DUTY TO LOOK AND LISTEN.

The duty to look and listen before crossing a highway crossing, and to see and hear approaching trains, is particularly applicable to pedestrians; the danger zone being smaller in their case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1043-1056; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

3. RAILROADS (§ 328*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS —DUTY TO LOOK.

The fact that the view was obstructed in approaching a railroad crossing on a highway made it more obligatory upon a pedestrian to look for approaching trains before attempting to cross.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1057-1070; Dec. Dig. § 328.*]

4. RAILROADS (§ 335*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS —NEGLIGENCE.

One injured at a railroad crossing, by showing that he went upon the track without seeing the train, when he could have done so by looking, destroys his prima facie case, made by showing failure to give the signals and the resulting collision.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1028, 1084, 1086-1088; Dec. Dig. § 335.*]

5. RAILROADS (§ 334*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

A traveler, who without his own fault is placed in a position of imminent peril at a railroad crossing, will not be guilty of contributory negligence, though he did not select the wisest course in extricating himself, especially where placed therein by the company's negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. § 1027; Dec. Dig. § 334.*]

6. RAILROADS (§ 327*)—CROSSING ACCIDENTS—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE.

Though a pedestrian knows that a certain train is due to stop at a nearby station at a certain time, and sees a train approaching at that time, he cannot assume that it is the local train, which will stop, so as to excuse himself from ascertaining whether it is the expected train.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Railroads, Cent. Dig. §§ 1043-1056; Dec. Dig. § 327.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Crawford County; L. B. Woodside, Judge.

Action by Frank H. Farris, administrator of the estate of J. H. Calvin, against the St. Louis & San Francisco Railroad Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. F. Evans, of St. Louis, and Mann, Todd & Mann, of Springfield, for appellant. Frank H. Farris and C. C. Bland, both of Rolla, for respondent.

GRAY, J. This is an action by the plaintiff, administrator of the estate of J. H. Calvin, deceased, to recover damages for his death alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. The answer denied negligence on defendant's part, and alleged that Calvin's death was due to, and was the direct result of, his own negligence. The issues were submitted to a jury, and a verdict for $2,000 returned.

It is conceded that Calvin was killed by being struck by a passenger train of defendant at a crossing in the village of Moselle, this state, on the 29th day of March, 1911. Moselle has a population of about 250. Defendant's track runs from the southwest to the northeast through the village. The depot is situated on the north side of the track. At a point about 120 feet east of the depot is a public crossing. The railroad track divides the village, and residences and business houses are situated on either side of the track, and there is, at a point about 50 feet east of the depot, a crossing for footmen, which had been used as such for a long time prior to the death of the deceased. At a point a few feet northeast of this crossing, a sidetrack left the main line and extended parallel therewith by the station to the southwest, and at a point where the footpath crossed the track the south rail of the main track was about 6 feet from the north rail of the side track. At a point southeast of the depot and just south of the side track there was a granary, and on the side track opposite the granary and just to the southwest of the footpath, were two box cars. The east end of the east car was a few feet northeast of the east end of the granary and about 20 feet southwest of the foot path at the point where the same crossed the tracks. The defendant had two east-bound morning passenger trains, each of which had a fixed schedule of time. Train No. 6 was a fast train, due at 6 o'clock a. m., and did not stop at Moselle. Train No. 14 was due to arrive at 7:39 a. m., and was a local train, always stopping at Moselle. No. 6 was late, and arrived at Moselle on the time of No. 14.

The evidence discloses that the deceased, who had been in and about the village for several months, started to cross from a saloon on the south side of the village to the north side, by way of the footpath, and, as he was passing over the main track, was struck by the fast east-bound No. 6, and killed. The evidence further discloses that several people were at the station, waiting to become passengers on No. 14, when No. 6 passed through without stopping, and at a rate of about 60 miles an hour. There is a sharp conflict in the record as to whether the signals were given for the station and the crossing. The plaintiff's witnesses testified that signals were not given, and the defendant's witnesses that they were. The verdict of the jury settled this question in favor of plaintiff.

The petition alleged that the distance between the side track and the main track was 8 feet, and all the witnesses practically agreed that at the northeast corner of the east box car the distance was 7 feet and 8 inches, and at the path about 6 feet. The witnesses also agreed that, when the deceased had reached a point where his view was no longer obstructed by the east end of the box car, he could have seen, had he looked, the approaching train for some distance down the track. This distance had been measured by one witness for the plaintiff and two for the defendant, and they agreed that it was from 1,400 to 1,500 feet. Other witnesses testified that it was about a quarter of a mile. One witness for the plaintiff, however, testified he had never measured it, but he thought the track was straight for about 600 feet, and that a train could have been seen coming that distance at least. There was other testimony that the train could have been seen beyond the point where the curve commenced in the track. It can hardly be said there is any conflict on this point, as the witness who testified the track was straight for 600 feet said he was only approximating it, and it might have been straight for a greater distance, and did not undertake to say a train could not have been seen at a greater distance than 600 feet.

The evidence showed that the side of the box car extended 2 feet north of the south rail of the side track, and this distance, deducted from the distance between the rails, left a space of 5 feet and 8 inches between the northeast corner of the box car and the south rail of the main track. In determining the distance the deceased was from the main track when he could have seen the approaching train, the distance the side track was from the main track at the point where the path crossed the same is immaterial. The issue would be the same if the side track had not extended east of the box cars at all. The deceased could have seen the approaching train when his vision was no longer obstructed by the box car, and, as heretofore stated, the witnesses agreed that this was when he was at least 5 feet and 8 inches from the main track, and that the train would have remained in full view from the time when it first could have been seen until it had crossed the path. It is upon this proof that the appellant claims the court should have given its demurrer to the evidence.

[1, 2] The duty to look and listen for an approaching train before attempting to cross a railroad track is absolute, and the failure to do so when there is opportunity therefor is want of ordinary care as a matter of law. Burge v. Railroad (Sup.) 148 S. W. 925; Green v. Railway, 192 Mo. 131, 90 S. W. 805. This duty to look and listen before attempting to cross the track includes the obligation to see and hear a train, and where the undisputed evidence shows that the deceased, by looking, had an opportunity to see the approaching train before the time of the accident, and that his opportunity was such that he could not have failed to have seen or heard the train in time to avoid the injury, if he had used ordinary care in looking, then under the law he will be deemed to have seen and heard the train, although there was no testimony that he did see it. Under such circumstances, the traveler is deemed to have seen what was plainly to be seen. This doctrine is applied in cases where it was daylight, and the engine or train in plain view, and could unquestionably have been seen if the traveler had looked in the direction from whence it came. This rule is particularly applicable to persons traveling on foot, "since the danger zone in such a case is so narrow, and it may be avoided with so little effort."

[3] Granting that, on account of the obstructions, the deceased could not have seen the approaching train from the time he left the saloon until he had reached the northeast corner of the box car, it does not help the plaintiff's case. On the contrary, the very fact that the view was obstructed until he reached this point made it all the more necessary for him, when he had reached that point, to look for the approaching train before attempting to pass over the track. Philadelphia, B. & W. R. Co. v. Buchanan (Del.) 78 Atl. 776; L. & N. R. Co. v. Gardner's Adm'r, 140 Ky. 772, 131 S. W. 787; Coleman

v. Atlantic Coast L. R. Co., 153 N. C. 322, 69 S. E. 251; Elliott v. Railroad, 84 Conn. 444, 80 Atl. 283; Beech v. Railway, 85 Kan. 90, 116 Pac. 213; Wise v. Railroad, 81 N. J. Law, 397, 80 Atl. 459.

[4] The respondent claims that he made a prima facie case when he showed that the deceased was killed at a public crossing by a train colliding with him, and that the statutory signals were not given, and the burden of proving nonliability was then shifted to the defendant. This is the general rule; but, when the plaintiff's own testimony shows that the injured person was guilty of negligence that directly contributed to the result, there is nothing left for the defendant to prove. Green v. Railroad, 192 Mo. 131, 90 S. W. 805. In other words, the rule is that where the plaintiff, in making out his case, shows that he went upon the track without seeing the train, when he could have seen it by looking, he thereby overcomes and destroys his own prima facie case, made by the showing of the failure to give the signals and the collision.

[5] It is next claimed by the respondent that the deceased could not see the approaching train until he had reached the danger point, and that he passed to the danger point because the defendant failed to give any signal of the approaching train, and, had the signal been given, the deceased would have stopped before he got so close to the track as to be in a place of danger, and that he was killed while attempting to escape. When a traveler upon a highway, without fault on his part, is placed in a position of imminent peril at a railroad crossing, the law will not hold him guilty of negligence, though he did not select the very safest course; and this rule is especially applicable where the person was placed in such perilous position by the railroad company's negligence, as in failing to give proper signals. Dickinson v. Railroad Co., 81 N. J. Law, 464, 81 Atl. 104, 87 L. R. A. (N. S.) 150.

Do the facts justify the respondent in invoking this rule? We think not. The east end of the box car was west of the path, and therefore there was nothing for at least 30 feet south of the main track, and all the deceased had to do, when he arrived within 6 feet of the main track, was to look to the southwest, and he would have seen the approaching train, and could have stepped back until it had passed.

[6] It is next claimed that the fast train came through on the time of the local train, and that the deceased was justified in believing it was the local train, and would stop at the station, and therefore he would have plenty time to pass over the track ahead of it. In the first place, there is no evidence that the deceased believed the approaching train was the local or slow train, or that he did not know the fast train had not passed. In fact, it is not even alleged in the petition that he relied on any such facts. But, waiving all pleading and proof, the point must be decided against the respondent as a matter of law. In Boyd v. Railway Co., 105 Mo. 371, 16 S. W. 909, the deceased, husband of plaintiff, was a hotel keeper in the town of Renick. His hotel was situated about 100 feet from the depot, and the tracks of the defendant were between the hotel and the depot. The deceased, in the prosecution of his business, was in the habit of going to the depot upon the incoming of all passengers stopping at the station. One of the defendant's regular trains was due at 12:30 p. m. On the day plaintiff's husband was killed, an excursion train approached the station on the time of the other train, and was running about 40 or 45 miles an hour. When the deceased heard the train, he immediately came out of the hotel and started to the depot, and entered upon the track immediately in front of the approaching engine, and was killed. In passing on the case, the Supreme Court said: "The train was in plain view. That he both heard the train and saw it, in a general way, there is no question; but he did not stop a moment in his course to observe its movement, to ascertain whether it was the regular train he was expecting, and which would stop at the depot, and whose speed, as it slowed up for that purpose, he could accurately gauge from his long and frequent experience, or, as it proved to be, a special going at a high rate of speed and showing no evidence of an intention to stop. Dominated, perhaps, by the first impression, received in the house when he heard the whistle, that this was the regular mail, he hastened towards the depot and onto the track without stopping for a moment to test by sense of sight or sound the correctness of his first impression, and as the result of his heedlessness lost his life."

This decision is controlling on us, and undoubtedly holds that the pedestrian, even though he knows that a certain train is due to stop at a station at a certain time, and he sees a train coming at such time, he cannot assume that it is the regular train and will stop, but must watch its movements and ascertain for himself whether it is the expected train. In Moody v. Railroad, 68 Mo. 470, the plaintiff's husband was postmaster at Webster, and was in the habit of delivering the mail to a certain passenger train. His post office was on the opposite side of the railroad to that where the depot was, and from which the mail bags had to be delivered to the train. On the night of the accident he heard a train about the time the mail train was expected and usually passed, and he picked up his mail bags, saw the approaching train, but, supposing it would stop, attempted to cross over in front of the locomotive and was killed. There was much testimony that the statutory signals were not given. In passing on the case

Judge Napton said: "As to ringing the bell or sounding the whistle, it was clearly of no importance, so far as Moody was concerned, since it is conceded that he heard and saw the train, and was simply misled by supposing it was the mail train; and the only question is, who is to be responsible for the mistake and his recklessness in determining to cross over in front of the cars, which he could see were going at a rapid rate? Our opinion is that the instruction asked by the defendant, applicable as it was to the facts in evidence, should have been given." It makes no difference, in the Moody and Boyd Cases, that the deceased actually saw the train coming, and that there is no evidence in the present case that Calvin did see the train, as all the evidence shows that Calvin could have seen the train, had he looked, and therefore the law says he did see it.

The case is very similar to Giardina v. Railroad, 185 Mo. 330, 84 S. W. 928. In that case the defendant had a double-track street railroad in the city of St. Louis. An east-bound car had stopped at a street crossing to receive passengers. While the car was thus standing, the plaintiff came running to deliver a key to a person on the car. The car was on the south track, and the plaintiff came to the rear end of the car and delivered the key, then turned to go back across the north track, and, as he did so, he was struck by a west-bound car on that track and received his injuries. The plaintiff testified that he knew it was the custom of the company to have the motorman of a car, which was approaching a car that had stopped, sound his gong and go slowly, and, knowing this custom, he, before attempting to cross the north track, paused behind the east-bound car and listened, but, hearing no gong, concluded there was no car coming. The evidence showed that, with the east-bound car out of the way, the plaintiff could have seen the car on the north track for 1,000 feet. In passing on the case, Judge Vaillant said: "It may be conceded that the defendant was negligent in running its car at a high rate of speed and without sounding the gong past a standing car, from the rear of which the motorman ought to have known that people were liable to pass. It is not likely that the peremptory instruction was given on the theory that no negligence of the defendant was shown, but rather that the plaintiff failed to observe that degree of care that was to be expected of a man of ordinary prudence. * * * From where he stood the body of the east-bound car shut off his view to the east; but one who was as familiar with the movements of the cars as he said he was, in fact, any man of common experience in the plaintiff's place, should have known that in a moment the east-bound car would have gone, and the obstruction to his vision would have been removed. But, even if he had not had that moment to spare, he could have leaned forward beyond the line of the standing car in perfect safety, and have seen the west-bound car coming. The measured distance between the tracks was 6 feet 10 inches. * * * His act in stepping on or near the north track without looking for the west-bound car was negligence, and it contributed to cause the accident."

If we adopt the theory that the deceased knew the time of the trains, and saw the approaching train, but believed it was the local or slow train, and relied on its stopping, and tried to pass in front of it, then we have nothing to do but to follow the Boyd and Moody Cases, and hold that the defendant is not liable for his mistake; and, on the other hand, if we proceed on the theory that he had no such knowledge, then he passed from a point of safety to danger without looking to see an approaching train, that he could have seen, had he looked, and our judgment is controlled by a long line of decisions of the Supreme Court, holding in such case defendant is not liable.

The judgment is reversed. All concur.

Appeal from St. Louis Circuit Court; James E. Withrow, Judge.

Action by M. Silberberg against Israel Gitenstein. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Felix Cornitus, of St. Louis, for appellant. Henry H. Furth, of St. Louis, for respondent.

NORTON, J. This cause originated before a justice of the peace, and defendant prosecuted an appeal from the judgment there rendered against him to the circuit court. Two terms of court having elapsed after appeal was perfected, plaintiff moved an affirmance of the judgment of the justice for want of notice of the appeal, as it is said no such notice was given. On hearing the court sustained this motion, and gave judgment for the plaintiff affirming the judgment of the justice. It is from this judgment of the circuit court on plaintiff's motion for an affirmance because of the failure to give notice of the appeal from the justice that the present appeal is prosecuted.

[1] The record here is in such condition as precludes our right of review. Though a bill of exceptions was made and filed in due time and appears to be allowed and signed by the judge, there is no exception whatever to be found therein. The question which it is sought to have reviewed here arises wholly on the motion to affirm the judgment of the justice, and there appears to have been no exception saved to the ruling of the court on that motion. Mere motions filed in a cause are not part of the record proper, but are matters of exception which themselves, together with an exception to the ruling of the court thereon, must be preserved in the bill of exceptions in order to have the ruling on such motions reviewed on appeal. See Stark v. Zehnder, 204 Mo. 442, 102 S. W. 992. It is true the motion itself is incorporated in the bill of exceptions here. However this may be, no exception to the action of the court thereon appears.

[2] Furthermore, we are precluded from reviewing the ruling of the trial court on this motion, and in affirming the judgment of the justice for the reason that no motion for a rehearing or new trial of that question appears in the bill of exceptions. Matters of exception which occur in the trial court must be brought to the attention of the trial court by a motion for a new trial or rehearing, and that tribunal afforded an opportunity to review the ruling thereon or else no review of the same question may be had here. It may be that had this question been presented to the trial court by a motion for a new trial or rehearing this appeal would have been unnecessary, for, perchance, the trial court would have corrected the ruling complained of if it is, in fact, an erroneous one. At any rate, it is well settled that rulings on motions interposed before final judgment and exceptions thereon will not be reviewed in the appellate court in the absence of a motion for a new trial or rehearing first inviting the attention of the trial court thereto. When there is no motion for a new trial in the bill of exceptions, the matter of exception is not open for review on appeal. See Coy v. Landers, 146 Mo. App. 413, 125 S. W. 789; Sim- coe Realty Co. v. Wm. J. Lemp Brewing Co., 152 S. W. 31.

[3] Moreover, even where there is a motion for a new trial or rehearing and such motion has been overruled, matters of exception will not be reviewed here unless there appears, too, an exception to the action of the trial court in overruling the motion for a new trial. See Wilbrandt v. Laclede Gas-light Co., 135 Mo. App. 220, 115 S. W. 497.

For the reasons given, the judgment should be affirmed. It is so ordered.

MARTIN v. BUNKER-CULLER LUMBER CO.

(Springfield Court of Appeals. Missouri. Dec. 2, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 19, 1912.)

1. SALES (§ 418*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—DAMAGES.

The damages for breach of defendant's contract to sell plaintiff timber for wagon hubs are not limited to the difference between the contract price and the market value, but include loss of profits, it being understood plaintiff was buying the timber to manufacture into hubs to sell, and plaintiff being unable elsewhere to obtain such timber.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 113*)—LOSS OF PROFITS—MARKET VALUE.

As regards damages from loss of profits through defendant's breach of contract to furnish timber for plaintiff to manufacture into hubs to sell, the price at which another had contracted to buy the hubs of plaintiff is some evidence of their market value.

3. SALES (§§ 411, 418*)—BREACH OF CONTRACT—PETITION.

The petition showing the agreement that plaintiff should erect a mill on defendant's land for manufacture of hubs, and that defendant should furnish plaintiff timber to manufacture into hubs, that plaintiff erected the mill at a certain cost, and defendant failed and refused to furnish the timber, authorizes recovery of nominal damages; and so states a cause of action.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Shannon County; W. N. Evans, Judge.

Action by George R. Martin against the Bunker-Culler Lumber Company. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. W. Lincoln, of Springfield, Wm. P. Elmer, of Salem, and Orchard & Cunningham, of Eminence, for appellant. Munger & Lindsay, of Piedmont, and Lin Shuck, of Eminence, for respondent.

GRAY, J. This appeal presents the vexed and difficult problem as to when the profits lost by the party defeated of his contract by the wrongful act of the other contracting party can be recovered in a suit for damages based on a breach of the contract.

The defendant in March, 1909, owned a sawmill at Bunker, Mo., and also a large body of timber in that vicinity. On the 9th of March the plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract in writing, by the terms of which the defendant was to furnish plaintiff, free of rent for five years, a suitable sight at Bunker for a hub manufacturing plant; also agreed to sell and deliver to the plaintiff on cars at the hub yard during the said term of five years sufficient oak timber to make 600,000 wagon hubs, and to deliver one-fifth, or 120,000, of said hubs during each year of the contract. The delivery was to be made at the rate of 10,000 per month, with a proviso that the number might be exceeded during the months of September, October, November, and December of each year, during which four months a total delivery of 80,000 hubs was authorized. The contract contained the further provision that in case the 80,000 hubs were delivered in said four months the delivery during the months of April, May, June, and July following might be reduced accordingly, and that, if an average of 20,000 hubs had been delivered during said fall months, the delivery during the other months should not exceed 5,000 per month. The plaintiff agreed to erect at his own cost upon the ground so furnished by the defendant, a hub manufacturing plant, with all necessary warehouse buildings, and have the same ready for operation not later than November 1, 1909, and to pay the defendant 10 cents per hub for all timber delivered to him under the contract. The contract also provided that all timber to be delivered was subject to inspection by the plaintiff before loaded on the cars, and that the defendant was to be released of his obligation to furnish the hubs in case it became impossible to make delivery of them owing to defendant's inability to obtain said hub timber along with its regular logging operations.

The evidence on the part of the plaintiff tended to prove that, after the execution of the contract, the plaintiff went to Chicago, and there made a contract for the sale of all of his hubs, and that he purchased in Ohio all the machinery for his plant, and caused the same to be shipped and erected on the land of the defendant, and was ready to receive hub timber on November 1, 1909, and so notified the defendant; that the defendant did not furnish him any hubs until the latter part of January, 1910, and then only about 2,500, and to August 1, 1910, only furnished timber for about 10,000 hubs; that the plaintiff repeatedly made demands on defendant for the hub timber, and kept expert millmen ready to operate the hub mill until the 1st of August, 1910, at which time he let them go. The plaintiff offered further testimony tending to prove that he had inspected hub timber for about 140,000 hubs, and that defendant shipped such timber to its sawmill, and did not deliver the same to plaintiff's hubmill. The defendant admitted it furnished no hub timber until in January, and that to the 1st of August, 1910, it had delivered less than 10,000 hubs; that during said time it was cutting, in its regular logging operations, but little timber that met the requirements for hubs, and that much of it that really did meet the requirements was rejected by the plaintiff's inspector; that, if plaintiff had not abandoned his contract, defendant would have been able in the future to have supplied him with the amount of hub timber called for in the contract. The case was tried before a jury in Shannon county, where it had been taken on change of venue from Dent county, resulting in a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for $1,317.27, which amount was reduced by a set-off claim of the defendant of $67.27, leaving a balance of $1,250, for which a judgment was rendered against the defendant. In due time the defendant perfected its appeal to this court. The defendant has seen fit to limit the issues in this court to three, and we will limit our investigation accordingly.

[1] It is appellant's first contention that the proper measure of damages is the difference between the market value of the hub timber at the place of delivery and the contract price. The recognized leading case is that of Hadley v. Baxendale, 9 Exch. 354, and it has been approved by most of the American courts and by the Supreme Court of this state in Mark v. Cooperage Co., 204 Mo. loc. cit. 265, 103 S. W. 20. The rule as stated in that case is that where two parties have made a contract, which one of them has broken, the damages which the other party ought to receive in respect of such breach should be such as may fairly and reasonably be considered either arising naturally—i. e., according to the usual course of things, from such breach of contract itself, or such as may reasonably be supposed to have been in the contemplation of both parties at the time they made the contract, as the probable result of the breach of it—and that if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated, and thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract, which they would reasonably contemplate, would be the amount of injury which would ordinarily follow from a breach of contract under these special circumstances so known and communicated, but, on the other hand, if these special circumstances were wholly unknown to the party breaking the contract, he at the most could only be supposed to have had in contemplation the amount of injury which would arise generally, and in the great multitude of cases not affected by any special circumstances from such a breach of contract. In Hammond v. Beeson, 112 Mo. 190, 20 S. W. 474, Judge MacFarlane said: "It is impossible to lay down any rule of damages for breach of contract that can be justly applied to all cases of any particular class. Each case must in a great measure be determined upon equitable principles upon the particular facts by which it is attended, the controlling principle being that the one suffering from the breach should be fully compensated for all losses sustained. Other rules are merely aids to that end."

The evidence discloses that there was no other hub timber that plaintiff could have purchased to keep his mill running, and therefore he was at the mercy of the defendant for such timber. He had erected on the land of the defendant a hubmill for the purpose of manufacturing into hubs, timber then growing on defendant's land, to be sold on the market. It must have been the contemplation of both parties that plaintiff intended to manufacture and sell the hubs at a profit, and thereby reimburse him for his expenditures and his equipment and the cost of manufacturing the hubs. That it was a special contract with the defendant is evidenced by the fact that the hubmill was to be erected on defendant's premises, and the defendant was to furnish water necessary for the operation of the same. Under these circumstances, it cannot be said that plaintiff's damages are the difference between what he paid for the hub timber and the market value of such hub timber. In Hammond v. Beeson, supra, the plaintiff sued for special damages for breach of a contract to grade five miles of railroad for the defendant. In discussing the plaintiff's damages the court said: "It is a clear proposition, and one well settled by the authorities, that, where there is an express contract, the contract itself should furnish the basis for estimating the damages, if they can be ascertained thereunder with sufficient certainty. The contract price, in a contract of this character, would not be the reasonable measure of the damage, but the benefits plaintiff could have obtained, had he been permitted to perform the work at the contract price. The profits plaintiff expected to realize out of the contract were the real consideration that induced him to make it. These became a part and parcel of the contract itself, and to these he ought to be entitled. If the contract was terminated or performance prevented by the defendants, whether through inability or design, the purposes of plaintiff were defeated, and the loss of profits sustained. The profit was the full measure of his possible gain, if he had been permitted to complete this contract, without unreasonable delay or interference. If he performed no part of it and incurred no expense, all the damages he could justly demand would be the loss of the profits he could have realized. * * * This rule is equitable and just, and furnishes full and adequate compensation for all injury sustained." The evidence shows that plaintiff was compelled to rely on defendant for his hub timber, and could not have secured the same at any other place. If defendant's theory is correct, then notwithstanding the parties entered into the contract by which the plaintiff was to, and did, expend about $6,000 equipping his hubmill on the land of the defendant, in order to manufacture the timber furnished by defendant, and although the defendant had not furnished a single piece of timber for a hub, yet, if the value of the hub timber was no greater than plaintiff had agreed to pay defendant for it, the plaintiff could not be allowed any damages. In Jordan v. Patterson, 67 Conn. 473, 35 Atl. 521, the Supreme Court of Connecticut, in a similar suit, said: "In the present case the plaintiffs claimed that at the time of delivery there was no market in which they could procure such goods as the defendants were to deliver to them. This was a fact which might be proved by the testimony of any person who had knowledge on the subject. * * * The defendants had knowledge that the plaintiffs contracted for these garments in order to resell them to others. They were chargeable with knowledge that the plaintiffs would make such profits as the market price of such goods would give them. * * * In respect to this item of damage the rule above stated furnished the proper test. In restoring an injured party to the same position he would have been in if the contract had not been broken, it is necessary to take into the account losses suffered, as much as profits prevented. And whenever the loss suffered, or the gain prevented results directly from a circumstance which may reasonably be considered to have been in the contemplation of the parties when entering into the contract, the plaintiff should be allowed to prove such loss."

The rule allowing plaintiff to recover damages for loss of profits, where the defendant has agreed to sell him an article, which, in turn, the plaintiff is to manufacture into another article, and to make his profit on resale of the manufactured article is generally recognized by the authorities, when the evidence shows that the parties contemplated the manufacture and resale of the article at the time the contract was made. Jordan v. Patterson, supra; Ford Hardwood Lumber Co. v. Clement, 97 Ark. 522, 135 S. W. 343; Liggett Spring & Axle Co. v. Michigan Buggy Co., 106 Mich. 445, 64 N. W. 466; Trego v. Arave, 20 Idaho, 38, 116 Pac. 119, 35 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1021; Wakeman v. Wheeler & W. Mfg. Co., 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264, 54 Am. Rep. 676; Cloe v. Rogers, 31 Okl. 255, 121 Pac. 201, 38 L. R. A.

(N. S.) 366. The case of Wilson & Son v. Russler et al., 91 Mo. App. 275, is not in conflict with the rule we have just announced. In that case there was a sale of a sawmill and 200,000 feet of saw logs then cut and lying on the banks of the Osage river, within a short distance of the sawmill. The seller did not deliver the logs, and in an action on the contract the court told the jury that, in estimating the damages by reason of the failure to deliver the logs, the jury should take into consideration the net profit which defendants could have made had said logs been delivered and sawed into lumber. The Kansas City Court of Appeals reversed the case, and held that such damages were not recoverable under the issues. After citing the authorities, the court said: "It is thus seen that the foregoing authorities make it plain that the defendants' instructions now in question go too far. They authorized the jury to find for defendants the kind of damages which the law forbids when the general allegation of the answer in respect to the counterclaim is like that in this case. When anything beyond the difference between the agreed and the market price of the thing sold is sought to be recovered, some special circumstance under which the contract was made must be alleged and shown. 'Now, if the special circumstances under which the contract was actually made were communicated and were thus known to both parties, the damages resulting from the breach of such a contract which they would reasonably contemplate would be the amount of the injury which would ordinarily follow from such breach of the contract under the circumstances so shown and communicated.'" Instead of being in conflict with our position, this case sustains it. There were no special circumstances shown in that case, but the question was submitted solely on a contract of sale. Not so here, however, as the petition in this case alleges the special circumstances under which the contract was entered into, and clearly showing that both parties contemplated that the whole purpose and object of plaintiff in entering into the contract was to secure the hub timber and manufacture the same into hubs and to sell the same at a profit.

[2] It is next claimed that the plaintiff's testimony was insufficient to authorize the recovery of loss of profits. The plaintiff testified that it cost him 30 cents to make a set of hubs, and the timber cost him 40 cents, and that he sold the hubs for $1.10 to $1.75 a set; that he had a contract for the sale of the hubs at Chicago, by which he received 90 cents for 8-inch hubs, $1.10 for 9-inch hubs, $1.55 for 9½-inch, and $1.75 for 10½-inch, per set of four hubs; that these prices were f. o. b. Bunker. It was not alleged in the petition, or shown by the evidence, that the defendant was notified before the contract was entered into or any time thereafter that plaintiff had a special contract for the sale of his hubs, and therefore it may well be said that plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the difference between what it cost to manufacture his hubs, and the contract price for which he had sold them. The court, however, did not submit that issue to the jury, and therefore the question needs no further consideration. The testimony was admissible, however, for the purpose of showing the contract price, as the rule seems to be that the contract price is competent evidence tending to prove the value. Abbit v. St. Louis Transit Co., 104 Mo. App. 534, 79 S. W. 496; State ex rel. v. Steele & Co., 108 Mo. App. 363, 83 S. W. 1023; Jordan v. Patterson, supra. In Jordan v. Patterson, supra, the plaintiff offered testimony of the prices he was to obtain on a resale, and the court said: "If proof of the terms of these last-mentioned subsales was offered for the purpose of showing what the market price of such goods was at the time they were to be delivered, then the evidence should have been received. The market value of any goods may be shown by actual sales in the way of ordinary business." The plaintiff's testimony stood absolutely uncontradicted, and therefore we must hold that it was some evidence of the market value of the manufactured product, and authorized the court to submit that issue to the jury. The court did not submit to the jury any loss that the plaintiff sustained by reason of his mill standing idle; thus causing expense for hired help, etc. And to this extent the instruction was really more favorable to the defendant than it was entitled to be. Morrow v. Railroad, 140 Mo. App. 200, 123 S. W. 1034.

[3] The last point is that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This contention cannot be sustained. Separate and apart from that portion of the petition regarding the profits, the petition states a cause of action for damages directly suffered and sustained by the plaintiff, growing out of the fact that under his contract with the defendant he expended over $5,000 in building his mill on the land of the defendant for the purpose of carrying out his contract, and that the defendant failed and refused to carry out his part of the agreement. These allegations undoubtedly authorized the recovery of nominal damages, and therefore the petition states a cause of action.

During the trial, the defendant made several objections to the introduction of testimony, which were overruled. We are not holding that these objections were without merit, but appellant has not asked us to reverse the judgment on account of any errors in the introduction of testimony.

The judgment will be affirmed. All concur.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Charlton County; S. T. Jones, Special Judge.

Action by Willis Stone against V. W. Johnston. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bresnehen & West, of Brookfield, for appellant. J. A. Collet, of Salisbury, and John D. Taylor, of Keytesville, for respondent.

JOHNSON, J. This is an action to recover damages resulting from the alleged breach by defendant of a contract of employment. Defendant, a banker in Champaign, Ill., owned a farm of 900 acres in Charlton county, Mo., most of which lay in the Charlton river valley. Under date of February 8, 1910, he entered into a contract in writing with plaintiff, who was living in Illinois, by the terms of which he employed plaintiff for a term ending March 1, 1911, to move with his family to the farm, and to do work upon it as defendant, from time to time, should direct. Some of the land had been cultivated, much of the bottom land had not been broken for cultivation, and a drainage system of some magnitude was being constructed for the benefit of this and adjoining farms in the valley. The contract contemplated that the services of plaintiff would be employed in planting and cultivating crops, in plowing unbroken land, and in working on the drainage ditch, and fixed the compensation plaintiff was to receive for these different kinds of work. For example, he was to be paid $1.75 per acre for plowing unbroken land, $1.25 per acre for plowing land that had been cultivated, 20 cents per acre for planting crops, 50 cents per acre for cultivating crops, and 35 cents per hour for each man and team "working on the levee." It was provided that plaintiff should move his family to the farm and should take with him a full set of farming implements and "at least nine head of good horses and mules." He was to have the use free of charge of the house, barn, outbuildings, and "a truck patch," and was "to pay the usual price for the pasture land used by him, and also pay the usual rental for all land farmed by him on the shares." Further the contract provided that defendant would "instruct second party (plaintiff) as to how he desires said land farmed and crop tended," and that, "when not practicable to work on the crops, second party is to be furnished levee work, ditching, bridge building, and other farm work which is to be paid for at the usual and customary rate; it being understood that first party (defendant) is to advise second party from time to time as to the work he desires done and method of doing same."

In plaintiff's family were two sons almost grown who had been working for their father as farm hands, and we think the contract as a whole expressed the mutual intention that plaintiff should take with him sufficient equipment for the proper employment of himself and his sons, and that defendant should keep this force reasonably employed during the term of the contract at the rates of compensation therein stated. Plaintiff and his family moved to the farm, and he brought with him 10 head of horses and mules and the equipment mentioned in the contract. He was ready to begin work March 15, 1910, but was compelled to remain idle a week because of defendant's failure to give working orders. Defendant visited the farm March 22d and gave directions concerning the work to be done, and then returned to Champaign. Some of the work laid out by defendant could not be done on account of unfavorable weather, and the remainder was not sufficient to keep the force busy. The evidence of plaintiff tends to show that the disagreement which ensued between the parties very shortly after their relation began was caused by the neglect of defendant to give adequate working orders, while the evidence of defendant is to the effect that such orders were given and plaintiff failed to obey them. This disagreement which related to the question of the amount due plaintiff under the contract became so acute that plaintiff went to Champaign early in May to effect a settlement, if possible. A conference there between the parties resulted in an oral agreement to submit the matters in dispute to arbitration, and three arbitrators were chosen. One of them was an associate of defendant in the banking business in Champaign, and another (F. H. Jones) owned a farm adjoining that of defendant in Chariton county and was interested in the drainage project by which the farms in that neighborhood were to be benefited. The evidence of plaintiff shows he had knowledge of the business connection between the first-mentioned arbitrator and defendant, but had no knowledge that Mr. Jones was directly interested in the subject-matter of the arbitration. On May 11, 1910, the arbitrators made the following award in writing: "We, the undersigned, have agreed, as arbitrators of the contract of February 8, 1910, between V. W. Johnston and Willis Stone, it shall be null and void and of no effect. It is further agreed that Willis Stone shall be allowed eighteen dollars ($18.00) for work done May 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, 1910, forty dollars ($40.00) for work done on Elm creek cut-off, and the sum of sixty-seven and 65/100 dollars ($67.65), a total of one hundred twenty-five and 65/100 dollars ($125.65), being the amount due up to date. Further said Stone shall be allowed $1.25 per acre for all plowing up to this date, in addition to the above, less $50, which has been paid said Stone. It is further agreed that said Stone shall be paid the sum of two hundred seventy-five dollars ($275.00) per month for the service of himself, two boys, ten horses, and his implements for the first five months from this date. Further said Stone shall receive fifty-nine dollars ($59) per month for the remaining time to the first of March, 1911, for himself, ten horses and implements. The pasture 15 or 20 acres near barn, there shall be no charge for." This award was submitted to both parties, was accepted by them, and they gave formal expression to their acceptance by signing the award. Plaintiff returned to the farm and worked one month under the new agreement. The arbitration did not result in restoring harmony between the parties. During that month the correspondence conducted by them became somewhat acrimonious. In a letter written by plaintiff May 25, 1910, he said, "The way you wrote your last letter does not sound good to any one. I am not worried about your holding my money as I am here with everything that I agreed to bring and can collect for my time. It is hard labor, and I think a man ought to pay for it. Mr. Johnston, I think you had better investigate that arbitration contract and see if it will hold good with two parties interested as Jones and Goodman were to you."

Before the end of the first month plaintiff employed a lawyer who telegraphed defendant that a settlement must be made at the end of the month. Defendant came to Chariton county in response to the telegram and refused plaintiff's demand for $275, a full month's pay under the new contract. The parties then entered into a written contract for a second arbitration in which they agreed that the new contract of May 11, 1910, should be taken as a basis, and that the award of the arbitrators, in addition to assessing the amount due plaintiff for his services from May 11th to June 11th, should allow him the damages, if any, that would be sustained by him in consequence of an immediate termination of the contract of employment. The closing sentence of the agreement provided that "the arbitrators are to decide all controversies up to March

1, 1911." Pursuant to this agreement an award was made June 13, 1910, which allowed plaintiff $75 for services during the month in question, and $200 damages on account of the termination of the contract of employment. Both parties accepted the award, and defendant gave a check to plaintiff in a sum including the amount of the award plus $53.80 due on the old settlement and less $25 paid to plaintiff's attorney in settlement of his fee. Afterward defendant stopped payment on the check before plaintiff could collect it, but later sent the money out to a banker in Charlton county with instructions to pay it to plaintiff on his removal from the farm. Plaintiff refused to accept the money on these terms, and remained on the farm until March, 1911. He did no more work for defendant under the old contracts, and in June, 1911, brought this suit to enforce a claim for damages based on the alleged breach by defendant of the original contract of February 8, 1910.

[1] The contention of plaintiff is that the two agreements for arbitration and the respective awards made under them are void for the reason that one of the arbitrators selected under the first agreement (F. H. Jones) was interested in the subject-matter of the controversy. In the first award plaintiff was allowed $40 "for work done on Elm creek cut-off." This cut-off was a part of the drainage system, and plaintiff introduced evidence tending to show that Mr. Jones, who, as stated, owned a farm adjoining the farm of defendant, was one of the landowners at whose expense this work was being done, and therefore was bound to contribute to the payment of the work performed by plaintiff. Mr. Jones denies this statement and says he had nothing to do with the cut-off in question. We think the evidence of plaintiff relating to this subject, though weak, is strong enough to raise an issue of fact, and therefore, in our consideration of the demurrer to the evidence, we shall assume that Mr. Jones had a pecuniary interest in one of the items submitted to him as an arbitrator. Such interest disqualified him from serving as an arbitrator and tainted the award with fraud and corruption. Being an interested party to the controversy, he had no right to act as judge of his own cause, and, as plaintiff was ignorant of the fraud at the time of its perpetration, he was not bound by his acceptance of the award. Shawhan v. Baker, 150 S. W. 1096, decided at this term, and cases cited. "An award may undoubtedly be impeached and avoided by proof of fraud, provided it be fraud practiced upon or by the referees." Strong v. Strong, 9 Cush. (Mass.) 560. And had plaintiff not ratified the award after his discovery of the fraud, there can be no question that he would have been entitled to treat the whole arbitration proceeding as void and to stand on the original contract.

[2] But we find he did ratify and adopt the award after he discovered the fraud, and with full knowledge of its infirmity used it as a basis for the contract of June 13th providing for a second arbitration. In his letter of May 25th he warned defendant that the first award was subject to attack "with two parties interested as Jones and Goodman were to you." His counsel offer as an explanation of that statement that plaintiff knew Goodman was associated with defendant in the banking business and supposed that Jones sustained a similar relation towards defendant. The evidence is uncontradicted that Jones and defendant had no such business association, and, if plaintiff meant what his counsel say he meant, he was making a charge against Jones that had no substantial foundation and therefore was recklessly made. We find the testimony of plaintiff gives no color to this proffered explanation, but on the contrary discloses that the thought in his mind when he included Jones in the charge of fraud was that Jones had a pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of the arbitration. We quote from his testimony: "Q. At that time you say you had no information whatever that Jones had any interest in the work that was done on the Elm creek cut-off? A. No, I didn't know that he had any interest in it at all, whatever. Q. And you had no information of that sort on the 13th day of June, 1910, when the second arbitration was had? A. No, sir. Q. Absolutely none? A. Only by hearsay. Q. By hearsay, did you have some information to that effect at that time? A. Not anybody that knowed positively. Q. You didn't have any information from Mr. Jones to that effect? A. No, not till later. Q. You didn't have any information from Mr. Johnston to that effect? A. No, sir. Q. And, as a matter of fact, you have had no such information from Mr. Jones or Mr. Johnston up to this time? A. No, sir; not from either of them."

We do not give much weight to this lay classification as "hearsay" of the sources of plaintiff's information, especially in view of the fact that he used the information as the foundation of a direct and specific charge of fraud. His own testimony, viewed in the light of all the circumstances of the case, convinces us and leaves no room for a reasonable difference of opinion that he knew as much about the alleged interest of Jones in the subject of the arbitration when he entered into the contract of June 13th as he did when later he repudiated that contract. Notwithstanding the first award may have been tainted with fraud of which he was the victim, plaintiff, after the discovery of such fraud, could ratify the award and treat the new contract resulting from it as valid, and therefore as superseding the original contract. It was optional with him to adopt or repudiate the results of his adversary's duplicitly, but, after making his choice with open eyes and acting on it, he will not be suffered to change positions. In the contract of June 13th plaintiff voluntarily stood on the ground that the original contract had been superseded by the new contract of May 10th and agreed that the latter contract should be terminated on terms allowing him to recover the damages such premature ending would cause him. He is bound by that contract and the award made under it and cannot maintain an action founded on the original contract.

The learned trial judge permitted plaintiff to recover on the theory that the question of whether he had knowledge of the fraud in the first arbitration at the time he entered into the contract for the second involved issues of fact for the jury to determine. This, as we have shown, was an erroneous view of the evidence.

The judgment is reversed. All concur.

WRIGHT et al. v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. MALICIOUS MISCHIEF (§ 9*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence held to support a conviction for malicious mischief, committed by the killing of hogs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Mischief, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 9.*]

2. MALICIOUS MISCHIEF (§ 1*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Evidence that a sister concealed the death of hogs killed by her brother is insufficient to convict her of malicious mischief, committed by the killing of the hogs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Malicious Mischief, Cent. Dig. §§ 1-5; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Carroll County; J. S. Maples, Judge.

A. B. Wright and Ruth Wright were convicted of malicious mischief, and they appeal. Affirmed as to A. B. Wright, and reversed as to Ruth Wright.

Charles D. James, of Eureka Springs, for appellants. Hal L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Rector, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

KIRBY, J. Appellants were jointly charged in the justice's court with the offense of malicious mischief, alleged to have been committed by killing a sow and pigs of the value of $20, the property of C. C. Matthews. From a conviction there, they appealed to the circuit court, where they were again convicted and fined $20 each, and the value of the animal slain was fixed by the jury at $20, and the court rendered judgment against them for the fine and cost and triple damages in the sum of $60. From this judgment they appealed.

[1] The testimony is altogether circumstantial. The owner of the hogs stated that he had seen the sow, heavy with pig, a few days before he finally missed her, near the Wright field, where he found a hog had gone through their fence, and the tracks looked like those of his sow, which had a defective foot and made a peculiar track. On Sunday he discovered these tracks in the Wright field, and, while he was standing at the fence looking at them, saw A. B. Wright about 200 yards away, carrying a double-barrel shotgun in his hand, and coming towards him. Not having spoken to Wright for some time, he did not wait until he came up, but left. After searching for two or three days and not finding the sow, and finding a young pig about four or five days old, almost starved, near where the hog tracks went into Wright's field, he swore out a search warrant and went to Wright's place with an officer, and in the search through the field, to which appellants objected, they discovered a hog's bed about 125 yards from where witness had seen the tracks of his sow going into the field, and near it some dried blood and gun wads. From the bed a trail led off, showing the prints of something having been dragged on the ground, which was followed about 40 yards down into a little draw, and ended at a place where some rocks and stones were piled, and the place had been recently dug up. Upon removing the earth and stones, the body of the sow was found, and identified as the property of the complaining witness. She weighed about 200 pounds, and witnesses were not able to ascertain how she had been killed. A little further up the draw five or six dead pigs were found, covered with stones.

There was some incompetent testimony introduced, relating to the conduct of appellants in the treatment of the stock of other individuals at different times before, which was not objected to. We are not able to say that the reasonable inferences arising from the facts developed—the death of the hogs in appellant's field near where he was seen a day or two before with a shotgun, with the concealment of the bodies of the dead hogs, as stated, upon the farm of appellant A. B. Wright—are not sufficient to support the jury's verdict as against him, notwithstanding he denied having killed the hogs and any knowledge of their burial upon his farm. The evidence is not very satisfactory, but we are not able to say it is insufficient; and the judgment is affirmed as to him.

[2] There is no testimony whatever to connect appellant Ruth Wright with the commission of the offense, further than that some of the witnesses stated they did not believe that A. B. Wright alone could have dragged the dead animal from the place it appeared to have been killed to the place where it was found buried, and that she objected to the search of the farm by some of the people accompanying the officer with the warrant, explaining her objections by saying they were their enemies. This is not sufficient to raise more than a suspicion, if it does that, so far as she is concerned, and her action, not crediting her explanation, which is most reasonable, could be accounted for in a desire to shield her brother, if she knew of his having committed an offense; and even in felony cases a person standing in the relation of sister to the accused cannot be an accessory after the fact. The concealment of the death of the hogs did not constitute the offense of malicious mischief, and is not more than a circumstance tending to show they had been wrongfully killed in violation of the statute. As to her the judgment is reversed, and the cause dismissed.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

MECHANICS' LIENS (§ 281*)—ENFORCEMENT—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—INDEBTEDNESS OF DEFENDANT.

In a suit by subcontractors against an owner to enforce mechanics' liens, with a cross-complaint by the contractor to recover the balance of the contract price after satisfying such liens, defended on the ground that on account of the contractor's negligence one of the walls of the building fell, subjecting the owner to damages in excess of the unpaid remainder of the contract price, held, that the evidence supported a finding that such damages resulted from defects in the architect's plans, and not from negligence of the contractor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. §§ 565-572; Dec. Dig. § 281.*]

Appeal from Garland Chancery Court; Alphonso Curl, Special Chancellor.

Suit by one Donnelly and others against Henry Fellheimer and Henry Higgins to enforce mechanics' liens, with cross-complaint by Higgins against Fellheimer. Decree for plaintiffs against Fellheimer, and for Higgins on his cross-complaint, and Fellheimer appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Wood, of Hot Springs, for appellant. W. H. Martin, of Hot Springs, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. Appellant, Henry Fellheimer, entered into a written contract with Henry Higgins, one of the appellees, whereby the latter agreed to furnish material and construct for appellant a fourth story to the latter's brick building in the city of Hot Springs, for an agreed price. The contract provided that the work should be done according to the plans and under the direction of an architect named in the contract. After the completion of the building, certain of the subcontractors, who furnished material and performed labor in the erection of the improvement, instituted this action in the chancery court of Garland county to enforce their respective liens for the unpaid portion of the price of material and labor, alleging that more than enough of the contract price to cover the amount of their liens remained unpaid. Appellant and Higgins were both made defendants, and Higgins filed a cross-complaint against appellant to recover the balance of contract price alleged to be due, after satisfying the asserted liens of the subcontractors who sued. Appellant defended on the ground that the improvement had not been made in accordance with the specifications of the contract and the directions of the architect, and that on account of such negligent construction, and also the negligence of servants of Higgins, one of the walls fell and inflicted injuries on certain individuals, thereby subjecting appellant to liability for damages largely in excess of the unpaid remainder of the contract price, which sum, it is alleged, appellant had to pay, after judgment had been rendered against him therefor in favor of the injured persons. On final hearing of the cause, the court found that the falling of the wall was not caused by negligence on the part of Higgins or his servants, but fell on account of the defective plans and specifications furnished by the architect, and that Higgins was not responsible for the damages which resulted. A decree was rendered against appellant in favor of the subcontractors who sued, and in favor of Higgins for the unpaid balance of the contract price, after satisfying the liens.

The contract between appellant and Higgins provided that the latter should be liable to the former for any damages sustained by reason of negligence in constructing the walls, and appellant contends that under this contract Higgins should be held liable for the damages paid to the injured parties, and also that the damages so paid should be treated as a reduction of the contract price, so as to exclude any liability on appellant's part for the amounts due the subcontractors. If the damages arose by reason of negligence of Higgins or his servants, it is clear that he would be liable therefor to appellant; but the question whether, as against the subcontractors, the amount of the damages should, under the contract, be applied in reduction of the contract price is another question, and one not entirely free from doubt. In Cost v. Newport Builders' Supply & Hardware Co., 85 Ark. 407, 108 S. W. 509, 14 Ann. Cas. 142, we held that, in the absence of actual notice, a subcontractor is not chargeable with notice of special stipulation against allowance of liens in the contract between the owner and principal contractor. Whether that principle will apply in this case, so as to deny the right of the owner to have the contract price reduced by damages arising from negligent act, we need not decide; for the chancellor found, from conflicting testimony, that the damages arose from defects in the plans prepared by the architect, and not from negligence of Higgins in constructing the walls, or in carrying on the work in and about the building. Our conclusion is that the findings of the chancellor are not against the preponderance of the evidence, and for that reason the findings should not be disturbed.

Appellant introduced three witnesses, who were laborers employed by Higgins, the contractor, and who testified that when the wall fell they were engaged in removing some scaffolding, and in doing so struck the wall with the end of a piece of timber, and it immediately fell. They were handling a plank 6 or 8 inches wide, 2 inches thick, and 16 feet long; two of the men having hold of it at the time, one at each end. One of them stumbled, causing the other end to go back toward the wall, and they testified that the end of the plank brushed or rubbed against the wall. None of them testified that it struck the wall a solid, direct blow. One of them testified that it was a light blow, not more than sufficient to brush off the protruding mortar, and not of sufficient force to knock down the wall. Higgins and the man who had charge of the brick work under him both testified that the plan of constructing the wall on top of the old one was faulty; that they followed the plan of the architect precisely, but called the latter's attention to the fact that the plan was not satisfactory. They testified that the wall was built according to the plans and specifications of the architect, and that the blow from the piece of timber was insufficient to cause the wall to fall. About 30 feet of the wall fell out. It seems improbable that the light blow described by the witnesses would be sufficient to knock down a properly constructed wall, and under the circumstances described in the testimony we cannot say that the chancellor erred in holding that the falling of the wall did not result from the blow. The testimony is sufficient to warrant the conclusion that the wall was not properly planned, but that it was constructed in accordance with the plan of the architect.

Appellant also makes the contention that the wall fell on account of not being properly braced, but there was no testimony to sustain that charge of negligence.

Decree affirmed.

In an action against a railroad company for negligently firing plaintiff's property, evidence held sufficient to support the judgment.

Under Act April 2, 1907 (Laws 1907, p. 336), making railroads liable for damages caused by fire set out by their locomotives, contributory negligence by the owner, short of an act so grossly negligent as to amount to fraud, is no defense.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Polk County; Daniel Hon, Special Judge.

Action by R. P. Harris against the Kansas City Southern Railway Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Read & McDonough, of Ft. Smith, for appellant. W. M. Pipkin, of Mena, and Hill, Brizzolara & Fitzhugh, of Ft. Smith, for appellee.

WOOD, J. This suit was brought by appellee against appellant to recover damages for the alleged destruction of certain lumber and other property which appellee alleged in his complaint was destroyed by fire from one of appellant's engines while the same was being operated on appellant's railroad in Polk county, Ark., on April 19, 1910. The answer denied all the material allegations of the complaint. There was no specific plea of contributory negligence. Verdict and judgment were in favor of the appellee in the sum of $1,102.80, from which this appeal has been duly prosecuted.

[1] The testimony, stated most strongly in favor of the appellee, is substantially as follows: Appellant's freight train passed Eagleton going north about 6 o'clock in the afternoon. At that point there was an upgrade to the track and it was a heavy train. Sparks and fire were emitted from the smokestack and were falling in an old tramway between 50 and 100 feet from the railroad track. A short time after the train passed fire was discovered in the tramway. There had been no other fire anywhere in the vicinity for several days. The planing mill had not been running. A witness attempted to extinguish the fire in the old tramway, but was unsuccessful. The fire was burning in trash and old rotten wood and other debris. About a half hour after the first attempt to put out the fire, the witness returned to the spot and found fire at the identical place where he first attempted to extinguish it, and by that time it had covered an area of 10 or 12 feet. In his second attempt to extinguish the fire he scattered the same, poured water on it, and thought that he had put it out. Witness testified that when fire gets started in trash and rotten wood it is difficult not only to put it out, but almost impossible to tell when it has been extinguished. In such debris as that described, fire will smoulder for hours at a time, and then kindle up and spread. At a later hour in the night, left uncertain in the testimony, probably between 12 and 2 o'clock, the alarm of fire was again given, and witnesses who had seen the fire earlier in the evening, and others, went to the scene. The old tramway was burning at this later time, and a large part of the same had been consumed. At that time large coals and sparks were being carried from the old tramway across the road into the lumber piles and a new tramway. The wind was blowing from the direction of the old tramway towards the lumber pile. The piles of lumber and other property that were consumed by these fires constituted the loss for which appellee sued and has obtained judgment.

The appellant contends that the above facts are not sufficient to sustain the verdict, and he cites many cases where, under the circumstances peculiar to those cases, it was held that the evidence was insufficient; but each case must necessarily depend upon its own facts, and we are of the opinion that the above evidence makes it a question for the jury as to whether the fire originated from appellant's engine or from some other cause. In St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Dawson, 77 Ark. 438, 92 S. W. 27, we said: "It is not required that the evidence should exclude all possibility of another origin, or that it be undisputed. It is sufficient if all the facts and circumstances in evidence fairly warrant the conclusion that the fire did not originate from some other cause." Applying this doctrine, we are of the opinion that the facts disclosed by the testimony in the record, giving it the strongest probative effect in favor of the appellee, would warrant the jury in finding that the fire could not have originated from any other cause than that alleged in the complaint.

The testimony makes it reasonably certain that the fires discovered at about 6:30 o'clock in the old tramway, and again at 7 o'clock, were caused by appellant's engine. The witness attempted to put out the first fire, thought he had done so, but after the fire broke out again he saw that he had failed in the first attempt. On the second attempt to put the fire out he again thought he had done so, and testified as a fact that he had done so. But the discovery of the fire later in the night, when considered in connection with the evidence tending to show the direction from which the wind was blowing and the manner in which the fire is shown to have consumed the trash and other combustible material between the old tramway and the new tramway and lumber pile, was sufficient to warrant the jury in finding that the witness was mistaken in saying that he had put out the fire, and sufficient to justify their conclusion that the last fire originated from and was but a continuation of the first.

▲ witness stated that he saw "fire and smoke and sparks going from the old tramway to the new tramway." Another witness said: "The fire had started on the edge of the tram where I had seen Mr. Williams first working at it on the north side." "The fire was spreading across towards the new tramway. It was across and burning in the edge of the tram and stacks of lumber. The ground was burnt from where I first saw the fire where Williams was putting it out across the road into the tram." Another witness said, speaking concerning the fire that he saw about 2 o'clock that night burning in the lumber: "Well, there was quite a bit of fire there, in the old tramway. It had burned out the trailway of the old tram."

We are of the opinion that these facts were sufficient to sustain the verdict. There is really no evidence to justify any other conclusion than that the fire was caused in the manner alleged in the complaint; but, even if it could be said that there might have been another origin of the fire, still it would be a question for the jury, because the above facts certainly tended to show that the last fire was caused from the same source as the first.

[2] The appellant contends that the court erred in refusing to instruct the jury that contributory negligence was a defense to this action. This court, in a well-considered opinion recently rendered, construing the act of April 2, 1907, held that under that act, making railroads liable for damages caused by fires set out by their locomotives, contributory negligence of the owner short of an act so grossly negligent as to amount to fraud is no defense. Evins v. St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co., 147 S. W. 452, in addition to authorities there cited; 2 Thompson's Commentaries on Neg. §§ 2337 et seq., 2350. Under this statute, if the owner of property, or those duly authorized to represent him, should stand by and see a fire consume his property which it was within their power with reasonable efforts to prevent, of course, this would be an act of gross negligence, and would be tantamount to fraud that would prevent recovery under the statute. Denver & R. Co. v. Morton, 3 Colo. App. 155, 32 Pac. 345; Union, etc., R. Co. v. Williams, 3 Colo. App. 528, 34 Pac. 731. See, also, Peter v. Chicago, etc., Ry. Co., 121 Mich. 324, 80 N. W. 295, 46 L. R. A. 224, 226, 228, 80 Am. St. Rep. 500, cited in 3 Elliott on R. R. § 1238, note 127. But we are of the opinion that the jury were warranted in finding that no such negligence or fraud was committed by the appellee or his servants.

Other objections were urged to rulings of the court, for a reversal of the judgment; but we do not find that there was error in any of the court's rulings.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

STUBBLEFIELD v. STUBBLEFIELD.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 161*)—FINAL SETTLEMENT—EXCEPTIONS—TRIAL BY JURY.

The circuit court, on appeal from a decree of the probate court on exceptions to the final settlement of a guardian, should not submit to a jury the decision of the exceptions, but should state the account without a jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 523-526; Dec. Dig. § 161.*]

2. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 163*) — FINAL SETTLEMENT—INTERMEDIATE SETTLEMENTS—CONCLUSIVENESS.

The court, on a final settlement of a guardian's account, must take as a basis for the settlement an intermediate settlement approved by the probate court, unless an affirmative showing is made that at the time of the approval there was property in the guardian's hands not included in the settlement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 474, 540-544; Dec. Dig. § 163.*]

3. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 159*)—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—INTEREST.

Where the final settlement of a guardian did not show how much of the balance was money, or how much was represented by notes, and all the notes offered in evidence bore 10 per cent. interest per annum, interest must be charged at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum; and after charging interest at such rate the court must determine what part of the credits asked should be allowed and render judgment for the balance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. §§ 516-520; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

4. GUARDIAN AND WARD (§ 148*)—SETTLEMENT OF ACCOUNTS—CREDITS.

Where, in proceedings for a final settlement of a guardianship, the parties treated notes as worth their face value in money, the court, on the notes being surrendered by the administratrix of the deceased guardian, must give credit for the balance due on the face of the notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Guardian and Ward, Cent. Dig. § 497; Dec. Dig. § 148.*]

Appeal from Circuit Court, Randolph County; J. W. Meeks, Judge.

Proceedings by Sarah E. Stubblefield, administratrix of E. H. Stubblefield, deceased, for the final settlement of the guardianship of deceased, in which J. D. Stubblefield, appointed guardian, filed exceptions. From a judgment granting insufficient relief, petitioner appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Witt & Schoonover, of Pocahontas, for appellant. T. W. Campbell, of Pocahontas, for appellee.

SMITH, J. This action originated in the Randolph county probate court and involved the correctness of a final settlement made by the administratrix of a deceased guardian. E. H. Stubblefield, in his lifetime, was guardian of certain minors, who are referred to throughout the record of this case as the "Bryan heirs." The last settlement made by him was filed August 15, 1906, and showed a balance due his wards of $482.71. This settlement was duly approved by the probate court, although it does not appear of what this balance consisted, but in all probability it consisted to a large extent, if not entirely, of notes taken by him for various loans of money belonging to his wards. The said E. H. Stubblefield died July 17, 1909, without having made any further settlement of his guardianship, although he continued to act in that capacity, collecting old loans and making new ones, and otherwise managing the estate in his charge. Upon his death his wife filed what purported to be a final settlement of his guardianship, showing various debits and credits and a balance due of $213.86.

After the death of E. H. Stubblefield, letters of guardianship on the estate of said minors were granted to one J. D. Stubblefield, and he filed exceptions to the settlement of the administratrix, alleging that at the death of E. H. Stubblefield he had in his hands certain promissory notes belonging to his wards with which he was not charged in his settlement, and that after all proper credits had been given there still remained a balance due of $642.69. He also excepted to the allowance of the credits asked by the administratrix, which included certain sums of money alleged to have been paid the minors and himself, as their guardian, together with certain attorney's fees, taxes, and court costs and compensation in the sum of $50. It was contended in the exceptions that the compensation asked was excessive, and it was prayed that only such of the other credits be allowed as were covered by vouchers that might be produced.

[1] The case reached the circuit court on appeal, where the present guardian demanded a trial of his exceptions before a jury, and this demand was granted, over the objections and exceptions of the administratrix, and much of the confusion of the record in this case flows from the acquiescence in this demand. While we do not reverse this case because of the trial court's action in awarding a jury, we do take this occasion to again disapprove the practice of submitting the decision of exceptions to settlements in the probate court to the verdict of a jury. Judge Eakin said, in the case of Crow, Guardian, etc., v. Reed, 38 Ark. 485: "A trial of exceptions by a jury in the probate court is not contemplated by law. The function of the county and probate courts in such matters is rather that of an auditor, clothed with judicial power, or that of a master stating an account. It is not usually such matters as juries can perform. Any circuit court has the power, under the Code Practice, to order any special issue or issues to be tried by a jury which before the Code might have been so tried. But that has no application to the probate courts. It would not do to have exceptions to accounts burdened with the cost of jury trials. The judges must take the responsibility of determining the facts as well as the law."

Upon the trial the jury made no finding as to the credits asked for, except that of compensation, which was allowed in the full amount claimed, and neither the briefs of counsel, nor the transcript itself, shows what became of the other credits; and we may only conjecture whether the jury treated them as unexcepted to, and therefore unnecessary to be considered by them, or whether, on the other hand, they regarded the credits as being without proofs to support them, and were for that reason not considered at all. There was both a general and a special verdict in the case, which apparently are in conflict, or, at least, their effect is not clear to us, and in the preparation of the judgment there may have been information or explanation before the court, and which we do not have; but the court entered up a judgment which appears to us to be an improper one.

At the trial proof was offered as to all the notes shown to have been in the hands of the guardian and his administratrix, notwithstanding two of the notes were shown to have been dated prior to the guardian's settlement; and there was evidence in regard to his possession of three other notes, the dates of the execution and payment of which are not shown. The good faith and fair dealing of this guardian is not questioned by the appellee, but, on the contrary, a compliment, no doubt well deserved, is paid his fidelity and diligence; but appellee says that his settlement did not include all the notes in his hands. This settlement appears to be a common account against all of his wards; but no point is made here of that fact, and these funds will, no doubt, be properly distributed when this guardianship is finally closed.

Proof offered by the appellee tended to show, and did in fact show, that, first and last, there were in the hands of E. H. Stubblefield, and afterwards in the hands of his administratrix, notes for a sum considerably in excess of the amount for which the guardian and his administratrix charged themselves in the settlement; but it is equally as certain that this resulted in part from relending the same money. And as to at least one of these notes the proof on the part of appellee showed that the money loaned belonged in part to the guardian individually and to his wards, and some of the notes which were taken to himself individually were evidently for money belonging to his wards. In other words, this appears to have been an estate administered by an honest man, who had only limited knowledge in keeping accounts.

[2] This case will be reversed and remanded, with directions to the court below to state this account without a jury, and in doing so the court will take as a basis for settlement the sum shown to have been due in the guardian's settlement of August 15, 1906, unless an affirmative showing is made that at that time there was either money or notes, or other property, in his hands not included in that settlement.

[3] Interest must be charged at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum, because the settlement does not show how much of the balance is money, nor how much is represented by notes, and all the notes offered in evidence appear to have borne interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum. After charging interest at this rate, the court will determine what part of the credits asked should be allowed, and the balance will be the sum for which judgment will be rendered.

[4] It appears that under the directions of the court below the administratrix surrendered to the clerk of the county court the notes remaining in her hands, and during the progress of the litigation one of the notes matured, and was paid to the clerk. The parties treated the notes in question as being worth their face value in money, as approved personal indorsements appear to have been exacted in each instance, and the court will allow credit for the full balance due upon the face of the notes surrendered in obedience to its order, and the administratrix will have credit therefor.

MEDLOCK v. OWEN.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. EASEMENTS (§ 5*)—WAYS—ACQUISITION.

A private way over the land of another may be acquired by adverse user, provided the use has been for the statutory period of seven years under a claim of right, openly, continuously, and adversely; but a permissive use will not ripen into title.

Appeal from Clark Chancery Court; Jas. D. Shaver, Chancellor.

Suit by J. A. Medlock against W. P. Owen. From a decree for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Callaway & Hule, of Arkadelphia, for appellant. McMillan & McMillan, of Arkadelphia, for appellee.

HART, J. J. A. Hardage died intestate owning the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 14, township 7 S., range 20 W., in Clark county, Ark. In the latter part of 1807 or 1808 J. A. Medlock entered into a contract with the executors of the estate of J. A. Hardage, deceased, to purchase the S. ½ of the first-mentioned 40-acre tract. He immediately went into possession of the land, and in two years thereafter finished paying for it. On the 29th day of February, 1904, the executors of said estate executed to him a deed to said 20 acres of land. In 1901 or 1902 W. P. Owen purchased the last-mentioned 40-acre tract of land from the estate of J. A. Hardage, deceased. It is adjoining and east of the 20 acres purchased from said estate by Medlock. Medlock owned 40 acres of land immediately south of that purchased by W. P. Owen, and on this tract his residence was situated. At the time Medlock purchased the 20 acres of land from the Hardage estate there was a tenant house on it. A dim roadway wide enough for a wagon to travel ran from his tenant house across the 40 acres of land purchased by Owen from the Hardage estate in a northerly direction to the public road from Arkadelphia to Mt. Ida. There was a well-defined road running northward from Medlock's residence across the land purchased by Owen from the Hardage estate to the Arkadelphia and Mt. Ida road. Owen cleared up his land, and attempted to fence up the private road running from Medlock's tenant house to the public road. He left open the road running from Medlock's residence to the public road, and also left a road on the south side of his land running from Medlock's residence to his tenant house. Medlock instituted this suit in the chancery court to enjoin Owen from fencing up the road from his tenant house to the public road.

The evidence introduced by him tended to show that he and his tenant had continuously used said private road as a passageway since he purchased the 20 acres of land from the Hardage estate and went into possession thereof, and that his use of the road was adverse and under a claim of right so open and notorious as to put Owen on notice thereof. The evidence introduced by Owen tended to show that he had resided near there since the purchase of the land by him in 1901 or 1902, and that the use of the private road in controversy was by his permission. The chancellor found that the use of said road by the plaintiff Medlock was a permissive one, and that the road in controversy was not necessary as a way to or from his land. The case is here on appeal.

[1] The law applicable to cases of this sort is settled by the case of Clay v. Penzel, 79 Ark. 5, 94 S. W. 705. There Mr. Justice Riddick, speaking for the court, said: "Whether these plaintiffs used this strip as a private passway or as a public alley is not very material, so far as this case is concerned; for a private way over the land of another may be acquired by adverse use in the same time that the public may acquire the right to a public highway by adverse user. In either case the use must be under a claim of right, and not permission. The way in either case must be used openly, continuously, and adversely under a claim of right for the full period of the statute of limitations, which in this state is seven years"—citing authorities.

[2] As we have already stated, there was a direct conflict in the evidence, and the chancellor found in favor of the defendant. We do not deem it useful or necessary to make a detailed statement of the facts, or to go into a discussion of them. Under the settled rule of this court, the finding of facts made by a chancellor will not be disturbed on appeal, unless it is clearly against the weight of the evidence. A careful consideration of the testimony leads us to the conclusion that the finding of the chancellor is not against the preponderance of the testimony, and this view is strengthened when we consider that the plaintiff had an almost equally accessible way to the public road by going along the road left open at the south end of the defendant's tract of land to the road leading from plaintiff's residence to the public road.

Therefore the decree will be affirmed.

GARDNER et al. v. McAULEY et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. PARTITION (§ 114*)—ATTORNEY'S FEES—ALLOWANCE.

Kirby's Dig. § 5793, relating to proceedings where lands are sold because not susceptible of division, and providing that the proceeds, after deducting the costs, shall be divided among the parties, furnishes no basis for the allowance of solicitor's fees to the plaintiff in partition where no sale was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 440-449; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

2. PARTITION (§ 114*)—COSTS—SOLICITOR'S FEES.

Plaintiffs are not entitled, upon a decree for partition, to have their solicitor's fees taxed as part of the costs, where the proceeding is an adversary one or the defendants appear by attorneys who act in their behalf and plaintiffs' attorney does not perform all of the services in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partition, Cent. Dig. §§ 440-449; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

Appeal from Chancery Court, Jackson County; G. T. Humphries, Chancellor.

Action by Marcus O. McAuley and others against John F. Gardner and others. From a decree allowing plaintiffs a solicitor fee upon partition, defendants appeal. Decree reversed, and allowance stricken.

Phillips, Hillhouse & Boyce, of Newport, for appellants. Otis W. Scarborough, of Newport, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. The parties to this action were the owners, as tenants in common, of a tract of land in Jackson county, Ark., and appellees, who owned an undivided one-sixth interest in the land, commenced this action in the chancery court against appellants, who were the owners of the other five-sixths, to have a partition according to their respective interests. Robert C. McAuley, one of the appellees, claimed an interest, as tenant by the curtesy, in the undivided one-sixth interest owned by his co-appellees, and he joined as party plaintiff in the suit. Appellants employed attorneys to represent them in the cause, and promptly made their appearance and filed an answer, in which they disputed the rights of Robert C. McAuley as a tenant by the curtesy, and also alleged that the lands could not be partitioned in kind, and asked that the same be sold for partition. On final hearing of the cause the court appointed commissioners to make partition, and on report of the commissioners the court rendered a decree for partition of the lands in accordance with the respective shares of the parties. Subsequently the court made an order allowing appellees the sum of $300 as a fee for their solicitor, and taxed the same as costs in the action. From this part of the decree an appeal has been prosecuted.

[1] Therefore the only question presented in the case is whether or not, in a suit for the partition of lands, it is proper to allow the solicitor of the plaintiff a fee for his services, and tax the same against all the parties to the action.

The only statute in this state bearing even remotely on the question at issue is a section of the Civil Code relating to proceedings where lands are sold because not susceptible of division, and provides that "the proceeds of every such sale, after deducting the costs and expenses of the proceedings, shall be divided among the parties whose rights and interests shall have been sold, in proportion to their respective rights in the premises." Kirby's Digest, § 5793.

The Supreme Court of Michigan held that a somewhat similar statute authorized the allowance of attorney's fees in a partition suit where no sale of the land was made. Greusel v. Smith, 85 Mich. 574, 48 N. W. 616. This does not seem to us, however, to be the proper construction of the statute, and in this view we are supported by decisions of other courts. Swartzel v. Rogers, 3 Kan. 380; Lang v. Constance, 46 S. W. 693, 20 Ky. Law Rep. 502.

This court, in Cowling v. Nelson, 76 Ark. 146, 88 S. W. 913, held that the chancery court was without jurisdiction to order a sale of lands in a partition suit to pay costs and expenses, including attorney's fees.

[2] So, if there be authority to tax attorney's fees against the parties in a partition suit, it must be found outside of the statutes of this state. That question has never before been here for decision. In Cowling v. Nelson, supra, we said: "The utmost that can be said of the attorney's fees are that they were part of the costs; and as to whether the court has, in amicable suits, any right to tax them as costs, is a question that the courts are divided upon, but all agree that in adversary proceedings they cannot be so taxed." Upon consideration of that question, it now appears to us that the weight of authority is against the taxation of attorney's fees, even in amicable partition suits, unless the partition resulted solely from the services of the solicitors for one of the parties and such services were accepted by the other parties. See 21 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law (2d Ed.) pp. 1177, 1178; 30 Cyc. p. 298; Jordan v. Farrow, 130 Ala. 428, 30 South. 338; Hutts v. Martin, 134 Ind. 587, 33 N. E. 676; Coles v. Coles, 13 N. J. Eq. 365; Butler v. Butler, 73 S. C. 402, 53 S. E. 646; Legg v. Legg, 34 Wash. 132, 75 Pac. 130.

In adversary suits there is no ground for taxing the fees of the solicitor of one of the parties against the other parties, and the doctrine of allowance of attorney's fees in amicable suits of this character should, we think, be limited to those cases where the services of the plaintiff's solicitor, not only result in benefit to the whole subject-matter of the litigation, but are accepted and acquiesced in by the other parties. The rule does not apply where all of the parties appear by their respective solicitors and the proceedings are conducted through their joint efforts. The true rule which should govern in these cases is, we think, stated by the New Jersey court as follows: "The order for the allowance is frequently based on the consent of parties or on the statement that the parties concur in the allowance. Where this is the case, or where the proceeding is in fact amicable and in behalf of all the parties interested, the propriety of the allowance is manifest. The aid of counsel is necessary to investigate title, to examine conflicting claims, and to conduct the cause. Where the defendant concurs in the proceeding, there is no reason why the complainant should be compelled to bear this part of the expense more than any other. In such case the complainant's counsel represents the interests and protects the rights of all the parties. All are presumed to be equally benefited by the proceedings. But the complainant's claim to partition may be resisted. The proceedings may be hostile, or, if not hostile, the defendants may employ their own counsel, and by answer seek to protect their interests. If the plaintiff's title is disputed, or the partition opposed upon any ground unsuccessfully, the defendants will be compelled to pay costs. And if no opposition is made to the partition, and the defendants choose to employ their own counsel, why should they be compelled to pay the counsel of the complainant? If the complainant is entitled to an allowance for counsel fees, why not the defendants also? As the proceeding in this case is not amicable, and as the claim for counsel fees is resisted by the defendants, it must be denied." Coles v. Coles, 13 N. J. Eq. 365.

Now, either of the rules above stated excludes the right of the appellees to have their solicitor's fee taxed as a part of the expense of the proceeding. Appellants promptly appeared in the action with their own solicitors to represent them, and thereafter took part in the proceedings; the same becoming to some extent adversary. Up to the time of the appearance in the case it cannot be said that the proceedings were amicable, for it could not be told, until the appearance day passed, whether the same would be amicable, or whether they would thereafter be adversary. As a matter of fact, in this case the proceedings did become to some extent adversary, for appellants denied the right of partition in kind, and asserted that the lands could not be equitably divided and should be sold for division. Thereafter they were represented by their own counsel, and there is no reason why, in addition to this, they should be taxed with any portion of the fees of the solicitor of appellees. It cannot be said, under those circumstances, that they ever accepted the benefit of the services of appellees' solicitor, for they were represented by their own solicitors in every step of the proceedings.

We are not to be understood as holding that, where one or more tenants in common brings suit against the other tenants in common for partition, and there is no appearance or resistance, the proceedings resulting in an amicable partition of the property, the fees of the plaintiff's solicitors should not be taxed against all the parties. That question does not arise in this case under the facts as before related. But even in that sort of a case, if the fees are taxable, they can only amount to such sum as the solicitor can appropriately charge his own client, and not the fee he might have charged if employed by all of them. Bradshaw v. Bank of Little Rock, 76 Ark. 501, 89 S. W. 316. "The object of the allowance," said this court in the above-cited case, "is not to give the attorneys a larger fee than they might have recovered from their own clients, but to shift the burden of the charge from them and place it upon the creditors of the bank generally. The inquiry, then, is: What would have been a reasonable charge against their own clients for the services performed?"

Our conclusion, therefore, is that it was improper to tax any attorney's fees against appellants, and the decree of the court in that respect is reversed, and the allowance stricken out. It is so ordered.

defendant on a set-off, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and rendered.

Chas. E. Robinson, of Wynne, for appellant.
S. M. Wassell, of Little Rock, for appellee.

HART, J. Appellant commenced this suit in the justice court against appellee to recover upon two promissory notes. The appellee admitted liability on the notes, but filed a set-off, in which he claimed that appellant was due him an amount over and above that due by him upon the notes for goods and merchandise sold by him to Mrs. G. K. Cross for appellant. Appellee recovered judgment against appellant in the justice court on his set-off, and the case was appealed to the circuit court. There appellee again recovered judgment, and the case is here on appeal.

The facts are as follows:

C. W. Riggs testified: "I am president of the appellant corporation, and have been since its organization. The amount due appellant by appellee on the first note sued on was $5.25 on August 5, 1909, and on the second note $50 was due on July 1, 1910. Both of these sums are due and unpaid. On November 18, 1909, appellant entered into a written agreement with Mrs. G. K. Cross by which she became its agent in Cross county for certain specified purposes, which were set out in the contract. She had no power to make a contract for us, but could only talk over contemplated contracts and present them to us for our approval. She never had any authority to make any contract for us, and I never gave her any authority whatever to use our credit, and never agreed with her or any one else to pay her debts, except in one instance, when she was taken sick on the Love place, which she had rented from us. On that occasion we received a letter that she was sick and needed assistance. We wired back that we would pay any one for taking care of her during her sickness. We never knew that she bought goods from the appellee and had same charged to our account, and never gave her any authority to buy goods from appellee and charge them to us. Mrs. Cross never had any authority to collect money for our company, except one time she was given authority to collect $10 on a horse sold. At another time she collected $25 and gave the company's receipt therefor. This was done without authority, but, owing to the distress she was in at the time, we ratified her action."

I. R. Dye, appellee, testified: "The plaintiff company owes me $149.17 for supplies furnished to Mrs. G. K. Cross bought from February to June, 1909, from me at my store in Parkin. I charged the goods to C. W. Riggs by Mrs. G. K. Cross. The plaintiff company never told me to furnish her goods, nor promised to pay for any she got; but Mrs. Cross came there and took an oversight over the affairs of the company, making contracts, buying feed, selling stock, and selling land, and I just supposed she had the right to charge things to them." Cross-examination: "When Capt. Riggs was in my town, Parkin, 1907 or 1908, this Mrs. Cross was with him and appeared to be treated as one of the family. He ran an account at my store which he finally paid by receipting one of this same series of notes, one of which is sued on. While he was there at that time, Mrs. Cross came to the store to get goods several times; sometimes with an order; sometimes without. The goods were furnished her just as they would be to the member of any other man's household, and they were charged to him. This is the reason, when she came there again and wished to buy goods, I sold them to her and charged them to C. W. Riggs by her. At the time Capt. Riggs was in Parkin, when he ran a bill at my store he was in the show business, and was in Parkin in winter quarters with his show. This account that I have filed as a counterclaim has never been paid and is past due. It amounts to $149.17. I never did send the company or Capt. Riggs a statement of the account to let them know that the goods were being charged to him. After she had run quite a bill, she came and insisted on my taking her personal note for the goods bought, and I reluctantly took it. Later she gave me another note when she had bought more goods. I have these notes now at home. They have never been paid. I said to her that I was owing the company and that we could settle it that way. I did not take the notes as a settlement releasing the Wales-Riggs Plantations Company from the debt due me. One of the series of notes to which the notes sued on belongs fell due after I had furnished these goods to Mrs. Cross and charged them to Capt. Riggs, and when the bank notified me the note was due I paid it. I did not then mention to the company the fact that I had anything against it, but paid the note in money."

J. H. Hammett testified: "I was levee tax collector in 1908, and Mrs. Cross paid the levee taxes that year for Wales-Riggs Plantations. The next I knew of her was in the fall of 1909, after I had moved from Wynne to Earle. She had desk room in my office. I had a letter from Capt. Riggs saying she was general agent of the plaintiff, and she acted like it in every way, making contracts, drawing them and signing them, renting land, selling stock, and so on."

On rebuttal Mrs. G. K. Cross testified: "In the spring of 1909 I was agent for appellant company to show its lands and stock and submit to the company any propositions or offer of rentals that might come up. I had no authority whatever to close up contracts. The goods I bought from Mr. Dye were to be charged to me and were not for the appellant company. I was not the agent of the company at that time. I was farming land which I had rented from appellant. I executed my notes to appellee for the goods I bought from him."

[1, 2] It is not claimed that there was any express authority on the part of Mrs. Cross to bind appellant, and we think that the testimony falls short of showing that she had any apparent or ostensible authority to do so. The contract of agency between appellant and Mrs. Cross made in the fall of 1909 has no probative force in this case. In proving authority of an agent for the purpose of binding the principal by the former's transaction there must be evidence of the agency at that time. The goods were purchased by Mrs. Cross from appellee in the spring of 1909 between February and June. The contract of agency between appellant and Mrs. Cross was not made until November, 1909. In the spring of 1909 Mrs. Cross was the tenant of appellant. The fact that Mrs. Cross collected money for appellant at one time by its permission, and that it ratified her act in collecting money at another time without its permission, coupled with the fact that she also paid the levee taxes for it for one year, are not sufficient to show that she was the general agent of appellant and as such had a right to buy goods and have the same charged to it.

The authority of an agent is never proved by the mere fact that the person claiming the power has exercised it. It must also be proved that the person to be charged as principal assented to such act. St. L. I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Bennett, 53 Ark. 208, 13 S. W. 742, 22 Am. St. Rep. 187.

Riggs, the president of the appellant company, and Mrs. Cross, both testified that she had no authority to buy goods and charge them to the account of appellant, and Mrs. Cross testified that she did not do so. Appellee testified that in 1907 Mrs. Cross lived with C. W. Riggs, the president of the appellant company, as a member of his family, and, like any other member of the family, came to his store for goods for him and had same charged to his account, and that Riggs paid for them.

It is contended by counsel for appellee that the agency of Mrs. Cross as established during the winter of 1907 was presumed to continue. But it will be noted that there was no testimony that Mrs. Cross was the agent for appellant in the spring of 1909. Any presumption of that fact was overcome by the positive and direct testimony of both Riggs and Mrs. Cross to the effect that she had no authority in the spring of 1909 to bind the appellant for goods sold to her by appellee. At that time she was only the tenant of appellant and was working its land just as other tenants were doing.

It follows that the judgment must be reversed, and, inasmuch as the case has been fully developed, judgment will be entered here for appellant in the amount of the balance due on the two notes sued on.

BOBO v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 2, 1912.)
INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 146*) — ILLEGAL SALES—PRINCIPALS.

Defendant was asked by M. if he could get him some whisky, and was given money to get it. He got it of B., who had told him he could get it of him any time, and gave it to M., who did not know B. was engaged in selling it. Held, that he was a necessary factor in making the sale, and that he acted for B. as well as M., and so was a principal in the illegal sale.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lafayette County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Henry Bobo appeals from a conviction. Affirmed.

Searcy & Parks, of Lewisville, for appellant. Hal L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Rector, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HART, J. Henry Bobo was indicted and convicted of the offense of selling whisky without license. The facts are as follows: E. E. Mulkey went into a restaurant in Lafayette county, Ark. where the defendant, Henry Bobo, was employed. He told Bobo that he wanted a drink, and asked him if he knew where he could get any whisky. He told Bobo that if he could get it he would pay for it. He gave Bobo $1.50 with which to get the whisky, and Bobo left the restaurant and soon afterwards returned with a quart of whisky, which he delivered to Mulkey. Bobo said that he got the whisky down at the power house from a man by the name of George Russell, and gave him the $1.50 for it; that he brought the whisky back to the restaurant and delivered it to Mulkey; and that Mulkey gave him a drink out of the bottle. On cross-examination Bobo stated that two or three days before this Russell had come around to the restaurant and told him if he wanted any whisky at any time that he had some for sale. Russell did not ask Bobo who the whisky was for, and Bobo did not tell Mulkey from whom he got it. At the conclusion of the evidence the court directed a verdict of guilty, and the action of the court in so doing is assigned as error.

Counsel for the defendant rely upon the case of Whitmore v. State, 72 Ark. 14, 77 S. W. 598. In that case the state introduced evidence tending to prove the defendant sold whisky without license. On the other hand, there was evidence which tended to show that the defendant did not sell the whisky, but that he only made out an order for whisky to persons in St. Louis dealing in liquors for the person to whom he was charged with selling the whisky. The persons in St. Louis were licensed liquor dealers. The court held that if the defendant in that case did nothing more than order liquor for another person from this firm that he was not guilty. This was because the persons in St. Louis were authorized to sell liquors, and the law did not prohibit any one from buying from them. This was but an application of the well-known rule of agency; that is to say, that which a man may legally do himself he may also do by an agent. The facts in this case are essentially different, and we think the present case is controlled by the principles of law announced in the case of Foster v. State, 45 Ark. 361. In that case Foster was indicted for selling liquor to a minor. The proof was that Foster took the money of the minor and purchased the liquor for him at a saloon in which he was not interested, and delivered the liquor to the minor. The court said that Foster was not the actor in making the sale to the minor, and to this extent was not within the language of the statute, which prohibited the sale of whisky to minors. The court held, however, that following the rule of the common law all persons concerned in the commission of a crime less than a felony, if guilty at all, are principals, and that Foster was guilty because he aided and abetted the liquor seller, which was the offense prohibited by the statute. The court said: "However men combine, each one is criminally responsible for what he personally does, * * * for the whole of what he assists others in doing, and for all that the others do through his procurement. Bish. St. Cr. § 1024. The appellant had the evil design of procuring a sale of liquor to a minor, and his act directly and immediately led to the commission of the offense. This made him a principal in the offense."

In the application of this rule in the case of Dale v. State, 90 Ark. 579, 120 S. W. 389, the court said: "It has often been ruled that one who aids another in the sale of whisky contrary to law is guilty as a principal offender, no matter what subterfuge is resorted to, or what means are employed to accomplish the sale."

Again the court said: "One might be interested in the sale and aiding the seller, and yet have no interest in the whisky being sold. One might be employed by another to assist him in making a sale, and act as his agent in making the sale of a commodity, and yet have no interest whatever in the thing being sold. He might be interested in the proceeds of the sale, or interested in making the sale because of some pecuniary or other benefit that he expected to reap from it, and yet not have any interest in the thing that was being sold. The distinction is clear, and it is vital."

Under the facts of the present case, the defendant, Bobo, aided Russell in making the sale of the whisky to Mulkey, and thereby became a principal in the offense. Mulkey did not know that Russell was engaged in the illegal sale of whisky. He came into the restaurant where Bobo was working and asked him if he could get him any whisky, and gave him money to pay for it with. Bobo went out and got the whisky from Russell, and came back and delivered it to Mulkey.

On cross-examination he was asked, "How come you to know where to get that whisky?" To which he answered: "The man that was selling it had been around there, and told me that if I wanted any he had some for sale, and told me where to find him at." We quote further from his cross-examination, as follows: "Q. How come this man coming around up there telling you he had whisky to sell, and you could get some any time you wanted to? A. Well, I guess he knew that I was in a public place— Q. In fact, he asked you to turn everything you could his way? A. No, sir. I bought it for myself before— Q. Well, he told you that if anybody come around there that wanted whisky you could get it, didn't he? A. No, sir. He just told me I could get some if I wanted it."

While Bobo says he procured the liquor from Russell at the request of Mulkey, with money furnished by him for the purpose, still he admits that Russell was not known to the buyer, and had told him that he had liquor for him whenever he wanted it. This shows that Bobo was a necessary factor in making the sale, and that he acted for the seller as well as the buyer, and as such intermediary, he was interested in the sale of the liquor, within the rule announced in the case of Dale v. State, supra, and became thereby a principal offender.

The judgment will be affirmed.

LAY v. BROWN et al.

1. CONTRACTS (§ 130*) — VALIDITY — RESTRAINT OF BIDDING AT EXECUTION SALE.

An agreement by the holder of a judgment against a decedent's estate that as to certain land the judgment should be enforced only as to a one-half interest, whereas a two-thirds interest might have been subjected in consideration that the other party, an assignee of decedent's widow's interest, would not bid at a sale under such judgment, was not invalid as being against public policy; no other attempt to restrict competition at the sale being shown.

Appeal from Benton Chancery Court; T. H. Humphreys, Chancellor.

Action by Clara Lay against Isabell Brown and others. Decree for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. E. Lynn, a resident of Missouri, died without children, leaving a widow, and, at the time of his death, owned certain real estate in Benton county, Ark. Clara Lay recovered judgment against his estate for $830 and costs. The estate was administered in Missouri and only a portion of the claim paid. Suit was filed on the judgment in Benton county and a decree rendered for the balance due and ordering the sale of decedent's undivided interest in the land. Proceeding under the decree, only an undivided one-half interest in the land was sold by the appellant; it being assumed that the widow was entitled to one-half of the lands of her deceased husband, there being no children, and the statute providing that she shall be endowed with one-third of the real estate only, as against creditors, being overlooked.

S. A. Robinson, one of the appellees, acquired the interest of Sarah Lynn, the widow, in the lands from her heirs and devisee, and claimed to be the owner of an undivided half of the land at the time of the sale. On the day of the sale, under the decree it was claimed that appellant was entitled to subject a two-thirds interest in the land to the payment of her debt, and prior to the sale Clara Lay agreed with the representatives of the owner of the other interest that she would make no further claim against appellee for the one-sixth interest, which she was entitled under the law to have subjected to the payment of her debt if said Robinson, who was present for the purpose of bidding, would not bid at the sale of the land for the payment of her judgment. Appellee Robinson did not bid at the sale, in accordance with the agreement, and the one-half interest sold was purchased by appellant for $300. Later appellant brought this suit to subject the one-sixth interest in the lands to sale. The whole property was sold, and $169, the value of that interest, brought into court and kept subject to appellant's right to recover. The court held that the agreement as made by the parties should be enforced, and that the appellant could not thereafter, in violation of her agreement, recover the money representing the one-sixth interest of said estate. From the decree denying the relief, this appeal comes.

Rice & Dickson, of Bentonville, for appellant. W. D. Mauck, of Bentonville, for appellees.

KIRBY, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is contended for appellant that no such agreement was made as claimed by appellee, and that, if made, it was invalid, being against public policy and without consideration, and not binding against her. The testimony was sufficient to warrant the finding of the chancellor that appellant agreed to refrain from any further proceeding against the estate of W. E. Lynn and Sarah Lynn, so far as this land was concerned, in consideration that appellee Robinson would refrain from bidding at the sale of the interest in the lands ordered sold for the satisfaction of her judgment against the estate, at which sale Robinson did not bid, and said half interest was purchased by appellant. There is no testimony tending to show that there was any conspiracy to prevent competition at the public sale of the lands, or to stifle bidding, further than as the agreement on the part of Robinson not to bid would have such effect. Without doubt he had the right to bid, and having succeeded to the rights of the heirs or devisees of the widow, Sarah Lynn, in the lands ordered to be sold, which interest, he understood at the time of his purchase, amounted to an undivided half, was at the sale, as he said, for the purpose of protecting his interest by bidding. He did not bid, and the half interest in the lands sold was purchased by appellant at the sale. He refrained from bidding on the express promise of appellant, as the chancellor found, that there would be no further proceeding against the estate of Lynn to subject any greater interest in the lands to the payment of the debt than they already sold. Appellant was aware at the time of making such agreement that another one-sixth interest in the land could be subjected to the payment of her claim.

In Hopkins v. Ensign, 122 N. Y. 144, 25 N. E. 306, 9 L. R. A. 731, the court, reviewing many of the older cases in which a stricter doctrine was announced, said: "The court will now look to the intention of the parties, and if they be fair and honest and the primary purpose be not to suppress competition but to protect their own rights, and there be no fraudulent purpose to defraud others interested in the result of the sale, the agreement may be upheld. The question is one of fact to be determined by the trial court upon the evidence before it." The primary purpose of this agreement was not to prevent competition at the sale nor to stifle the bidding, but to protect the rights of the parties, so far as the evidence shows, and it was not an agreement against public policy and void on that account.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[2, 3] If the land sold brought less than its reasonable market value, it does not appear from the evidence, and, if the agreement of appellee not to bid had resulted in such effect, those interested, on that account, had their remedy in an application to set the sale aside. Neither can it be said that the agreement of appellant was without consideration; the agreement of appellee not being in contravention of public policy. A consideration need not be a thing of pecuniary value, or even reducible to a money value. A waiver of a legal right at the request of another party is sufficient consideration for a promise. Certainly Robinson had the right to bid at the sale, and he thought it was necessary in order to protect the interest in the lands which he had purchased, and intended to do so. Appellant procured him to refrain from exercising his right, agreeing, in consideration therefor, to relinquish her right to proceed against the lands in controversy for a further interest than that ordered to be sold. There was a consideration, certainly, of forbearance on the part of Robinson, and without doubt upon the part of appellant, to relinquish a thing of value by such agreement. 9 Cyc. 311-315; Sykes v. Lafferry, 27 Ark. 409; Heitsch v. Cole, 47 Minn. 321, 50 N. W. 235; Hopkins v. Ensign, supra.

Finding no error in the record, the decree is affirmed.

C. C. EMERSON & CO. v. STEVENS GROCER CO.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 25, 1912.)

1. TRIAL (§ 260*) — REQUEST FOR INSTRUCTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS ALREADY GIVEN.

In an action for breach of a contract to sell and deliver a car load of potatoes, a requested instruction that the burden of proof was upon the buyer to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the seller accepted his counter proposition was properly refused, where the court had already instructed that the jury must find that the seller accepted the buyer's offer, and agreed to deliver at a different place at the same price that it had previously quoted for delivery.

2. SALES (§ 181*)—ACCEPTANCE—ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE—RETENTION OF CHECK.

The fact that the seller retained the buyer's check for an unreasonable time without notifying the buyer that he only retained it pending negotiations as to the terms of the contract of sale, or that he failed to return it within a reasonable time, was admissible upon the issue of acceptance.

3. SALES (§ 182*)—EXECUTION OF CONTRACT—QUESTION FOR JURY.

Where the seller upon receipt of an order for goods required a cash payment, and the payment of an additional rate for delivery at a different place from that for which it had quoted prices, and the buyer sent a check asking a reduction in rate, and the seller cashed the check and retained the proceeds without immediate notice to the buyer, the question whether the seller accepted the check understanding that it had been sent on the condition that, if accepted, it would be an acceptance of the buyer's counter offer, was for the jury.

6. SALES (§ 421*)—ACTION FOR BREACH—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for breach of a contract to sell and deliver goods, where the seller contended that the buyer unconditionally retained his check for such an unreasonable time, so that the jury might consider or infer an acceptance, and the buyer contended that he retained the check pending further construction of the buyer's counter proposition, and that the buyer knew that he so retained it, instructions that the jury must find that the buyer's counter proposition was accepted by the seller, and that the fact that the seller received and deposited the check was only evidence of acceptance, that if accepted with the intention of assenting to the counter offer, or if retained an unreasonable time without notice, there should be a finding for the buyer; fairly submitted the respective theories of the parties, and were not reversible error.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Jackson County; R. E. Jeffery, Judge.

Action by the Stevens Grocer Company against C. C. Emerson & Co. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jno. W. & Jos. M. Stayton, of Newport, for appellant. Jones & Campbell, of Newport, for appellee.

HART, J. This is the second appeal in this case. The first appeal is reported in 95 Ark. 421, 130 S. W. 541, under the style of Emerson v. Stevens Grocer Co. The issues and facts are fully stated in that decision, and, as counsel for appellants concede that the facts on the retrial of the case are the same, they need not be restated here. Appellee brought this suit against appellants to recover damages for failure to deliver a car of potatoes which the former alleges the latter had sold it. There was a verdict and judgment for the appellee, and the case is here on appeal.

[1] It is first contended by counsel for appellants that the court erred in refusing to give instruction numbered 6 asked by them. The instruction is as follows: "The burden of proof is upon the plaintiff to show by a preponderance of the evidence that the defendant accepted plaintiff's counter proposition." There was no error in this. In instruction numbered 1, given by the court, is in part as follows: "The first contract between the parties has been abandoned by the plaintiff, and the only thing left in the case and the only question for you to decide is whether or not the defendants accepted the said counter proposition, and agreed to deliver the potatoes at Marianna at the same prices it had quoted for their delivery at Newport, and, before you can find for the plaintiff, you must find from a preponderance of the evidence in this case that the defendants did accept the offer thus made by plaintiff, and did agree to deliver said potatoes at Marianna at the same prices that it had previously quoted for a delivery of them at Newport." It will be observed that the concluding part of this instruction is practically the same as instruction numbered 6 requested by appellants and refused by the court.

The court instructed the jury as follows:

No. 3: "You are instructed that the request of the plaintiff contained in its letter of January 6th was a counter proposition to buy a car of potatoes for delivery at Marianna at the same price as quoted by the defendants for delivery of a car of potatoes at Newport, and that you must find that this counter proposition was accepted by the defendant before you can find for the plaintiff in this case, and that the receiving and depositing of said check for $100 contained in said letter of January 6th was not an acceptance of said counter proposition in itself, but merely evidence of such acceptance, and that it is the intent with which such check was received and deposited that is to guide you in determining the weight to be given such acts as showing an acceptance. Now if you find that the defendants received and deposited said check upon the terms and with the intention of assenting to the terms of said counter offer, or retained said check an unreasonable time without notice, then you will find for the plaintiff; but if you find that it was received and deposited and merely held by the defendants for a reasonable time, pending negotiations between plaintiff and defendants for the purchase of the Marianna car, such holding would not be an acceptance of the counter offer, and you will find for the defendants."

No. 4: "If you find that, upon the plaintiff ordering a car of potatoes on Newport quotations delivered at Marianna, defendants notified plaintiff that delivery at Marianna would require a deposit of $100 for future delivery, and that plaintiff remitted the amount, but asked a modification to the Newport rate, and if you further find that the defendants accepted the check upon the terms and in assent to the offer set out in plaintiff's letter of January 6th, or that, under the circumstances of this case, the defendants retained such check for an unreasonable time, then you may find for the plaintiff the amount sued for."

It is now insisted by counsel for appellants that the court erred in giving instruction numbered 4. They contend that the two instructions are contradictory and confusing, and say that the jury must have understood instruction numbered 4 to mean that appellants were liable if they retained the check for an unreasonable length of time, no matter what they did or said to indicate their refusal to accept appellee's offer; that the simple retention of the check outweighed everything else.

[2] In the former opinion the court said: "The mere retention of the check was only evidence of such acceptance, and not conclusive proof thereof. If the appellants retained the check for an unreasonable time without notifying appellee that they only retained it for the purpose of waiting negotiations looking to the agreement of the parties to the terms of the contract, or failed to return it within a reasonable time, then the jury might infer from such action and conduct on the part of appellants that they actually did accept the terms of the offer contained in the letter of January 6th for the purchase of the potatoes. We think that, under the testimony, it was a question of fact for the jury to determine whether or not the appellant accepted the check upon the terms and in assent to the offer set out in appellee's letter of January 6th, or whether they only held it awaiting negotiations, and that it was also a question of fact for the jury to determine whether under the circumstances of this case they retained it for an unreasonable time." By the letter of January 6th appellee made a counter proposition to appellants that it would take the car of potatoes if it was delivered at Marianna at the same price as made in the original proposition of appellants for delivery at Newport. The disputed question of fact in the case is as to whether appellants accepted the counter proposition of appellee. In our former opinion we held that the fact of appellants retaining the check sent with the counter proposition was evidence of acceptance, but was not conclusive thereof. We reversed the case because the court in effect told the jury that the retention and collection of the check by appellants constituted as a matter of law an acceptance of the counter proposition made by appellee.

[3, 4] In the case of Kempner v. Cohn, 47 Ark. 519, 1 S. W. 869, 58 Am. Rep. 775, which was cited in our decision on the former appeal, it was held that, where an offer is made and the time of acceptance is not limited, the proposition is open until it is accepted or rejected, provided an answer is given in a reasonable time. In the decision on the former appeal, we held that under the facts and circumstances of this case it was a question of fact for the jury whether appellants retained the check for an unreasonable time, and also held that, if appellants did retain the check for an unreasonable time without notifying appellee that they only retained it for the purpose of further negotiations in regard to the counter proposition made to them by appellee, the jury might infer an acceptance. It is the contention of appellee that appellants unconditionally retained the check for an unreasonable time, and that from this the jury might infer an acceptance. On the other hand, appellants claim that they retained the check pending further negotiations in regard to the counter proposition made to them by appellee on January 6th, and that the facts and circumstances adduced in evidence were such that the jury should find appellee had notice that they so held it.

[5, 6] Instructions numbered 3 and 4 immediately followed each other, and it is evident that in them the court endeavored to submit to the jury the respective theories of the parties to the suit. If instruction numbered 4 was not satisfactory to appellants for the reason that they thought it might be confusing and misleading to the jury, in fairness to the court, they should have specifically pointed out their objections to it, to the end that the court might correct it. If they had done so, doubtless the court would have changed the verbiage of the instruction so as to meet their objection. Having failed to make a specific objection to the instruction, we do not think that the judgment should be reversed for giving it.

We think that the respective theories of the parties in regard to the disputed question of fact were fairly submitted to the jury, and the judgment will be affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Green County; W. J. Driver, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Fullerton, administratrix, against the Henry Wrape Company. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Appellant brought this suit against appellee to recover damages for injuries sustained by her husband which resulted in his death and which were received while he was in the employment of appellee. The facts are as follows: Appellee was a corporation engaged in manufacturing white oak heading in its factory at Paragould, Ark. As a part of its machinery therefor appellee maintained and operated a circular rip saw attached to a revolving shaft set in boxing made fast to a stationary frame. The saw was 18 inches in diameter, and about one-third of it extended upwards between two flat boards which constituted a table on top of the framework. The saw revolved very rapidly and was used to rip white oak heading, which is a piece of white oak 22 inches long, three-quarters of an inch thick, and from 6 to 12 inches wide. There was a knife or spreader made of iron or steel set right back of the saw to keep the boards from pinching the saw. Appellee operated a number of rip saws, and it was its custom to shut down four times a day for each man to look at his saw and to change the saws when they became dull or out of set. It was the sawyer's duty to change the saws when they are dull or out of set. On the 18th day of August, 1911, Andy E. Fullerton was operating said rip saw. He stood in front of the saw in the usual way and placed the piece of white oak heading against the saw, and after it had been cut for a distance of 16½ inches the back part of the saw became pinched in the piece of heading. This had the effect to draw the piece of heading to the top of the saw. It then flew back and struck Fullerton in the abdomen and caused the injuries from which he died about two days later. The saw in question was unguarded. The purpose of a guard on a saw of this kind is to prevent the piece of heading from flying back when the saw becomes pinched.

Appellant adduced evidence tending to show that the saw became pinched when it was dull or out of set. The evidence for the appellant also showed that the spreader on the saw-rig in question was thinner than the saw and that on this account the saw might become pinched; that the purpose of the spreader was to keep that part of the heading which had been cut from coming together and pinching the saw. The saw-rig in question had been shut down 1 hour and 15 minutes before the accident occurred, but the testimony does not disclose whether the saw was changed by Fullerton at that time or not. The man who operated the saw just after Fullerton was struck by the piece of heading testified that the saw appeared to be dull, but that he could not tell whether it was out of set or not. The decedent had worked in the factory of appellee for six or seven years, according to the testimony of one witness. His son testified that he had worked there for about eleven years. For the last two years of his service he operated the saw in question, and from June 3d to August 18th, the time of the accident, he operated it continuously. Appellee had other saw-rigs where the operator stood at the side of the machinery to operate them. They were so constructed in order to lessen the danger to the operator from the pieces of heading flying back when the saw became pinched. On the day of the accident Fullerton complained to the manager of the mill about the defective condition of the rip saw and saw-rig. The manager told him to go ahead and run it and he would have it fixed. The accident occurred two or three hours after this conversation. The jury returned a verdict for appellee, and the case is here on appeal.

Johnson & Burr, of Paragould, for appellant. Block & Kirsch, of Paragould, for appellee.

HART, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] It is true, as contended by counsel for appellant, that the rule that an employé is presumed to have assumed the ordinary risks incident to the employment in which he is engaged is subject to the limitation that he must have knowledge not only of the existence of defects, but must also be charged with knowledge that the defects exposed him to danger. It is equally well settled, however, that if the danger arising from the defects is so obvious as to be apparent to a person of ordinary intelligence, the law will charge the servant with the knowledge of the danger. Davis v. Railway, 53 Ark. 117, 13 S. W. 801, 7 L. R. A. 283; Clark Lumber Co. v. Northcutt, 95 Ark. 291, 129 S. W. 88; Asher v. Byrnes, 141 S. W. 1176; Railway v. Owens, 145 S. W. 879.

[2] The trial judge recognized the principle that the servant's knowledge of a defect is a bar to his action only when it was apparent that he understood the risks created by that defect, but considered that the danger arising from using the machinery in its alleged defective condition was unmistakably obvious to the decedent. For this reason the instructions given by the court limited appellant's right to recover to the sole issue of decedent's complaint about the defective condition of the machinery and the master's promise to repair. Upon this action of the court counsel for appellant assign error.

All of the witnesses testified that the saw revolved very rapidly, and that when it became pinched for any reason the piece of heading which was being sawed would be forced to the top of the saw and would then fly back with considerable force. The purpose of the spreader was to keep the piece of heading from pinching the saw, and the purpose of a guard was to keep the piece of heading from flying back and striking the operator when the saw became pinched. The decedent had worked at appellee's mill for a period of time variously estimated from seven to eleven years, and had worked at the saw in question at intervals for two years just preceding the accident. He commenced regularly to operate the saw on the 3d of July preceding the accident, and worked there up to the time of the accident, which occurred on the 18th of August. It was the sawyer's duty to remove the saw when it became dull or out of set. The decedent was a sawyer of experience, and the fact that the saw was unguarded and that the spreader was thinner than the saw, and on this account was likely to cause the saw to become pinched, are facts that were obvious to the decedent. This is conceded by counsel for appellant, but they contend that the decedent did not realize or appreciate the danger from using the saw in its defective condition. But it seems to us that the danger arising from the defective conditions as they are alleged to have existed were equally obvious to the decedent. As we have already seen, the testimony shows that they were known to all the other servants of the company who had no more experience in the use of the saws than had the decedent. If the danger was obvious and patent to them, it was equally so to the decedent when his age and experience in the use of machinery is taken into consideration.

Moreover, the testimony of the appellant shows that the decedent made complaint about the defective condition of the machinery on the very day of the accident, and the master promised to repair it. The fact that he made the complaint is inconsistent with the idea that he did not realize the danger from using it in its alleged defective condition, and shows that he appreciated the danger which might result from a continued use of the machinery before the alleged defects had been remedied.

No other assignments of error are urged for a reversal of the judgment, and the judgment will be affirmed.

HEARIN et al. v. UNION SAWMILL CO.
et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—CONVEYANCES—CONSTRUCTION—"OLD-FIELD PINE."

A timber deed, which conveyed all the pine timber 10 inches and up, includes every kind of pine on the land, regardless whether it is worth sawing, and so includes old-field pine, which is pine that grows on land that has been once farmed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. EVIDENCE (§ 461*) — DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE—PAROL EVIDENCE RULE.

Where a timber deed conveyed all the pine timber 10 inches and up, thus including old-field pine, parol evidence was inadmissible to show that it was not intended by the parties to include such timber.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence Cent. Dig. §§ 2129-2133; Dec. Dig. § 461.*]

3. REFORMATION OF INSTRUMENTS (§ 23*)—RIGHT TO CORRECTION—MISTAKE.

Where a timber deed included all the pine timber 10 inches and up, and had been read by the grantors, who upon a subsequent correction of the deed made no objection to that description, they are not entitled to have it reformed at a later time on the ground that the description was inserted by the grantee's fraud or through mistake.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Reformation of Instruments, Cent. Dig. § 82; Dec. Dig. § 23.*]

4. EVIDENCE (§ 130*)—RELEVANCY.

In an action by the grantors to reform their timber deed, evidence that the purchaser's grantee who was made a party solely for that reason, had urged, in an action between other parties, a contention similar to that of the grantors, is irrelevant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 403; Dec. Dig. § 130.*]

Appeal from Union Chancery Court; J. M. Barker, Chancellor.

Action by J. F. Hearin and another against the Union Sawmill Company and another. From a decree for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

J. B. Moore, of El Dorado, and Warren & Smith, of Camden, for appellants. Gaughan & Sifford and Powell & Taylor, all of Camden, for appellees.

HART, J. J. F. and J. C. Hearin were in 1905 the owners of a tract of land in Union county, Ark., on which grew oak and pine timber. On the 27th day of March, 1905, they conveyed to the Summitt Lumber Company, a corporation, "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up" on said land. Eight years was given in the deed to remove the timber. Subsequently it was discovered by the parties that a mistake had been made in the description of the land, and a new deed was executed on the 19th day of June, 1906, and the timber was again described as "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up." The tract of land in question contained both virgin and old-field pine. "Old-field pine" is pine that grows on land that has been once farmed. In 1909 the Summitt Lumber Company conveyed the timber so purchased by it to the Union Sawmill Company, another corporation. All the deeds referred to were filed for record. The Summitt Lumber Company began to cut and remove the old-field pine, as well as the virgin pine. The Hearins claimed that the old-field pine was not embraced in the timber deed given by them to the Summitt Lumber Company, and in 1909 they conveyed "an undivided half interest in and to all the old-field pine timber ten inches and upwards at the stump" standing and growing on said land to T. W. Ramsey, J. W. Warren, and C. W. Smith, upon consideration that their grantees should bear the expenses of litigation in a suit against the Summitt Lumber Company to recover the old-field pine. This suit was instituted in the chancery court by J. F. Hearin, J. C. Hearin, T. W. Ramsey, J. W. Warren, and C. W. Smith against the Union Sawmill Company and Summitt Lumber Company. The plaintiffs alleged in their complaint that the old-field pine was not embraced in the grant of timber to the Summitt Lumber Company, and also alleged that the language used in the deed was inserted by fraud or mistake, and that it was not intended by the parties that the old-field pine should be conveyed. The prayer of the complaint is that the timber deeds be canceled as a cloud upon plaintiffs' title, and that they be reformed to conform to the intention of the parties and for damages. The defendants deny the allegations of fraud and mistake and aver that the old-field pine was conveyed under the timber deeds. Evidence was introduced by both parties to sustain their respective contentions. The chancellor found in favor of the defendants, and plaintiffs have appealed.

C. W. Curphey was the agent of the Summitt Lumber Company in purchasing the lands from J. F. and J. C. Hearin. It appears that Mrs. J. C. Hearin owned a part of the land, and her husband, J. F. Hearin, owned a part. Both testified it was understood between them and Curphey, at the time the purchase of the timber was made and the deed to the same was executed, that the old-field pine was not to be included. They said that at that time old-field pine had no market value and that Curphey refused to purchase it; that there was no market value for old-field pine in that part of the country until in 1906 and 1907. Other evidence introduced by them tended to show that the mill operators did not begin to purchase old-field pine and saw it into lumber until the latter part of 1905. They said that the old-field pine had more knots in it than the virgin pine, and for that reason could not be profitably sawed into lumber at the time the timber in question was conveyed to the Summitt Lumber Company in the spring of 1905. Afterwards they said that the price of lumber began to rise, and it was not until then that the sawmill operators began to purchase old-field pine. The Hearins also testified that one of the agents of the Summitt Lumber Company began to estimate the old-field pine in question in 1907, and that they told him that the old-field pine was not embraced in the deed made by them to the Summitt Lumber Company. The agent who made the estimate denied that they made any objection at the time, and denied that they contended that the old-field pine was not included in the deed during the time he was making the estimate.

The evidence on the part of the defendants tended to show that, at the time the Summitt Lumber Company purchased the timber from the Hearins, it and other sawmill operators were purchasing old-field pine and sawing it into lumber. Some of the witnesses said they began to purchase old-field pine and saw it into lumber as early as 1903, and some place the date in 1904.

[1, 2] It is first contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that old-field pine is not included in the description "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up." We think they are not correct in this contention. These general words aptly include every kind of pine on the lands. The language used is broad enough to cover the old-field pine. It does not make any difference whether or not it was profitable at that time to saw old-field pine, for, as we have already seen, the language of the deed is not merchantable timber, but is "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up." Since the language of a deed is broad and comprehensive enough to cover all the pine timber that may be found on the land of a certain description, it is not material to the effect of the deed that the parties in fact contemplated at the time that a particular kind of pine timber found on the land should not be included under the terms of the deed. This is so because the natural and ordinary meaning of the language used in the deed is broad and comprehensive enough to include the old-field, as well as the virgin, pine. To allow the plaintiffs to show by parol proof that it was not so intended would be to contradict or vary the written instrument, which is contrary to the settled rule in this state. Cherokee Const. Co. v. Prairie Creek Coal Mining Co., 144 S. W. 927; Boston Store v. Schleuter, 88 Ark. 213, 114 S. W. 242; Cox v. Smith, 99 Ark. 218, 138 S. W. 978; Delaney v. Jackson, 95 Ark. 131, 128 S. W. 859; Bradley Gin Co. v. J. L. Means Machinery Co., 94 Ark. 130, 126 S. W. 81.

[3] It is next contended by counsel for the plaintiffs that the language "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up" was placed in the deed through fraud or mistake on the part of C. W. Culphey, the agent of the defendant Summitt Lumber Company, in purchasing the land. Culphey was not introduced as a witness, and it appears that he resided in another state at the time the depositions were taken. It also appears that Mrs. Hearin knew where he resided and that the defendants did not. She refused on cross-examination to disclose his address, but subsequently through her attorneys gave it to the defendants. Mrs. Hearin testified that she and her husband acted together in selling the timber and that both were present when the sale was made. She admits that she read over the deed they executed to the Summitt Lumber Company and, also, read it to her husband. Again, a year later, it was ascertained that a mistake had been made in the deed in the description of the land, and a new deed was executed to correct this mistake. This deed also described the timber as "all the pine and oak timber ten inches and up."

The deed was the final embodiment in writing of the agreement between the parties. The plaintiffs signed it of their own volition after having read it. They will not now be heard to say they did not know what it contained, or that they did not understand the plain and ordinary meaning of the words used. Stewart v. Fleming, 150 S. W. 128, and cases cited. In disclosing a similar principle, in that case, the court said: "There was no misrepresentation as to any matter of inducement to the making of the lease, which, from the relative position of the parties and their means of information, the one could be presumed to contract upon the faith and trust which he reposed in the representation of the agent of the other on account of his superior information and knowledge with respect to the subject of the contract, nor were there any fraudulent representations holding out inducements calculated to mislead the lessee and induce him to execute the lease on the faith and confidence of such representations, and, having signed it after opportunity to examine it, he will not be heard to say when he signed it that he did not know what it contained"—citing authorities.

[4] Testimony was introduced by the plaintiffs tending to show that the Union Sawmill Company, one of the defendants in this case, made a contention similar to the one they are making now in a contest with another corporation as to similar language used in a deed. It is only necessary to say, in regard to this, that such action could in no event affect the rights of the Summitt Lumber Company, which was not a party to that contention. Whatever rights the plaintiffs had resulted from a construction of their deed to the Summitt Lumber Company. The Union Sawmill Company was only made a party defendant because it had purchased the timber from the Summitt Lumber Company. Hence the testimony referred to could have no probative force whatever as affecting the rights of the Summitt Lumber Company. The decree will be affirmed.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—COLOR OF TITLE—EVIDENCE—WEIGHT.

In an action of ejectment between the heirs of a wife and a purchaser under an execution against the husband, evidence held insufficient to show any such change of possession under a colorable deed from the husband to the wife as gave her title by adverse possession prior to the execution sale.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 471*)—FACTS OR CONCLUSIONS.

The testimony of a witness that he guessed his mother was in the possession of land was not a statement of a substantive fact, but a mere conclusion of the witness.

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 62*)—CHARACTER OF POSSESSION.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Lafayette County; Jacob M. Carter, Judge.

Ejectment by Bryant L. Stricklin and others against Henry Moore. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

R. M. Mann, of Texarkana, for appellant. Moore & Moore, of Texarkana, for appellee.

HART, J. This is an action of ejectment by Bryant L. Stricklin, W. W. Stricklin, and Fuller Stricklin against Henry Moore for 160 acres of land. On the former appeal the judgment was reversed because the circuit court erred in sustaining a demurrer to the complaint. Reference is made to the opinion on the former appeal for an extended statement of the issues. See Stricklin v. Moore, 98 Ark. 30, 135 S. W. 360. Upon the remand of the case, the defendant filed an answer in which he denied both the title and the right of possession of plaintiffs, and also pleaded an investiture of title in himself by adverse possession for more than seven years. At the conclusion of the testimony the court directed a verdict for the defendant, and the plaintiffs have appealed. The facts are as follows:

Wm. N. Stricklin became the owner of the lands in controversy, together with other lands referred to in the testimony, some time about 1834. The lands in controversy were mortgaged by Wm. N. Stricklin to the Real Estate Bank of Arkansas and upon the foreclosure of this mortgage the property became the property of the state, but the state issued to Wm. N. Stricklin its certificate dated July 14, 1877, showing that he had a right to purchase the land. On February 24, 1879, W. N. Stricklin executed a deed to the land in question together with other lands to Mary D. Stricklin, his wife. On the 23d day of March, 1880, Wm. N. Stricklin and Mary D. Stricklin conveyed said lands to Sam B. Le May, a nephew of the said Wm. N. Stricklin, and on the same day Wm. N. Stricklin assigned to said Sam B. Le May the certificate which he had received from the state of Arkansas. On April 1, 1880, the state issued to Le May its patent to the land. Le May then on the same day executed to Mary D. Stricklin a bond for title to said lands, and took her notes for the purchase money. On the 17th day of August, 1881, the said Mary D. Stricklin died intestate, leaving the plaintiffs as her sole heirs at law. On October 4, 1880, the administrator of the estate of Wiley P. Cryer, deceased, recovered judgment against Wm. N. Stricklin for the sum of $2,320.11. A suit was then instituted to set aside the deed to Le May as a fraud upon the creditors of Wm. N. Stricklin. On December 16, 1885, the deposition of Wm. N. Stricklin was taken in said cause. Wm. N. Stricklin died in 1908, and his deposition was read at the trial of the present case. He testified that he had been in possession of the lands in controversy from 1834 up to the present time (1885), and that the lands during all that time had never been out of his possession; that the lands were deeded to Sam B. Le May to assist him in defrauding his creditors, and that Le May had never asserted any title to the land, and did not expect his wife to pay for the land when he executed the bond for title to her; that Le May knew his wife had no property of her own, and never expected to pay for the lands. The suit by the administrator of Wiley P. Cryer, deceased, was never prosecuted to judgment, but was finally dismissed for want of prosecution. Some effort was made by the administrator of the estate of Sam B. Le May to collect the notes given him by Mary D. Stricklin, but it does not appear that they were ever collected or that any suit looking to that end was ever prosecuted to judgment. The defendant, Henry Moore, recovered judgment against Wm. N. Stricklin and Bryant L. Stricklin, and levied on about 700 or 800 acres of land, including the lands in controversy, to satisfy said judgment. Moore became the purchaser of all of said lands at the execution sale, and on May 2, 1895, after the expiration of the year for redemption had expired, received a deed to said lands. Moore then conveyed all of the lands so purchased by him at the execution sale, except the land in controversy, to the plaintiffs in the present suit. Moore testified that at the time he made the conveyance to them it was understood between him and the plaintiffs that he was to retain the title to the lands in controversy. The plaintiffs admitted the purchase of the other lands from him, but denied that they agreed that the defendant should retain the 160 acres in controversy for himself. The defendant after his purchase at execution sale went into possession of the 160 acres involved in this suit, and has held possession ever since, making improvement upon the lands, and renting them to some of the plaintiffs and to other persons.

In the opinion on the former appeal, which is the law of the case, the court, in discussing the deed from Wm. N. Stricklin to his wife, said that an equitable title is not sufficient to maintain ejectment unless there is a legal right to possession, but counsel for plaintiffs say that they rely on a title by adverse possession in the said Mary D. Stricklin to recover. On the former appeal the court said: "The allegations of the complaint are that Mary D. Stricklin held the land adversely from the date of her deed in 1879 up to her death in August, 1880, and that her husband, W. N. Stricklin, held adversely as tenant by the curtesy from then until defendant became the purchaser of his title at the execution sale in 1895. The adverse possession of W. N. Stricklin as such tenant by the curtesy, coupled with the adverse possession of his wife, constituted an investiture of title in the heirs of Mary D. Stricklin, subject to the life tenancy of W. N. Stricklin."

[1] It will be noted, however, that the question before the court then was whether the demurrer to the complaint should have been sustained, and the allegations of the complaint were considered as proved. Upon the proof, as shown by the record on the present appeal, it is not established that Mary D. Stricklin was ever in possession of the land. On the contrary, the undisputed proof shows that Wm. N. Stricklin entered into the possession of the lands in 1834, and remained in possession of them until the date of the execution sale to the defendant Moore in 1895. During this long period he was in open, notorious possession, taking the rents and exercising every act of ownership. The conveyance by him to his wife was merely colorable. It will be remembered that the conveyance was made in 1879, and that his wife died in August, 1881. At the date of the conveyance to her, she did not reside on the lands, but resided on their homestead in the town of Lewisville. She continued to reside there until her death. It does not appear that she ever exercised any act of ownership whatever over the lands. In March, 1880, W. N. Stricklin and Mary D. Stricklin, his wife, executed a deed to Sam B. Le May to said lands, and W. N. Stricklin also transferred to him the certificate of the state, and on April 1, 1880, the state issued its patent to Le May. So Le May became invested with both the legal and equitable title, and the adverse possession of Stricklin was in hostility to his title.

[2] Plaintiffs claim that the testimony of B. L. Stricklin shows that Mrs. Stricklin was in possession of the land after the deed was made to her. The witness was asked who was in possession of the land after this deed was made, and answered: "The part of it that was deeded to mother. I guess she was in possession of it." This was merely a conclusion of the witness, and was not a statement of any substantive fact. Bryant L. Stricklin also testified that his father claimed to him the land was his wife's. He said that this was during his mother's lifetime, and after her death his father also spoke of it as belonging to his mother. On cross-examination he stated that his father was in the possession of the land at the time he made the deed to his wife, and that his mother at that time was living on the homestead at Lewisville, and continued to live there until her death. He further stated that his father controlled the land and continued in the possession of it.

W. W. Stricklin, another one of the plaintiffs, testified that his father was in possession of the land when the deed was made to his wife, and that he continued to hold possession of it until the defendant Moore took possession.

[3] We are of the opinion that the undisputed testimony shows that there was never any visible change in the possession of the land, and that there is no substantive testimony from which it can be inferred that Mrs. Stricklin ever entered into possession of the land at any time. This being true, the continued possession of the land after her death by Wm. N. Stricklin would not constitute adverse possession by him as tenant by curtesy, but such adverse possession by him being continued for the statutory period created an investiture of title in himself; that is to say, we are of the opinion that the undisputed testimony shows that Mrs. Stricklin never asserted any claim whatever to the land, and never took possession of it. On the other hand, Wm. N. Stricklin remained in possession of the land after the deed was made just as he had before and continued to control and exercise the exclusive ownership over it until it was sold to the defendant Moore at the execution sale in 1895. This gave him a title by adverse possession against Le May, to whom the legal title was conveyed in 1880.

It follows that the judgment must be affirmed.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Ashley County; H. W. Wells, Judge.

Jasper Williams was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and he appeals. Affirmed.

George & Butler, of Hamburg, for appellant. Hal. L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Rector, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. The defendant, Jasper Williams, was indicted by the grand jury of Ashley county for the crime of murder, alleged to have been committed by killing one Louis Shelton in that county in the month of October, 1911. The jury convicted him of voluntary manslaughter, and fixed his punishment at a term of two years in the state penitentiary, and he has prosecuted an appeal to this court.

[1] The principal contention is that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the verdict. Defendant and deceased were both colored men, who had resided in the same community as acquaintances and neighbors for a number of years. They had a falling out a short time before the killing, and bad blood arose between them. A difficulty between them had occurred only a few days before the killing. On the occasion of the killing they met during the day on a little bridge at or near the village of Thebes. When the defendant came up, the deceased, Shelton, and one Bethune, who testified as a witness in the case, were standing on the bridge together conversing, and after greetings had passed between the three, Shelton, according to the testimony of this witness, addressed defendant, saying: "What you said to me the other day I don't like. Jasper, you have got that to take back." Defendant replied, "If I take it back, you must make me take it back." Whereupon Shelton drew his knife and stepped forward in the direction of defendant, when the latter drew his pistol and commenced firing. He fired three shots in quick succession, the last of which took effect in Shelton's body and caused immediate death. This witness states that Shelton stepped forward with the knife in his hand, but stopped as soon as defendant drew his pistol, and did not advance any further nor make any further effort to attack defendant. It does not appear from the testimony of the state's witness that he was close enough to defendant to strike him with the knife. Another witness testified that he was a short distance away, saw the men standing together, and when attracted by the first shot looked at them, and that Shelton made no forward movement after the first shot was fired. It was proved that threats were made by Shelton against the defendant, which were communicated to the latter before the killing occurred. Defendant's version of the affair, as related by him on the witness stand, is that, after the words were spoken between him and Shelton on the bridge, substantially as related by witness Bethune, Shelton advanced towards him, saying: "You just as well shoot. I am going to kill you"—and made a "grab" at him, or, to use his exact language, "grabbed at the waist of my pants, and said he was going to kill me with that knife." He stated further that deceased continued to advance, and that he (defendant) was going backward. We must, of course, treat the verdict of the jury as settling this conflict against the contention of defendant. We are of the opinion that the testimony was sufficient to sustain the verdict of voluntary manslaughter. The undisputed evidence is to the effect that Shelton brought on the killing and was the aggressor; but the jury might well have found, and doubtless did conclude, that the danger to defendant was not imminent enough to justify him in slaying his assailant, and that the killing was not necessary as an act of self-defense. The preponderance of the evidence, we think, is that the killing was perpetrated by the defendant while in fear of his own safety; but there was not sufficient foundation for it to warrant him in slaying his antagonist. It appears from the evidence that the defendant had been living in that community for 25 or 30 years, and bore an exceptionally good reputation for morality as well as for peace. The jury doubtless took this into consideration in fixing the minimum punishment. Considering the evidence, taken as a whole, we are of the opinion that the verdict of the jury was about right in finding defendant guilty of manslaughter, and we do not feel disposed to disturb it.

[2] The only other ground for reversal urged is that the court erred in refusing to grant a continuance. The prayer for continuance was based upon the absence of a witness who it is alleged would have testified as to threats made by deceased which were subsequently communicated to the defendant. There was other testimony along the same lines, and it is manifest that defendant was not prejudiced by the absence of the witness.

[3] In addition to that, the court was warranted in finding that the attendance of the witness could not be procured. There was no error in overruling the motion.

Judgment affirmed.

McCARROLL v. RED DIAMOND CLOTHING CO.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 2, 1912.)

GUARANTY (§§ 7, 34, 67*)—SPECIAL GUARANTY—LIABILITY.

Where a traveling salesman on commission on orders taken and accepted took an order from the buyer which the seller refused to accept because of the buyer's financial condition, and so notified the salesman, who, by letter, replied that he knew that the buyer had been slow in paying his bills, and stated, "if my indorsement is worth anything, you can ship on it," and the seller, on receipt of the letter, shipped the goods relying on the guaranty, the salesman was absolutely bound to pay, and notice of the seller's acceptance of the guaranty and of the failure of the buyer to pay was not necessary to bind him.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Yell County; Hugh Basham, Judge.

Action by the Red Diamond Clothing Company against John McCarroll. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Appellant, who was at the time a traveling salesman for appellee, receiving commissions on orders taken and accepted, took an order from the Centerville Mercantile Company in September, 1908, for a bill of goods amounting to $118.05. Appellee, upon receipt of the order, notified its salesman that it would not be filled because of the financial condition of said company, whereupon he wrote to them, stating he knew the company had been slow in the payment of its bills, and setting out the good financial condition of some of its officers and stockholders and its own worth, and, concluding: "If my indorsement is worth anything, you can ship on it. That is the way I feel about them. I am vice president of the McCarroll Brothers Company." The bill of goods was then shipped to the Centerville Mercantile Company under said direction and indorsement on September 30th, 1908. Said company continued in bad financial condition and failed to pay for the goods when the bill became due, and their check for the price being protested for non-payment and the account placed in the hands of an attorney for collection on December 7, 1908, and said company was later adjudged insolvent, placed in the hands of a receiver, and its creditors realized nothing. Appellant was absent from the state during the spring and summer of 1909, and demand for payment was made on him when he returned in the fall, and, upon his refusal to pay, this suit was brought against said Mercantile Company and him before a justice of the peace, and appealed to the circuit court. On the hearing there the court directed a verdict for appellee, from which this appeal comes.

John McCarroll, pro se. Priddy & Chambers, of Danville, for appellee.

KIRBY, J. (after stating the facts as above). Appellant contends that he had no notice of the acceptance of his indorsement by the appellee company and the shipment of goods upon it, and on that account did not become liable thereon, and that appellee was negligent in proceeding to collect the debt from the insolvent company. If appellee's letter be construed as but an offer of indorsement or a conditional guaranty, it would have been necessary to notify him of its acceptance, or the conditions must have been performed by appellee company in order to fix his liability thereon, but such is not the case. Upon being advised of the refusal to ship the bill of goods ordered, because of the bad financial condition of the company ordering them, he wrote, expressing the utmost confidence in their ability to pay, giving his reasons therefor and concluded by saying: "If my indorsement is worth anything, you can ship on that. * * * I am vice president of the McCarroll Brothers Company." The appellee, upon the receipt of the letter, shipped the goods, upon said indorsement, charging them upon its books to the said company and John F. McCarroll, and relying absolutely upon the faith and credit of such indorsement, as the undisputed testimony shows. This was not a continuing guaranty nor a conditional one, but a special guaranty or indorsement, directing the shipment of the goods on the credit of the guarantor, if it was regarded good for the payment, and, being acted upon and the goods shipped in accordance therewith, appellant became absolutely bound with the principal on the contract of sale under which the liability of the failed company accrued. 20 Cyc. 1398, 1399; Stewart v. Sharp County Bank, 71 Ark. 588, 76 S. W. 1064; Friend v. Smith Gin Co., 59 Ark. 91, 26 S. W. 374.

It is insisted that appellant should have been notified of the acceptance of his contract of guaranty or indorsement at the time of the shipment of the goods, and the failure of the company to pay for them, in order to bind him thereon. If his letter had been but an offer to guarantee the payment of the account, this would be true, but it was a direction to ship the goods upon his indorsement, if his credit was regarded good for the amount, and needed only to be acted upon by the appellee, and the goods shipped in accordance therewith to bind him.

Appellee made no proposition to its salesman that it would ship the goods upon his guaranty of the account, but he sent the direction and indorsement which was acted upon by them, and thereupon became binding upon him. He does not claim that he did not have notice that the goods were shipped, but only that he was not advised at the time that the company would look to him for the payment in accordance with his proposition. He did know that appellee had refused to ship the bill of goods, because of the financial condition of the firm ordering them, and also that he had directed their shipment after being notified of such refusal upon his own indorsement, if it was regarded good, and that thereafter the goods were shipped. Nothing further was necessary to bind him to the payment therefor.

As these facts appeared from the undisputed testimony, the court did not err in directing the verdict.

The judgment is affirmed.

CLAY COUNTY v. BANK OF KNOBEL

1. TAXATION (§ 453*)—ASSESSMENT—OVERVALUATION—REMEDY.

Acts 1911, p. 230, amending Kirby's Dig. § 7003, authorizing the board of equalization to correct errors in assessments, and providing for appeals from the order of the board of equalization to the county court, and appeals from the county court to the circuit court, furnishes a complete remedy in case of overvaluation of property for taxation by first applying to the board of equalization, and where relief is not granted by appeal to the county court, and then to the circuit court, and a taxpayer must pursue the statutory remedy, and, where he fails to do so, he cannot obtain relief in the circuit court.

2. TAXATION (§ 453*)—ASSESSMENT—OVERVALUATION—REMEDY.

Under Kirby's Dig. § 6992, providing for the meeting in September of each year of the board of equalization, and section 1361 and Acts 1895, p. 38, providing that the county court of Clay county shall be held at Piggott in April, July, and October of each year, and Acts 1911, p. 161, providing for separate county courts for the western district of Clay county, and for the meeting of such courts in March, June, September, and December of each year, and providing that the county court for levying taxes shall be held at Piggott as now provided by law, the provisions for the meeting of the equalization board and the session of the county court for Clay county apply to the western district, and a taxpayer in the western district may pursue the remedy prescribed by Acts 1911, p. 230, in case of overvaluation of his property by applying to the board of equalization, and, where relief is not granted, thereby appeal to the county court at the regular October term, and then by appeal to the circuit court.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Clay County; W. J. Driver, Judge.

Petition by the Bank of Knobel against Clay County for the reduction of the valuation of its property for assessment. From a judgment of the Circuit Court reducing the assessment as prayed for, the county appeals. Reversed and dismissed.

At the March term, 1912, of the Clay county court, appellee presented its petition alleging that its property in 1911, including its entire assets, personal and real, was assessed at the sum of $9,342.43, whereas it should have been assessed at one-half that sum. It prayed that the assessment be reduced. The petition was overruled. Appellee took an appeal to the circuit court. In the circuit court appellant filed an answer admitting that appellee's property had been assessed at the sum alleged, but denied that the property was doubly assessed, and set up that the court was without jurisdiction or power to grant the relief prayed for, and alleged that, if the petitioner was entitled to any relief, it had lost that right by failure to apply to the proper court within the time required by law. A trial was had and evidence was adduced tending to show that appellee's property was assessed at its true value—the amount alleged in the complaint—and there was evidence to the effect that the board of equalization of Clay county had a rule to assess property at 50 cents on the dollar of its true value; that the board, in that respect, approved the rule of the State Tax Commission to assess property at its real value and then cut it half in two and put the valuation at one-half the real value. But this was not done as to the property of appellee. The circuit court rendered judgment reducing the assessment to $4,696.25, as prayed in the petition. Appellant duly prosecutes this appeal.

G. B. Oliver, of Corning, for appellant. J. S. Jordan, of Corning, for appellee.

WOOD, J. (after stating the facts as above).

[1] Act 249 of the Acts of 1911, p. 230, which amends section 7003 of Kirby's Digest, provides that the board of equalization, when in session, "shall have power to examine witnesses with respect to any matter under investigation, to hear complaints with respect to the undervaluation or overvaluation of property, and to equalize the assessments of the county by adding to or taking from the valuation of any real or personal property, moneys and credits within the county, and to assess the property of any person omitted from the rolls by the assessor, and to correct the obvious errors that may have been made in the assessment of property by the assessor." The second section specifies when the board of equalization shall meet, and then provides: "The board shall have power to exercise its functions in the equalization of property until the fourth Wednesday of October." The fourth section provides that "all appeals taken from the order of the board of equalization shall be taken to the October term of the county court, and such appeals, even if taken after the regular October term of the county court has convened, shall be heard and passed upon by said court before the fourth Wednesday in October." And the fifth section, among other things, provides that "all appeals from the county court to the circuit court herein provided must be taken within thirty days of the day upon which the order from which the appeal is taken was made." It will thus be seen that the statute furnishes a complete remedy, in case of overvaluation of property by the assessor, to have the same reduced by first applying to the board of equalization, and, if relief is not granted there, then by appeal to the county court, and then to the circuit court. The appellee did not pursue the remedy provided by statute.

We held in Clay County v. Brown Lumber Co., 90 Ark. 417, 119 S. W. 251, that in all cases of excessive valuation, where the assessor or the board acts within its jurisdiction, the taxpayer must pursue the remedy provided for his relief or abide by the finding of the board. And in Bank of Jonesboro v. Hampton, 92 Ark. 492, 123 S. W. 753, we said: "The taxpayer may apply to the county board of equalization for redress against the action of the county assessor; and, if the county board does not grant him the relief, he may appeal to the county court, and, if dissatisfied with its action, may in turn appeal from its decision." In State v. Little, 94 Ark. 217, 126 S. W. 713, 29 L. R. A. (N. S.) 721, we said: "The courts, either of common law or equity, are powerless to give relief against the erroneous judgments of assessing bodies, except as they be especially empowered by law to do so." It thus appears that appellee, not having pursued the remedy provided by law, was not entitled to the relief which the circuit court granted.

[2] The appellee contends that under the act of May 4, 1911, supra, it was without a remedy because there was no October term of the county court of the Western district of Clay county to which it could appeal according to the provisions of that act. Act 204, p. 161, of the Acts of 1911, provides, among other things, for separate county courts for the Western district of Clay county and the time for the meeting of such courts, to wit, on the third Monday in December and on the fourth Mondays in March, June, and September of each year. After fixing the time for holding these courts, the act provides that "the county court for levying the taxes and making appropriations shall be held at Piggott, the county site, as now provided by law." At the time this act was passed the county court of Clay county was held at Piggott on the first Monday in April, July, and October of each year (Kirby's Digest, § 1361; Acts 1895, p. 36), and the board of equalization met in September of each year (Kirby's Digest, § 6992).

Counsel for appellee states that there was only one board of equalization in Clay county, and there is no evidence in the record showing that there was any board for the Western district separate from that for the Eastern district. Since there is no specific provision in the act for the meeting of the equalization board and session of the county court in the Western district of Clay county for the purpose of correcting improper assessment of taxes, we must assume that the above general provision for the meeting of the equalization board and the session of the county court for Clay county applied to the Western district as well as to the Eastern district thereof. When the county court met for the levying of taxes, it was necessarily in session for the purpose of correcting any errors that may have been made in the assessment of taxes, as the assessment of taxes necessarily preceded any proper levying thereof.

Therefore, if appellee's property was improperly assessed by overvaluation, it had a complete remedy as provided by statute, supra, by first making application to the board of equalization, and, if relief was not there granted, then by appeal to the county court, and then to the circuit court. Not having pursued this remedy, the circuit court erred in granting the relief prayed in the petition.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause is dismissed.

GALLOWAY v. DARBY et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Nov. 18, 1912.)

1. WILLS (§ 775*)—LEGACIES—LAPSED LEGACIES.

As a will is ambulatory, the death of a legatee during the lifetime of the testator will cause a lapse in the legacy, in the absence of a statute to the contrary, and Kirby's Dig. § 8022, saves from lapse only bequests and devises to surviving children or descendants of the testator.

2. WILLS (§ 775*)—CONSTRUCTION—INTENTION OF TESTATOR—"HEIRS."

The question in explaining a will is not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of his words, and, where technical phrases or terms of art are used, it is fair to presume that the testator understood them, and hence a general provision in a will that all the property devised and bequeathed, unless otherwise specifically stated, shall vest in the devisees, their heirs and assigns, in fee simple, must be construed as words of limitation fixing the estate of such devisees, and cannot be construed as equivalent to children, and as showing an intention to prevent lapse by prescribing a line of succession, for the word "heirs" in its technical sense is a word of limitation, and not of substitution.

The distinction between personalty and realty having been abolished, a general residuary clause will carry a lapsed devise of realty as well as a bequest of personalty.

5. WILLS (§ 858*)—LAPSED LEGACIES—RESIDUARY CLAUSE.

Where the introduction of a will expressed the testator's intention of disposing of all her property, a residuary clause reciting that she gave, devised, and bequeathed all the rest and residue of her estate not hereinbefore specifically devised and bequeathed, of which she should die possessed or to which she will be entitled, will carry lapsed devises notwithstanding the expression "not hereinbefore specifically devised," for a general residuary clause carries all the property of the testator not otherwise disposed of, unless the will shows an intention to exclude from its operation some part of the estate, and such clause should be liberally construed to prevent intestacy.

Appeal from Pulaski Chancery Court; John E. Martineau, Chancellor.

Action between D. F. S. Galloway against James Darby and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff and defendant W. A. Galloway appeal. Reversed and remanded, with directions.

Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, of Little Rock, for appellants. James A. Comer and John McClure, both of Little Rock, for appellees.

MCCULLOCH, C. J. The merits of this controversy involve the construction of the last will and testament of Elizabeth S. Shall, who died in the city of Little Rock on March 23, 1906, the owner of a large estate, consisting mostly of valuable lands, city and farm property. The will was executed January 17, 1898, and on April 14, 1905, she added a codicil. The preamble or introductory clause of the will reads as follows:

"I, Elizabeth S. Shall, of the city of Little Rock, county of Pulaski, State of Arkansas, being in good bodily health and of sound and disposing mind and memory, calling to mind the frailty and uncertainty of human life, and being desirous of settling my worldly affairs and directing how the estate with which it has pleased God to bless me, shall be disposed after my decease, while I have strength and capacity so to do, do make and publish this, my last will and testament, hereby revoking and making null and void all other last wills and testaments, by me heretofore made; * * * as to my worldly estate and all the property, real, personal or mixed, of which I shall die seized and possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my decease, I devise, bequeath and dispose thereof in the manner following, to-wit:—"

In item 1 the testatrix gave to appellant, D. F. S. Galloway, who was her grandnephew, her home in the city of Little Rock, and all its contents, furniture, paintings, silver, etc., horses, carriages, and harness, and also certain other lots of real estate in said city, and a tract of land in Pulaski county containing 180 acres.

In item 2 she gave to her nephew W. A. Galloway two lots in Little Rock, and a certain tract of land in Pulaski county.

In item 3 she gave to her niece Elizabeth S. Darby a farm in Pulaski county known as the "Shall place," containing about 786 acres. The language of that devise is as follows: "I give, devise and bequeath to my niece, Elizabeth S. Darby, the place known as the 'Shall place,' consisting of about 786 acres of land in Pulaski County, State of Arkansas, to-wit:—"(Here follows description.)

In item 4 she gave two lots in the city of Little Rock, and a farm in Pulaski county known as the "Beasley place," to her niece Mary A. Eanes for life, with remainder over to D. F. S. Eanes, a grandnephew of the testatrix.

In item 5 she gave to her said grandnephew D. F. S. Eanes three lots in the city of Little Rock, the property being left in trust to D. F. S. Galloway as trustee for the benefit of said D. F. S. Eanes until the latter should come of age.

In items 6 and 7, respectively, she bequeathed sums of money to a friend and to a certain church in Little Rock.

Item 8 contained the following residuary devise and bequest: "I give, devise and bequeath to my grandnephew, David F. Shall Galloway, all the rest and residue of my estate not hereinbefore specifically devised and bequeathed, whether real, personal or mixed, of which I shall die seized and possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my decease."

After the residuary clause the will reads as follows:

"The property herein devised and bequeathed in items four and five to my grandnephew, David F. Shall Eanes, shall, in the event of his death without issue of his body him surviving, vest in fee-simple in his mother, my niece, Mary A. Eanes, her heirs and assigns.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"All the property herein devised and bequeathed, unless otherwise and specifically stated, shall vest in the devisees, their heirs and assigns in fee simple, and the property devised and bequeathed to my nieces is to be their sole and separate property and free from the control and debts of their said husbands, together with the rents and profits of the same."

By her codicil the testatrix revoked the devise to appellant, D. F. S. Galloway, as to some of the said lots given to him in the will, and devised the same to Elizabeth S. Darby in fee simple. The codicil made certain other changes not material to this controversy. Elizabeth S. Darby died prior to the death of the testatrix, and the controversy in this suit is as to the devolution of the property devised to her in the will and codicil.

It is the contention of appellant that both of the devisees to Elizabeth S. Darby lapsed on account of her death prior to the death of the testatrix, and that that property fell within the residuary clause of the will. The chancellor decided that the devise to Mrs. Darby in the will did not lapse, but went to her children under the terms of the will, and that the devise to Mrs. Darby in the codicil lapsed, but did not fall within the residuary clause, and as to that the testatrix is deemed to have died intestate, and the property descended to her heirs at law. Appellant, D. F. S. Galloway, is not one of the heirs of the testatrix, so, under the decree, he gets none of the property in controversy, and he appealed to this court. W. A. Galloway, the father of D. F. S. Galloway, is one of the heirs, and is a party to this suit. He appealed from that part of the decree which holds that the property devised to Mrs. Darby in the will goes to her children.

[1, 2] The rule is established beyond controversy, except where changed by statute, that a legacy or devise lapses when the legatee or devisee dies before the testator. 17 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 748, and authorities there cited. "The lability of a testamentary gift to failure or as it is generally termed lapse," says Mr. Jarman, "by reason of the decease of its object in the testator's lifetime, is a necessary consequence of the ambulatory nature of wills, which, not taking effect until the death of the testator, can communicate no benefit to persons who previously die." 1 Jarman on Wills (6th Ed.) p. 307. A statute of this state changes that rule as to a legacy or a devise to a child or other descendant of the testator, and provides that it shall not lapse, but that "the property so devised or bequeathed shall vest in the surviving child or other descendant as if such devisee or legatee had survived the testator and died intestate." Kirby's Digest, § 8022.

It is conceded that the devise to Mrs. Darby in the codicil lapsed, as decided by the chancellor, by reason of her death before the death of the testatrix, and the property either falls within the residuary clause of the will, if that clause is broad enough to include it, or descends to the heirs at law of the testatrix, as undisposed of property. That question will be considered later.

It is contended on behalf of appellees that the devise of the Shall place did not lapse, and that it was the intention of the testatrix to substitute the children of Mrs. Darby as devisees in the event of the latter's death before the death of the testatrix. This contention is founded on the general provision in the will that "all the property herein devised and bequeathed, unless otherwise and specifically stated, shall vest in the devisees, their heirs and assigns in fee simple." The argument is that there is presumed an intention not to permit the devise to lapse, and that the word "heirs" should be construed to mean "children," so that a line of succession should be prescribed in order to prevent lapse. There might be more reason for adopting that construction of the provision if it applied only to the devise to Mrs. Darby, but it applies to all of the property devised in the will except when "otherwise and specifically stated," and the fact that the provision is a general one materially weakens the basis for construing the word "heirs" to mean "children." We do not, however, mean to say that such would be the proper construction even if the provision applied only to the devise to Mrs. Darby. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that the words, "their heirs and assigns," were used in a technical sense to denote the character of the estate or extent of the interest to be taken by the devisees—that they are words of limitation, not words of substitution. The aim in construing a will is to correctly arrive at the intention of the testator, but the meaning is to be gathered from the language used. "The question in expounding a will is not what the testator meant, but what is the meaning of his words. The use of the expression that the intention of the testator is to be the guide, unaccompanied with the constant explanation that it is to be sought in his words and a rigorous attention to them, is apt to lead the mind unconsciously to speculate upon what the testator may have been supposed to have intended to say, instead of strictly adhering to the true question, which is what that which he has written means. The will must be expressed in writing, and that writing only is to be considered. And in construing that writing the rule is to read it in the ordinary and grammatical sense of the words, unless some obvious absurdity or some repugnancy or inconsistency with the declared intention of the writer to be extracted from the whole instrument should follow from the reading of it." 2 Williams on Executors, p. 327.

Cases are to be found where the word "heirs" in a will or deed was construed to mean "children." The following are among those cases: Wyman v. Johnson, 68 Ark. 369, 59 S. W. 250; Shirey v. Clark, 72 Ark. 539, 81 S. W. 1057. Other examples are found in the many cases cited by counsel for appellees. But words used in a will must be construed according to the technical legal meaning, unless explanatory words in the context qualify them or give them another meaning, or unless the peculiar situation under which they are used indicate an intention to use them other than in a technical sense. In Moody v. Walker, 3 Ark. 147, this court said: "When technical phrases or terms of art are used, it is fair to presume that the testator understood their meaning, and that they expressed the intention of his will, according to their import and signification. When certain terms or words have by repeated adjudication received a precise, definite, and legal construction, if the testator in making his will use such terms or similar expressions, they shall be construed according to their legal effect; for, if this was not the case, titles to estates would be daily unsettled, to the ruin of thousands." In Johnson v. Knight of Honor, 53 Ark. 255, 13 S. W. 794, 8 L. R. A. 732, in construing the meaning of the word "heirs," the court said: "It is a technical word. When used in any legal instrument, and there is no context to explain it, as in this case, it should be understood in its legal and technical sense." To the same effect, see Myar v. Snow, 49 Ark. 129, 4 S. W. 381. "Though the intention of a testator, when ascertained," says Mr. Jarman, "is implicitly obeyed, however informal the language in which it has been conveyed, yet the courts in construing that language resort to certain established rules by which particular words and expressions, standing unexplained, have obtained a different meaning, which meaning it must be confessed does not always quadrate with their popular acceptance. This results from the enactment of law, which presumes every person to be acquainted with its rules of interpretation, and consequently to use expressions in their legal sense, i. e., in the sense which has been fixed by adjudication to the same expressions occurring under analogous circumstances, a presumption, though it may sometimes have disappointed the intention of a testator, is fraught with great general convenience, for without some acknowledged standard of interpretation it would have been impossible to rely with confidence on the operation of any will not technically expressed until it had received a judicial interpretation." 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 1651. "In seeking for the expressed intention of the testator, his words are to receive that construction and interpretation which a long series of decisions has attached to them, unless it is very certain that they were used in a different sense." 1 Redfield on Wills, 433.

Lord Denman, in Doe v. Gallinle, 5 Barnewall & Adolphus, 621, said: "Technical words, or words of known legal import, must have their legal effect, even though the testator uses inconsistent words, unless those inconsistent words are of such a nature as to make it perfectly clear that the testator did not mean to use the technical words in their proper sense." Mr. Washburn has this to say on that subject: "On the other hand, 'heirs' may have sometimes meant the same as 'child' or 'children.' That the testator intended to use it thus must be clear and something more than implication. Otherwise, it is a word of limitation." 2 Washburn on Real Property, p. 603. Judge Sharswood, speaking for the court in Doebl's Appeal, 64 Pa. 9, said: "While the intention of the testator, if consistent with law, is undoubtedly to be the polar star, yet we are bound to take as our guides those general rules or canons of interpretation which have been adopted and followed by those who have gone before us. It becomes no man and no court to be wise above that which is written. Security of titles requires that no mere arbitrary discretion should be exercised in conjecturing what words the testator would have used, or what form of disposition he would have adopted had he been truly advised as to the legal effect of the words actually employed. That would be to make a will for him, instead of construing that which he has made."

This rule of construction has been universally adopted by judges and law writers. The exceptions to it are, as above stated, found in cases where there are qualifying words in the context, which shows that a technical meaning was not intended, or the peculiar circumstances under which the words were used demonstrate clearly that they were meant otherwise than in the technical sense. In the present instance there is nothing to indicate that the term, "heirs and assigns," was used otherwise than in the technical sense as words of limitation. There are numerous authorities holding that the word "heirs" in a will is a word of limitation, and not of substitution, and that the use of it, following the name of the devisee, does not prevent a lapse in the event of the latter's death before that of the testator. Mr. Jarman has this to say on that subject: "The doctrine applies indiscriminately to gifts with and gifts without words of limitation. Thus if a devise be made to A. and his heirs, * * * or to A. and the heirs of his body, and A. died in the lifetime of the testator, the devise absolutely lapses." 1 Jarman on Wills, p. 307. "For the word 'heirs' in such cases," says Mr. Underhill, "gives the heirs no interest under the will, but it is merely a word of limitation, showing what interest the ancestor was to take in case he should survive the testator." 1 Underhill on Wills, p. 436. Mr. Redfield states the same rule as follows: "The general presumption being that these terms of succession are used to mark the extent of the interest thus intended to be conveyed to the legatee or devisee, and are therefore words of limitation merely." 2 Redfield on Wills, 160.

The same rule is stated in numerous authorities in support cited in 18 Am. & Eng. Enc. of Law, p. 754. See, also, Jackson v. Alsop, 67 Conn. 249, 34 Atl. 1106; Maxwell v. Featherston, 83 Ind. 339; Keniston v. Adams, 80 Me. 290, 14 Atl. 203; Kimball v. Story, 108 Mass. 382; Wood v. Seaver, 158 Mass. 411, 33 N. E. 587; Hand v. Marcy, 28 N. J. Eq. 59; Kimball v. Chappel (Sup.) 18 N. Y. Supp. 30; In the matter of Wells, 113 N. Y. 396, 21 N. E. 137, 10 Am. St. Rep. 457; Moss v. Helsley, 60 Tex. 426. In the case of Watson v. Wolff-Goldman Realty Co., 95 Ark. 18, 128 S. W. 581, Ann. Cas. 1912A, 540, it was urged that the use of the words "and assigns forever," enlarged the estate, which otherwise would have been restricted by the use of the words "bodily heirs." But this court held, following other decisions cited in the opinion, that the word "assigns" was to be construed in a technical sense, and that it only imported "that the estate may be transferred, and cannot operate to enlarge the grant or defeat its express limitations."

Our conclusion, therefore, is that the devise to Mrs. Darby in the will lapsed, and that the property, the same as that devised in the codicil, either fell within the residuary clause or descended to the heirs at law of the testatrix.

[3] The remaining question relates to the devolution of the property described in the lapsed devise to Mrs. Darby. Did it fall within the clause giving the residuum of the estate to appellant D. F. S. Galloway? The residuary clause is general in its terms, and covers all property of every kind not otherwise disposed of in the will. At common law there was a distinction made, with respect to the operation of the residuary clause of a will, between bequests of personalty and devises of real property, the English courts holding that lapsed legacies fell into the residuum, unless otherwise directed in the will itself; but that a devise of real estate did not go to the residuary devisee. This rule was based upon another distinction arbitrarily made by the English courts that as to personalty a will was deemed to speak from the date it took effect—i. e., from the date of the testator's death—and therefore included property acquired by the testator after the execution of the will, but that, as to real estate, the will was deemed to speak only from the date of its execution, and did not include after-acquired property. The rule of the common law has been changed in England by the Statute of Victoria (1837), and in most of the American states, so as to completely sweep away the old distinction between bequests of personality and devises of real property, and make a will speak from the date of the testator's death and convey after-acquired real estate as well as personalty; and, where those statutes have been put into effect, the rulings have been that lapsed legacies and devises fall into the residuary clause, unless a contrary intention on the part of the testator is expressed in the will. The rule and its changes are very clearly stated in the following excerpt from the opinion of the Indiana Supreme Court: "It is said, however, that there exists an important distinction between a void or lapsed bequest of personal estate and a void or lapsed devise of real estate, which obtains both in England and America in this: That the former falls into the residue, and the latter goes to the heirs. The reason generally assigned for such distinction has been the different operations of a will upon personal and real estate. It is said that as to personal estate the will would operate upon all the personal estate held by the testator at the time of his death; while as to his real estate the testator could only devise such as he owned at the time of his will. It is certain, we think, that the reason thus given for the supposed distinction has long since ceased to exist, if it ever existed in this state. Here the testator's will of personal estate must be executed with precisely the same solemnity and formality as the will devising real estate; and there is no perceptible or practical difference in the operation of a will upon personal and upon real estate." Holbrook v. McCleary, 72 Ind. 167. And the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, speaking through Justice Dewey, gives the following explanation of the changes in the law on the subject: "With us all ground for any such distinction has long since been done away with. Our whole system since the enactment of the Revised Statutes (chapter 62, section 3) has been to carry out the principle that devises of real estate and legacies of personal estate were to be placed substantially upon the same footing as to the extent of the power to devise and the formalities required in the execution of the testamentary instrument." Thayer v. Wellington, 91 Mass. (9 Allen) 283, 85 Am. Dec. 753. For other cases announcing the same changes in the law, see Molineaux v. Reynolds, 55 N. J. Eq. 189, 36 Atl. 276; Estate of Upham, 127 Cal. 90, 59 Pac. 315; Drew v. Wakefield, 54 Me. 291; Reeves v. Reeves, 5 Lea (Tenn.) 653; Youngs v. Youngs, 45 N. Y. 254; Jackson v. Alsop, 67 Conn. 249, 34 Atl. 1106; West v. West, 59 Ind. 529. We have no statute on this subject specifically abolishing the rule of the common law as to the distinction in the operation of wills between personalty and real estate. But in the case of Patty v. Goolsby, 51 Ark. 61, 9 S. W. 846, it was decided that the course of legislation here has swept away all distinctions, and that a will is deemed to speak from the date of the testator's death as to real estate as well as to personality and carries after-acquired property, both real and personal. In that case the court, speaking through Special Justice Sol. F. Clark, said: "We are not aware that the question has ever been directly before this court, nor has there been any legislation in this state in terms changing or abolishing the English law on the subject. But a course of legislation was adopted at an early date wholly inconsistent with it, and which has certainly swept away the principles or grounds upon which the rule has ever been understood to be predicated. * * * Considering the great changes in the policy as well as the formalities in alienating and assuring title to real estate as to what they were when the English rule on this subject originated and prevailed, we cannot see, notwithstanding the common law has never been changed by any positive statute, any reason why a will should not speak from the death of the testator as to real as well as personal estate, and we are therefore of the opinion, and so hold, that the testator being seised and possessed of said lands at the time of his death they were included in his will and were conveyed thereby." That decision established here a state of the law similar to that of other jurisdictions where changes in the common law on this subject have been brought about by express statutory enactments. It necessarily and logically follows from the application of the principles there announced that lapsed devises of real estate fall into the general residuary clause, unless a contrary intention of the testator is clearly expressed in the will.

[4] It is insisted with much earnestness that the rule announced in Patty v. Goolsby, supra, was mere dictum, and should not be binding on us now as a precedent. We cannot agree with counsel that the opinion on that point is obiter dictum. That particular question was elaborately argued in the brief on one side, and seems to have been carefully considered by the court. If the court had reached a different conclusion upon that question of law, it would have been decisive of the issue between the parties. In other words, the case could have turned entirely upon the decision of that question. Therefore, it cannot be regarded as dictum merely because it was found necessary to consider another question in consequence of the conclusion reached by the court on that question. Besides, the case was a carefully considered one, and has undoubtedly become a rule of property in this state. We decline to overrule it or to discredit it.

[5] Now, turning to the question of lapsed legacies at common law, which must now be considered as the established rule also as to devises of real estate, we find little, if any, conflict in the authorities. "A residuary gift of personal estate," says Mr. Jarman, "carries, not only everything not in terms disposed of, but everything that in any event turns out not to be well disposed of. A presumption raises for the residuary legatee as against every one except the particular legatee, for the testator is supposed to give his personality away from the former only for the sake of the latter. It has been said that to take a bequest of the residue out of the general rule very special words are required, and accordingly a residuary bequest of property 'not specifically given' following various specific and general legacies will include lapsed specific legacies." 2 Jarman on Wills, p. 716. The rule sustained by a long list of adjudged cases is thus stated by the Cyclopedists of the Law: "The residuary clause passes all the property of the testator that is not otherwise disposed of by the will, unless the words used show an intention to exclude from the operation of the residuary clause some part of the estate; it being the rule that a residuary clause will be liberally construed to prevent intestacy. This includes property acquired after the will was made, if it appears that the testator intended his will to operate on after-acquired property, and legacies and devises that lapse or otherwise fail for any reason." 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 724. In Lovering v. Lovering, 129 Mass. 97, the court said: "A general residuary gift carries all property which is not otherwise disposed of by the will, and includes lapsed legacies and all void legacies. In this case the residuary gift was 'all the rest, residue and remainder of my estate, real and personal, of every nature and description.' The fact that he specifies certain remainders and reversions as included in the general description does not limit or narrow it." In the Matter of L'Hommedieu, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 10, the following statement of the rule is given: "It is a settled rule of construction that a residuary clause carries all which is not legally disposed of by the will, unless a contrary intention is manifest by the will itself. Such an intention cannot be deduced from the mere absence of words or that the testator failed to provide for the contingency upon which the lapse was occasioned. A testator is supposed to have given away from the residuary legatee only for the sake of the particular legatee." Authorities need not be multiplied on this point.

It is argued that the language of the will prevents the operation of the residuary clause as a general one, and evinces a specific intention on the part of the testatrix not to include lapsed legacies. Counsel invoke a strict construction of the language of the residuary clause on the ground that a presumption should not be indulged of an intention on the part of the testator to cut the heirs off from the lapsed devises, unless the intention is made clear by the language of the will. While it is sometimes said that an intention to disinherit lawful heirs is not to be presumed, in the absence of clear and explicit language to that effect, yet there are other presumptions not to be overlooked. In the construction of wills there is always a presumption against partial intestacy, unless such an intention clearly appears from the language used in the instrument. Booe v. Vinson, 149 S. W. 524; 2 Redfield on Wills, 116. The presumption against intended intestacy leads to a liberal, rather than to a restrictive, construction of the residuary clause in the will, in order to prevent partial intestacy. "Where the language of the residuary clause is ambiguous," says the New York court, "the leaning of the courts is in favor of a broad rather than a restricted construction. It prevents intestacy, which it is reasonable to suppose testators do not contemplate, and, if the mind is left in doubt upon the whole will as to the actual testamentary intention, a broad rather than a strict construction seems more likely to meet the testamentary purpose, because such a clause is usually inserted to provide for contingencies or lapses, and to cover whatever is left, after satisfying specific and special purposes of the testator manifested in the other clauses of the will." Lamb v. Lamb, 131 N. Y. 234, 30 N. E. 134. This presumption is greatly strengthened by the language of the will and of its provisions, taken as a whole. The emphatic language used evinces a clear intention to cover all of the testator's property. The preamble reads thus: "As to my worldly estate and all the property, real, personal or mixed, of which I shall die seized and possessed, or to which I shall be entitled at the time of my decease, I devise, bequeath and dispose thereof in the manner following, to wit:" In 1 Underhill on Wills, § 464, this pertinent statement of the law on the subject is found: "The rule is that the testator's intention is to be ascertained from the whole will. If, therefore, the testator in the introduction expresses an intention of disposing of all of his estate as when he says 'I give and devise all of my worldly goods,' it should be considered. The presumption arises that, having the disposition of his whole estate in view, he did not intend to die intestate as to any part of it. If his subsequent language may be construed in either of two ways, by one of which a complete disposition will be made of his whole estate, and by the other only a partial disposition will be made, resulting in a partial intestacy, the introductory statement pointing to a complete disposition ought to be considered, and that sense adopted which will result in a disposition of the whole estate. Hence it follows that language which in a general or residuary clause may not alone be sufficiently conclusive to dispose of all the property of the testator may have its meaning enlarged to correspond with an intention shown in the introductory clause."

Mr. Redfield states the same conclusion as follows: "The courts have for a long time inclined very decidedly against adopting any construction of wills which would result in partial intestacy unless absolutely forced upon them. This has been done partly as a rule of policy perhaps, but mainly as one calculated to carry into effect the presumed intention of the testator, for the fact of making the will raises a very strong presumption against any expectation or desire on the part of the testator of leaving any portion of his estate beyond the operation of the will. Hence, where a general residuary bequest was accompanied with expressions affording a more limited construction, and pointed only to a particular surplus beyond the properties specifically mentioned, it was nevertheless held to pass the residuum of his property at the time of his decease as well that which he held at the date of his will as that afterwards acquired. Lord Eldon here said that it was the general rule in regard to residuary bequests to avoid partial intestacy, and that it required very special words to confine a residuary bequest to the property belonging to the testator at the date of his will." 2 Redfield on Wills, p. 116. The words of the residuary clause, "not hereinbefore specifically devised," do not overcome the presumed intention to include lapsed devises. That phrase must be construed with reference to the time that the will speaks, and, when so considered, it refers to valid devises or those which finally take effect under the will, but does not exclude from the residuum lapsed devises or those which are void when the will takes effect. "In all these cases of lapsed or void legacies," says the Massachusetts court, "or a legacy that fails for want of using proper language to create the same, or to designate the legatee, all of which are uniformly held to pass to the residuary devisee, the testator had no purpose in his mind at the time of executing his will to pass such an estate to the residuary devisee. 'It is not necessary that the testator's mind should be active in including it.' Goodright v. Downshire, 2 B. & P. 600. The contrary intention of the testator spoken of in the books, as that which will prevent such legacy going to the residuary devisee, is something more than the fact that the testator supposed that he had made a valid legacy to someone of a portion of his estate, but which the court held void and inoperative." Thayer v. Wellington, supra. In the following cases use of the same words, in substance, were held not to take lapsed devises out of the operation of the residuary clause: Roberts v. Cook, 16 Ves. Jr. 451; Brown v. Higgs, 4 Ves. Jr. 709; In re L'Hommiedieu, 32 Hun (N. Y.) 10; Tindall's Executors v. Tindall, 24 N. J. Eq. 512; Riker v. Cornwell, 113 N. Y. 123, 20 N. E. 602.

The conclusion is inevitable, if the principles above announced are to be considered as controlling, that the property included in the lapsed devise to Mrs. Darby fell within the general residuary clause of the will and passed to appellant, D. F. S. Gallo-way.

Objection is made to the jurisdiction of the chancery court upon the original complaint of appellant, but inasmuch as the allegations of the cross-complaint are confessedly sufficient to give the court jurisdiction, and having taken jurisdiction for any purpose, the court will completely settle the rights of the parties in the subject-matter of the controversy.

The decree is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded, with direction to dismiss the cross-complaint of appellees, and to quiet the title of appellant to all the property in controversy.

JENKINS v. QUICK.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 2, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 201*)—OBJECTION BELOW—STATEMENT BY COURT—EVIDENCE.

Where, in replevin to recover a horse traded on condition that plaintiff could reclaim it unless defendant's horse was as represented, no objection was made to the court's statement that plaintiff's replevin affidavit which stated that defendant obtained possession of the horse by false pretenses had nothing to do with the trade contract, such objection could not be considered on review.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1251-1257; Dec. Dig. § 201.*]

2. TRIAL (§ 244*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SINGLING OUT EVIDENCE.

It was not error in replevin to refuse an instruction stating and emphasizing for what purpose plaintiff's replevin affidavit could be considered in evidence; it being improper to single out particular testimony, and direct the jury to consider it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 577-581; Dec. Dig. § 244.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 392*)—IMPEACHMENT—STATEMENTS IN REPLEVIN AFFIDAVIT.

Plaintiff's replevin affidavit stating that defendant obtained possession of the horse by false pretenses was not relevant evidence where plaintiff did not deny making it; it having no tendency to controvert plaintiff's contention that the trade contract under which defendant claimed the horse was a conditional one.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1249-1251, 1257; Dec. Dig. § 392.*]

4. TRIAL (§ 260*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTS COVERED BY CHARGE.

In replevin for a horse traded to defendant on condition that plaintiff could reclaim it if defendant's horse were not as represented, an instruction to consider only whether defendant's horse possessed certain desirable qualities then mentioned, and whether she failed to possess certain undesirable qualities then mentioned, and that any captious objection by plaintiff could not be pertinent, was sufficiently covered by an instruction that plaintiff could not recover if defendant merely guaranteed that he would be responsible in damages, considered with the court's acceptance of defendant's suggestion that the jury could not consider any mere captious objection of plaintiff to the horse he received.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 651-659; Dec. Dig. § 260.*]

5. TRIAL (§ 124*)—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

In replevin for a horse conditionally traded to defendant for a horse which plaintiff claimed was not as represented, it was highly improper for plaintiff's counsel to state in his closing argument that any man who would commit the crime which the testimony showed the defendant to have committed against the plaintiff ought to be in the penitentiary, especially where defendant was an important witness in his own behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. § 302; Dec. Dig. § 124.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 133*)—CURE OF ERROR—ARGUMENT OF COUNSEL.

Such argument was harmless, however, where the court sustained an objection, and directed the jury not to consider it, and the attorney apologized to the jury, and withdrew the statement.

Appeal from Circuit Court, White County; Hance N. Hutton, Judge.

Action by T. J. Quick against Harold Jenkins. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. Brundidge, of Searcy, for appellant. J. N. Rachels, of Searcy, and John E. Miller, for appellee.

WOOD, J. The appellee sued appellant in replevin to recover the possession of a horse. His affidavit set up the allegation of ownership, and the usual statutory requirements. Appellant denied the allegations of the plaintiff, and set up that he had sold the horse obtained from the appellee, and that he was not in the possession thereof at the time the suit was brought. The contention of the appellee was that he had traded horses with the appellant on condition that if the mare obtained from appellant in exchange for the horse of appellee possessed certain qualities which appellant guaranteed her to possess, or if appellee was not satisfied with her, that he should be permitted to rue the trade. Appellee testified that the appellant in making the trade said to the appellee, concerning the mare: "If you are not satisfied with her and she don't do what I say, you come back, and I will give you the horse back." The testimony of appellee tended to prove that the mare was unsatisfactory to him, and that he attempted to have appellant take her back, but that appellant refused. On the other hand, it was contended by appellant, and the evidence in his behalf tended to prove, that he traded his mare for appellee's horse, and that the trade was in no manner a conditional one.

[1] During the progress of the trial, the court permitted the appellant to introduce an affidavit of the appellee made before the justice of the peace before whom the suit was instituted, in which the appellee charged that the appellant "did obtain of affiant the possession of one horse of the value of $150 by false pretenses." When appellant offered the affidavit, the court remarked: "You can introduce the affidavit if you want to, but it will not have anything to do with the contract between these parties as to the horse trade." The appellant did not except to this remark of the court.

[2] The appellant offered the following prayer for an instruction, which the court refused, to wit: "If you find from the testimony that, after the consummation of the trade between the plaintiff and defendant, the plaintiff executed an affidavit in which he charged the defendant with having obtained a horse from the plaintiff under false pretenses, that this is a circumstance which the jury may take into consideration in determining the question as to whether or not the trade for the horse was conditional or unconditional, and if you believe from the testimony, both direct and circumstantial, that at the time the trade was made the only condition existing between the parties was included in the contract of sale and that in the event the mare should not prove to be as represented, the defendant would make compensation to the plaintiff, then the plaintiff is not entitled to recover in this action, and you will find for the defendant." The appellant contends that the refusal to give this prayer was error. In Railway Co. v. Lyman, 57 Ark. 512, 22 S. W. 170, we held that it was not error to refuse an instruction which singles out a particular class of testimony in the case, and directed the jury to consider it in connection with the other evidence. See, also, Winter v. Bandel et al., 30 Ark. 383; Newton v. State, 37 Ark. 333; Carpenter v. State, 62 Ark. 287, 36 S. W. 900; Western Coal & M. Co. v. Jones, 75 Ark. 86, 87 S. W. 440; Quertermous v. State, 95 Ark. 48, 127 S. W. 951. Appellant did not except to the remark of the court stating that the affidavit did not have anything to do with the contract between the parties, and therefore he cannot complain of this language here. The affidavit was in evidence, and therefore must have been considered by the jury in connection with the other evidence; but the court did not err in refusing an instruction stating and emphasizing for what purpose the affidavit should be considered.

[3] The affidavit was not relevant evidence because the appellee did not deny that he made it, and there was nothing in the affidavit that tended to controvert the contention that the trade between appellant and appellee was a conditional one, as contended by the appellee.

[4] The appellant presented the following prayer for instruction, which the court refused, to wit: "You are instructed that, in determining the question as to whether or not the mare in fact came up to the representations of Mr. Jenkins, they must consider only the question as to whether she possessed certain desirable qualities as then mentioned, or whether she failed to possess certain undesirable qualities as then mentioned, and any captious objection would not be pertinent for them to consider." In its oral charge the court instructed the jury in part as follows: "Mr. Jenkins contends that he guaranteed that this mare had certain qualities, was reliable, and that upon this guaranty he would have been responsible in damages, and, if that was the contract, this action is improperly brought, and should have been brought for damages and not for the possession of the property, but, if the contract was that it was only a conditional sale that Mr. Quick was to complete on trying the horse to see if it had certain qualities, then that would have been a conditional sale, if the horse had not come up to requirements or representations, then Mr. Quick could have demanded the return of his horse." And while the court was delivering his oral charge one of the attorneys for appellant interposed with the following language: "There is some testimony whether the mare in fact came up to the recommendations of Mr. Jenkins, and they must only consider as to whether or not the mare in fact possessed certain desirable qualities, as those mentioned, or whether she failed to possess other undesirable qualities than mentioned, and any captious objection would not be pertinent for them to consider." Whereupon the court responded, "Yes," thereby virtually approving the above language of the attorney as a part of the oral charge. Conceding that the prayer for instruction No. 2 was correct, it was fully covered by the instructions which the court gave, and to which appellant saved no exceptions. It is not error to refuse to grant prayers for instructions, where such prayers are fully covered by other instructions. Chicago Mill & Lumber Co. v. Ross, 99 Ark. 597, 139 S. W. 632; Williams v. State, 100 Ark. 218, 139 S. W. 1119; St. L., I. M. & S. Ry. Co. v. Aiken, 100 Ark. 437, 140 S. W. 698.

[5] In the closing argument counsel for appellee used the following language: "I want to say that any man who would commit the crime which I believe Harold Jenkins has committed against Uncle Tom Quick as shown by the testimony in this cause ought to be in the penitentiary."

[6] Upon objection being made, the court sustained the objection, and directed the jury not to consider the statement. The attorney for the appellee thereupon apologized to the jury, and withdrew the statement. The remarks, although only the expression of the opinion of counsel, were highly improper, and tended to reflect upon the integrity of one of the parties, who was also an important witness in the case. But the conduct of the court in sustaining the objection to the language and in directing the jury not to consider it, and the conduct of offendincounsel in apologizing and withdrawing the improper statement, was sufficient to remove any prejudice that might have otherwise been created in the minds of the jury.

Finding no reversible error, the judgment is affirmed.

VILLINES v. STATE.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. COSTS (§ 316*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTIONS—JUDGMENT—AMENDMENT.

As under Kirby's Dig. § 2446, providing that in case of conviction there shall be a judgment for costs against accused, no discretion is allowed the trial court, a judgment of conviction may after the expiration of the term at which it was rendered be amended nunc pro tunc so as to require accused to pay the costs.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Costs, Cent. Dig. §§ 1143, 1144; Dec. Dig. § 316.*]

2. MOTIONS (§ 54*)—NUNC PRO TUNC ORDERS—EFFECT.

A nunc pro tunc order necessarily relates back to the date as of which it should have been entered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Motions, Cent. Dig. § 65; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. PARDON (§ 9*)—EFFECT—"COSTS."

An absolute pardon will not excuse one convicted of crime from the payment of "costs," for they are neither fines nor forfeitures, and are not imposed by way of punishment, and hence a complete pardon granted one convicted of crime cannot be interposed to defeat a nunc pro tunc order amending the judgment, so as to impose on accused the burden of paying the costs.

Appeal from Circuit Court, Searcy County; G. W. Reed, Judge.

Joseph Villines was convicted of voluntary manslaughter, and after his complete pardon by the Governor the court entered a nunc pro tunc order amending the original judgment so as to provide that he should pay the costs of his conviction, and accused appeals. Affirmed.

The defendant was convicted on the 6th day of October, 1911, at an adjourned term of the Searcy circuit court, of the crime of voluntary manslaughter, and his punishment assessed by the jury at imprisonment in the penitentiary for a period of two years. The judgment of the court, pronounced upon this verdict, sentenced the defendant to imprisonment in the penitentiary for that period of time, but it was silent upon the question of the costs of the conviction and did not provide that these costs should be paid by the defendant, and that their payment should be enforced against him. Later, and at a subsequent term of the same court, a motion was filed by the prosecuting attorney for a nunc pro tunc order, amending the original judgment to provide that defendant should pay the costs of his conviction, and payment thereof should be enforced against him.

The defendant prayed an appeal from the judgment of the court sentencing him to the penitentiary, but before the appeal had been perfected the Governor of the state granted him a full pardon from this sentence. The petition for the nunc pro tunc order was heard and granted by the court after the pardon had been issued by the Governor. Evidence was offered at the hearing of the petition, the effect of which was to show that, upon pronouncing the sentence, the presiding judge made no order in regard to the costs; although in explaining his action, in amending the original judgment, he said it was his intention that a judgment for costs should be entered such as was usually entered in these cases.

Guy L. Trimble, of Harrison, for appellant. Hal L. Norwood, Atty. Gen., and Wm. H. Rector, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

SMITH, J. (after stating the facts as above). [1] Upon overruling the motion for a new trial, the law prescribed the judgment that should be entered as follows: "In judgments against the defendant, a judgment for cost in addition to the other punishments, shall be rendered, which shall be taxed by the clerk for the benefit of officers rendering services and in case of failure by defendant to pay said costs they shall be paid by the county where the conviction is had." Kirby's Digest, § 2446. No other judgment can be entered up by the court, as no discretion is allowed under the law, and it is immaterial what the judge might have said or omitted to say in pronouncing sentence. The law imposes the burden of paying cost as an incident to conviction, and the judgment is not properly entered of record until it is so provided. It is true here that this nunc pro tunc order was not made until after the expiration of the term at which the conviction was secured, but there is no objection to this being done. In the case of Thurman v. State, 54 Ark. 120, 15 S. W. 84, where the defendant had escaped and was absent several years and was recaptured and sentence formally pronounced by the court in which the conviction was had, Judge Cockrill, speaking for the court, said: "The statute does not require that the sentence shall be pronounced and judgment entered at the same term at which a plea of guilty is entered, and the entering of the judgment at a subsequent term does not alter or conflict with anything done by the court at the previous term. There is therefore no lack of power in the court, and the judgment may be deferred until a subsequent term." The appellant insists that, at the hearing of the petition for a nunc pro tunc order, they made a showing, which was practically undisputed, that the presiding judge in pronouncing judgment made no order in regard to the costs, and, in view of this omission, could not, after the expiration of the term at which that judgment was pronounced, enlarge its scope by inserting a provision which it should have contained in the first instance; and in support of this contention quotes the following language used by Judge Frauenthal in deciding the case of Railway v. Bratton, 93 Ark. 234, 124 S. W. 752: "The entry in the record should correspond with the judgment which was actually pronounced, and the court has the power, and it is its duty, even at a subsequent term, to make such changes in the entry as to make it conform to the truth. But where the judgment expresses the entire judicial action taken at the time of its rendition, the court has no authority, after the expiration of the term, to enlarge or diminish it in matters of substance, or in any matter affecting the merits. Under the guise of an amendment, there is no authority to revise a judgment, or to correct a judicial mistake, or to adjudicate a matter which might have been considered at the time of the trial, or to grant an additional relief which was not in the contemplation of the court at the time the judgment was rendered. 'The authority of a court to amend its record by a nunc pro tunc order is to make it speak the truth, but not to make it speak what it did not speak, but ought to have spoken.'" A part of the above language being quoted from the opinion by Judge Cockrill in the case of Hershy v. Baer, 45 Ark. 240.

In the Bratton Case, above cited, the administrator had recovered a judgment against the defendant railway company for killing his intestate, but the judgment entered did not recite that the sum recovered should be a lien against the railway and its equipment, and the plaintiff insisted that the judgment should be amended at the subsequent term of the court, at which his motion was heard, to give him the benefit of the lien to which he was entitled upon the entry of his original judgment. The court made the order as prayed, and upon the appeal Judge Frauenthal used the language above quoted; but the order and the action of the trial court in amending the judgment in the administrator's favor and awarding him a lien by a nunc pro tunc order was reversed, and it was further said in the same opinion: "In the case at bar, the plaintiff was entitled, upon a recovery of the damages for which he sued, to have a lien upon the property of defendant, and under certain circumstances of the case to have that lien mentioned in the judgment. But he was not entitled to have such lien under any and all circumstances of the case; he was not entitled to the lien in the event the suit had not been brought within one year after the claim had accrued. He was therefore not entitled to the lien necessarily and as a matter of course. Section 6662 of Kirby's Digest provides that the lien mentioned in the preceding section shall not be effective unless suit is brought upon the claim within one year after said claim shall have accrued. Before, therefore, a judgment could have been declared for said lien, it must first be found that the suit was brought within the time specified in the above section. In order to declare and mention said lien in the judgment, it was necessary that the court itself should make a finding and then an adjudication, and, if no such finding and adjudication was actually made by the court, the omission cannot now be supplied by an amendment of the judgment. For such amendment did not speak the truth, but did speak what should have been done, but was not." This case is not like the Bratton Case for the reason that no finding is necessary to be made to determine whether the defendant should be liable for the costs. The law fixes that liability as a consequence flowing necessarily and of course from his conviction.

In the case of In re Jones, 100 Ark. 231, 140 S. W. 24, which was a habeas corpus proceeding to take Eunice Jones from the custody of the county convict contractor because the judgment for the fine against him did not direct that, in default of its payment, the defendant be imprisoned until the fine and costs were paid, it being contended that he had never been committed to jail within the meaning of the law, because of that omission, but the court said: "This contention is without merit. The law requires that, 'where the punishment of an offense is by fine, the judgment shall direct that the defendant be imprisoned until the fine and costs are paid,' etc. Kirby's Digest, § 2443. And such direction should have been included in said judgment against Jones, in default of payment of the fine levied. Its omission, however, did not render the judgment void; it was a clerical misprision which could have been corrected even after the expiration of the term." See, also, the case of Bobo v. State, 40 Ark. 229.

[2, 3] It is also urged that the defendant had been pardoned at the time the nunc pro tunc order was made, and that there was no felony conviction out of which his obligation to pay costs could arise, and that the order was erroneous for that reason. But the nunc pro tunc order necessarily related back to the date as of which it should have been entered, and the pardon has the effect, and no other, that it would have had if the judgment with proper recitals had been entered at the time of the trial and the pardon had been subsequently granted by the Governor. The effect of such a pardon is discussed in the case of Edwards v. State, 12 Ark. 123, where the defendant had been sentenced to the penitentiary for manslaughter, but had been granted an absolute pardon by the Governor. After an execution was issued to the sheriff for the costs of the prosecution, he applied to the circuit court to quash the execution, exhibiting his pardon and claiming that it released him from the payment of the costs. The court said: "Costs are neither fines nor forfeitures, nor are they imposed by way of punishment or as amercement at common law, but by way of sequence to every judgment whether in civil or criminal cases as a matter of common justice to the parties complainant, witnesses, and officers of the court, although the judgment is in favor of the complainant alone. Costs then partaking, in no respect, of the nature either of punishment or of guilt, are without the sphere of the legitimate legal operation of a pardon, however general in its terms."

In the case of Ex parte Purcell, 61 Ark. 17, 31 S. W. 738, which was a petition for a writ of habeas corpus where petitioner had been convicted of simple assault and fined $50, a pardon was granted, "absolving him from the payment of said sum of $50 of the said judgment and all the effect and consequences thereof." The clerk of the court issued execution for the collection of the costs, and defendant was placed in jail, and the chancellor on hearing the petition refused to order his release until the costs were discharged. Upon appeal the court held that the chancellor erred in refusing the relief prayed by the defendant, but in doing so quoted and approved the Edwards Case, above cited, and expressed these views upon the subject of civil liability for costs where pardon had been granted by the Governor: "It appears that one of the reasons why a general pardon cannot exonerate the criminal from the payment of costs is that they go and belong to individuals, and not the public. Logically then a general pardon extends to all the judgment that the public has an interest in, but not to that part in which individuals only are interested. Upon reason, then, we think a general pardon exonerates from the payment of the fine proper, because that is a public concern, and for the same reason it takes away the criminal character of the judgment for the costs—the imprisonment part—leaving the civil obligation still resting upon the delinquent to be enforced as other civil obligations."

Judgment affirmed.

REEVES v. MOORE et al.

(Supreme Court of Arkansas. Dec. 9, 1912.)

1. LOGS AND LOGGING (§ 3*)—SALE OF TIMBER—VALIDITY—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action by the grantee of timber rights to enjoin his grantor from preventing the removal of such timber and for reformation of the contract, where the grantor asked a cancellation on the ground of fraud, evidence held to show that the grantee was entitled to the timber on the property specifically described in the contract, but to no more; the contract not having been obtained by fraud of plaintiff, and defendant not having made the claimed representations as to the accretions to the land described so as to estop him from denying that he owned them when the contract was made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Logs and Logging, Cent. Dig. §§ 6-12; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

2. BOUNDARIES (§ 46*)—AGREEMENTS—SCOPE.

While, when there is dispute as to the true location of a boundary line, the parties may, by parol, fix a line which will, when followed by possession, be conclusive between them, the grantee of timber rights on defendant's land which had been added to by accretions cannot demand that the accretions to which he is entitled, defendant having purchased adjoining property, shall be determined according to the boundary for such adjoining property, fixed by defendant and its then owner by parol at a time prior to the formation of the accretions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 212-226, 249-251; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

3. NAVIGABLE WATERS (§ 44*)—DIVISION.

In case of accretions where the shore line is not irregular, they should be apportioned by giving to each section a proportion of the outer boundary line of the accretions in the ratio that the old shore line, on the particular section, bore to the whole of the old shore line, and though the main stream has gone west of the new shore line, leaving only a chute dividing the accretions from a former island in the river, the measurements must be made from such chute as the new shore line.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1033*)—PERSONS ENTITLED TO ALLEGE ERROR.

One complaining of a decree cannot take advantage of errors which are in his favor.

Appeal from Lee Chancery Court; Edward D. Robertson, Chancellor.

A bill by W. D. Reeves against John P. Moore and another. From a decree for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jacob Fink, of Helena, P. D. McCulloch, of Marianna, W. W. Hughes, of Forrest City, and Rose, Hemingway, Cantrell & Loughborough, of Little Rock, for appellant. P. R. Andrews, of Helena, and H. F. Roleson, of Marianna, for appellees.

SMITH, J. Appellant, who was the plaintiff below, filed his complaint in the chancery court of Lee county on September 12, 1907, and alleged: That on April 4, 1899, he and the defendant John P. Moore entered into a contract, whereby, for the consideration of \$600, the said Moore sold and conveyed to plaintiff the privilege of cutting and removing from his land at Walnut Bend, Ark., the ash, cypress, cottonwood, oak, walnut, and sycamore timber on certain described lands and the accretions thereto; the lands being described as follows: The S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ and the S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of the S. E. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 6; sections 7, 8, and 17 and accretions thereto; and section 9; and the E. $\frac{1}{2}$ of S. W. $\frac{1}{4}$ of section 9—all in township 2, range 6. The contract further provided that this privilege and sale by agreement is to continue for the term of five years, but the right to cut and remove the timber was to cease at the end of five years. That later, for the additional consideration of \$100, the contract was amended to include the elm trees. The amendment was dated December 7, 1899. Plaintiff further alleged: That, being unable to remove the timber within the prescribed time, he entered into another contract with the said Moore under date of June 8, 1901, whereby, for an additional consideration of \$250, he bought the privilege of cutting and removing from the lands described in the first contract, above mentioned, all the young sapling cottonwood trees, and in addition there was given 10 years' time in which to cut and remove the young cottonwood saplings, and the other contract was extended to expire 10 years from the said 8th day of June, 1911. That the contracts were recorded, although they were never acknowledged. That in making the contracts Moore represented that the accretions embraced a certain tract of land, which, subsequently, was adjudged to belong to one Dan Martin, in a suit for its possession, determined in the Lee county circuit court and also the accretions to section 20 and the accretions south of sections 21 and 22 to the river. That, since selling said timber to the plaintiff, the said Moore has procured a deed to the lands last above described from one Dan Martin and is now attempting to set up his newly acquired title against his timber deed to the plaintiff. That all of the title which Moore had acquired by his deed from Martin inures to the plaintiff's benefit. The complaint further alleged that the said Moore had entered into a fraudulent conspiracy with his son and codefendant, Frierson Moore, whereby, for a fictitious consideration of \$40,000, the said Moore had conveyed all of the land in controversy and had caused his deed therefor to be recorded. Plaintiff prayed that defendants be enjoined from conveying or incumbering plaintiff's timber rights, and that the deed to Frierson Moore be set aside as fraudulent, and that the defendant John P. Moore be required to give plaintiff a deed properly acknowledged to the end that it might be recorded.

On September 18, 1907, plaintiff amended his complaint, alleging that at the time of the execution of the deed to him, set up in the original complaint, Moore was claiming to own the large body of land, contiguous to the lands specifically described, as accretions thereto, and the plaintiff purchased in reliance upon the representations of said Moore; that he owned said lands and was selling the timber thereon; that, by reason of said representations and his reliance upon them, the title acquired by the said Moore in his deed from Martin passed to the plaintiff; that defendant's said purchase inures to plaintiff's benefit; and he prays that he also be decreed to have the right to cut and remove the timber from the lands conveyed by the said Martin to defendant. Defendant John P. Moore answered, denying any understanding as to the extent of the accretions referred to in the contract, or that any part of sections 20, 21, and 22 was included in the agreement; that all the lands in said section were acquired by him subsequent to his agreement with plaintiff; and that he made no representations to the plaintiff that anything in sections 20 or 21 or the accretions thereto was intended to pass by said deeds. And for further answer he said that he conveyed to his son, Frierson Moore, for the actual consideration of $40,000; and that his son had no knowledge of the existence of the timber contract in plaintiff's favor. He further alleged that he was an old man; that the lands were not easily accessible from the city of Helena where he lived; and that he had not been on them for more than 20 years, and knew nothing of the character or value of the timber growing thereon, while the plaintiff was advised and represented to him that there was only a very small amount of timber thereon, and that it was small in size and poor in quality and of little value, and induced him to convey said timber for a trifling part of its actual value; and that like misrepresentations were made by the plaintiff to secure an extension of the time, and an amendment to the contract to include timber not originally included. Defendant tendered back the money which he had received and asked that his contract with plaintiff be canceled. Frierson Moore answered on the same date his father did and denied any knowledge of plaintiff's rights and alleged that he had paid $40,000 for the lands. Plaintiff filed notice of its pendens September 12, 1907.

[1] The record is a voluminous one, but the evidence will be stated briefly. The plaintiff was a sawmill man of wide experience and was successfully operating upon an extensive scale. The defendant John P. Moore was a large landowner and a man of large wealth, but much advanced in age. It appears that to the lands in sections 7, 8, 17, 20, 21, and 22 vast accretions had formed, as to the extent of which neither plaintiff nor defendant appear to have had any very accurate conception at the time of their trade. It further appears that, some years before the first conveyance from Moore to Reeves, a negro man, named Dan Martin, occupied and cleared a tract of land which Mr. Moore claimed to own and for the possession of which he brought suit April 7, 1900; but this suit was determined adversely to him at the fall term of Lee circuit court 1901. Moore's contention before and at trial was that the land occupied by Martin was accretion to his land, while the judgment of the court sustained Martin's contention.

that it was an independent island. It is altogether probable that Reeves had no definite idea of the vastness of his purchase, and it is entirely certain that Moore did not know just what he was selling. The consideration paid proves, in comparison with the value of the timber sold, to have been only nominal, and even that price was not paid in cash. Neither party appears to have been in any need of money, but Reeves executed his note for the entire consideration of $600. None of the witnesses placed the value of the timber at less than $15,000, and one witness claimed to have negotiated a sale at $100,000, which was not consummated because of the controversy about the title. However, to a large extent, this disparity between consideration and value is accounted for by the fact that accretions continued to be made and cottonwood was shown to be a timber of extremely rapid growth and especially so in its sapling stage, and it appears further that in recent years very valuable commercial uses are made of cottonwood timber that was formerly not merchantable, because of its size.

We are not impressed with the contention made by the plaintiff that the defendant made any particular representation as to the lands upon which the timber was conveyed and in reliance upon which plaintiff purchased. In fact plaintiff's contention in this respect, and the securing of 10 additional years, in which to remove the timber after having had nearly two years for that purpose, are the only circumstances which appear to give color to Moore's contention that Reeves knew what he was buying and deceived defendant to his disadvantage.

The chancellor set aside the deed from J. P. Moore to his son, Frierson, and the evidence fully warranted that action. It would be tedious and unprofitable to set out the evidence which leads to that conclusion; but it is reasonably certain that this deed was executed, after Moore had discovered how poor a bargain he had made, for the purpose of avoiding its consequence.

It appears that the trade between Moore and Reeves was the consummation of negotiations pending between Moore and the negro, Dan Martin; that Martin had offered to buy the timber on the accretions to Moore's "Diamond Place," which are the lands described as being in sections 6, 7, 8, 17, and 9, there being no accretions, however, to sections 6 and 9; that Martin had no money and wanted to buy the timber by the thousand, but Moore appears to have disliked Martin and to have been distrustful of him and refused to sell the timber, except for $600 in cash. Martin, after several unsuccessful attempts to raise the money from other parties, finally applied to Mr. Reeves to either advance him the money or to buy the timber and let him log it. Both Moore and Reeves testified that the trade which was closed by the first contract was the identical one which Martin had attempted to negotiate; Reeves' evidence being that he took Martin's statement absolutely and that he had no information, except that obtained from him. But he does say that Mr. Moore, in pointing out the lands on his map, swept his hands across the map to the river, saying that he owned all the lands and accretions indicated by his gesture and which would include all the lands, the timber on which is here sued for. We think this evidence is not sufficient to sustain the allegations of plaintiff's amended complaint that Moore made representations about the extent of his accretions, upon which plaintiff relied and acted, and which defendant cannot therefore now be heard to question. We reach this conclusion because the deed does not describe all the accretions now claimed, because the extent of these accretions has been unknown and their ownership to some extent uncertain; and because Moore denies that he sold any except that described; and because he did not then own all this land, although he may have claimed a part of it; and for the further reason that the description of the lands now claimed by appellant included Dan Martin's own land, and he, of course, had not offered to buy the timber on his own land. Appellant says that, at the time of the first conveyance, Moore claimed to be the owner of the land and claimed it as an accretion to his "Diamond Place." It does appear that he attempted to recover the land from Dan Martin on that theory. As has been stated, he was unsuccessful in his attempt to do so, and we think that the plaintiff is in no position to take advantage of that fact. Accordingly, we hold that Reeves is entitled to the timber on the land specifically described in his contract; but, when that conclusion has been reached, the case is still one of difficulty.

[2] It appears that one Judge T. J. Ashley and a Mr. Beard owned sections 20, 21, and 22 and the accretions thereto, all of which were sold to Mr. Moore, subsequent to the date of the last contract, and that these lands with the "Diamond Place" comprise all the accretions to the main shore. The deed from Martin to Moore conveyed, not only the land which had been adjudged to be an island in the litigation, but also the lands which may have been an accretion to this island.

Appellant insists, and the proof tends to show, that about 1870 a line was run by agreement between Mr. Moore and Judge Ashley, who were then the owners, respectively, of sections 17 and 20 and the accretions thereto. But the evidence as to this line consists of a deposition of Judge Ashley, taken in the case of Moore against Martin and read here as his deposition by the consent of the parties, and it does not fully appear just what the extent and purpose of this line was farther than to mark the point up to which each might clear land; but it is not expressly stated in the deposition that they were apportioning the accretion between them. But, on the contrary, he makes the following statement in regard to the line and its purpose: "Q. Where is the line between your and Moore's land? A. Running from the northwest corner of the original fractional section 20 straight to the river. Q. How was that line established? A. About the year 1870, by Mr. Bailey, as the surveyor of Phillips county at that time. Q. Was there any kind of agreement between you and Mr. Moore? A. (This question was objected to and not answered. And on cross-examination it appears that he testified as follows:) Q. Mr. Ashley, about the line between you and Moore, is it not a fact that there was no agreement at all, except along that Armstead line where he built? Moore cleared up to it on one side and you on the other? A. Yes, sir. Q. You cleared up to a certain line, and you recognized the line, and he recognized it? A. Yes, sir; that is it. There was no other agreement. He cleared up to this line and I cleared up to this line."

The recent case of Malone v. Mobbs, 145 S. W. 193, held that where there is doubt, dispute, or uncertainty as to the true location of a boundary line, the parties may by parol fix a line which will, at least when followed by possession with reference to the boundary so fixed, be conclusive between them, although the possession is not for the full statutory period. We adhere to this rule, but its application is not determinative of the question here considered. True, the case quoted from was one where the accretion were apportioned; but in that case the accretions had entirely formed, and the law permitted and enforced a parol agreement to fix the boundary, because the very purpose of such agreement is to make definite and certain that which is uncertain and in dispute. Here there is no express showing that they were apportioning the accretions between themselves. And it affirmatively appears that at the time of the survey the accretions did not extend more than a half of a mile from their common corner, and a considerable part of this space was taken up by accretions, which were then in process of formation. In the deposition of Judge Ashley, before quoted from, he said: "Q. When you came there in 1870, how far was the river from the line of these sections? A. About one-half of a mile. Q. How far is it down now? A. I expect probably a mile. Q. State what the character of the formation was. That is, how was it formed in the year 1870 till the time you left there? A. Formed by accretion. Q. In what way? A. By gradually making up the land."

At the present time there is land for more than a mile and a half from this common corner; but, if the line which Moore and Ashley agreed upon as a boundary was projected to the river, it would extend for a distance of a mile across land which was not in existence when the line was established, and there would be included the Dan Martin land and what may have been accretions to it. In other words, would include accretions which were probably made to an island. It appears from the record in the suit against Martin that Moore sued for only 85.84 acres; but, when Martin conveyed to Moore, there was not only conveyed by its metes and bounds the land involved in that litigation, but also a large area of other lands which are the lands that Reeves said Moore represented he owned as accretions to his lands. But for Moore's purchase from Martin and from Ashley and Beard, there would be some question among them as to the apportionment of these accretions. It may have been that Moore bought from Martin only to acquire color of title to fortify himself in the future, in the defense of his possession; but, however this may be, there is too much uncertainty about the location and purpose of this conventional boundary to hold that it must be accepted as the boundary of the accretions for the benefit of one who knew nothing about it. The Mobbs Case, above cited, is authority for holding that grantees may claim the benefit of the agreement of their grantors and they need not have had knowledge of that agreement at the time of their purchase to claim the benefit; but we are distinguishing the facts of this case from the Mobbs Case and hold that Moore is not estopped from saying that Reeves should have only the accretions which were properly apportionable to the lands described in the conveyance to him.

[3] It is necessary to determine how these accretions should be apportioned. The Mississippi river has entirely changed its course along the front of the lands under consideration, and to such an extent is this true that what was once the main river and the boundary between this state and Swearingen Island, which is in the state of Mississippi, has filled, until now in places it is only a chute, called Old river, and the main river flows to the west of this island, placing it on the Arkansas side of the river. Appellant now insists that only the present shore of the Mississippi river should be taken into account, and that the bank of Old river should not be measured in determining the present shore line, as was done by the master under the directions of the court in apportioning the accretions among the different sections of land. But we think that the court's directions to the master were proper: that is, that he should take as the present shore line, the line running from the point where the accretions commenced to the point where they ended, even though in doing so the present bank of the main stream was departed from when the measurements were made to extend along the bank of the Old river. To adopt the rule contended for by appellant would either leave some accretions unapportioned, or would leave the accretions to section 7 in such a shape that the stream of Old river would divide its accretions into two disconnected parts. The rule adopted by the court below is in conformity with the rule announced in the case of Malone v. Mobbs, cited above, where the rule for apportioning accretions between coterminous proprietors is announced substantially as follows: The accretions should be apportioned by giving to each section a proportion of the outer boundary line of the accretions in the ratio that the old shore line on the particular section bore to the whole of the old shore line, and then drawing lines from the points of division, thus made in the outer boundary line, to the points at which the old shore line is intersected by the boundaries separating the different sections. In other words, each section should have a part of the outer boundary line in the same proportion to the whole of the outer boundary line that its proportion of the old shore line bore to the whole of the old shore line, with lines drawn from the respective dividing points on the old shore line. In the case just quoted from, Judge Hart, speaking for the court, said: "The rule just applied was the one generally recognized as the proper one to follow, unless there are such irregularities in the shore line as to make it inequitable, and this rule was there adopted as the one to be followed in this state, unless there are peculiar circumstances to modify it, as where the shore line happens to be elongated by deep indentations or sharp projections. The exception does not apply to the rule adopted by the court below."

[4] It might be said that the above apportionment does not take into account the question of whether the land conveyed by Martin to Moore was accretion to the mainland or to Martin's Island, but treats it all as if it were accretion to the main shore. But this is necessarily to the appellant's advantage, and appellee in his cross-appeal makes no objection to this method.

Upon the whole case we are of the opinion that the decree of the chancellor is correct, and it is affirmed.

Shannon's Code, § 4389, permitting the chancellor in his discretion to allow an appeal from his decree determining the principle involved, and ordering an account or partition, before the account is taken, or the sale or partition made, and providing that he may allow such appeal on overruling a demurrer, or may permit a party to appeal from a decree which settles his right, though the case may not be disposed of as to others, has not been extended beyond the particular cases enumerated therein, so that the chancellor has no discretion to authorize an appeal from a decree overruling a plea in abatement to his jurisdiction.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Hamilton County; T. M. McConnell, Chancellor.

Action by the Employers' Indemnity Company against D. H. Willard and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Appeal dismissed.

Chambers & Cooper and Williams & Lancaster, all of Chattanooga, for appellants. Shields, Cates & Mountcastle, of Knoxville, and Burkett, Miller & Moore, of Chattanooga, for appellee.

LANSDEN, J. The defendant Willard is a resident of Washington county, and the complainant company is a foreign corporation doing business in this state, after complying with the laws in respect thereto. Willard had brought suit in the law court at Johnson City against the company to recover damages for an alleged breach of contract, and while this suit was pending the company filed the bill in this case against Willard and others in Hamilton county, seeking, among other things, to enjoin the suit pending in Washington county and have a complete settlement of all the matters existing between it and all of the defendants in this suit. Each of the defendants filed pleas in abatement to the jurisdiction of the chancery court of Hamilton county, and, after different motions and amendments, issue was finally joined upon the pleas, and upon the proof the chancellor overruled these and sustained his jurisdiction. The decree then recites as follows:

"And the chancellor being of opinion that it is proper to allow an appeal at this time, the same is allowed to such of the defendants as desire to avail themselves thereof, upon giving bond for said appeal as required by statute. But defendants Willard, Fisher, Miller, and the United States Fidelity &

Guaranty Company do not appeal from that part of the decree allowing them 20 days in which to make further defense in case they are cast in this appeal."

[1] This appeal must be dismissed, because it is premature. This is not a final decree, nor is it an appeal that lies within the discretion of the chancellor, under section 4889 of Shannon's Code. A final decree, in the sense that an appeal as a matter of right lies from it, is one that disposes of the entire merits of the case. Younger v. Younger, 90 Tenn. 25, 16 S. W. 78, and cases cited.

[2] A decree overruling a plea in abatement to the jurisdiction does not pass upon the merits in any particular.

[3] By section 4889 of Shannon's Code, the chancellor may in his discretion allow an appeal from "his decree determining the principle involved and ordering an account or a sale or partition, before the account is taken, or the sale or partition is made; or he may allow such appeal on overruling a demurrer; or he may allow any party to appeal from a decree which settles his right, although the case may not be disposed of as to others."

It has uniformly been held by this court that the chancellor's discretion in allowing appeals under this section of the Code is limited to the cases therein enumerated. Manifestly, this appeal is not either of those cases, and it is therefore premature. Younger v. Younger, 90 Tenn. 25, 16 S. W. 78; Sigler v. Vaughn, 11 Lea, 135; Bomar v. Hagler, 7 Lea, 85; Barksdale v. Butler, 6 Lea, 454; Hume v. Bank, 1 Lea, 220.

The appeal is dismissed at the cost of the appellant.

GLEASON et al. v. PRUDENTIAL FIRE INS. CO.

(Supreme Court of Tennessee. Dec. 19, 1912.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1022*)—REVIEW—FINDINGS.

A concurrent finding by a master and chancellor will be sustained on appeal, where there is any evidence in its behalf.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4015-4018; Dec. Dig. § 1022.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 349*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PAYMENT OF PREMIUMS.

Where a fire insurance policy provided that the failure of the insured to pay any premium note when due should lapse the liability of the company, and a premium note contained a like provision, the insured's failure to pay it according to its tenor will avoid the policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 891, 895-902, 913; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

3. INSURANCE (§ 64*)—INSOLVENCY OF COMPANY—CREDITORS' BILL.

Where an insurance company was insolvent, a bill filed by one who sought to recover under a policy for loss sustained, when otherwise good as a creditors' bill, cannot be rejected because the complainant is not entitled to recover under the policy; all other creditors being given an opportunity to come in.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 89; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

4. INSURANCE (§ 63*)—FIRE INSURANCE—MUTUAL ASSESSMENT COMPANIES.

Mutual assessment fire insurance companies have no capital stock, the policy holders being in a way stockholders, and the cash paid in for premiums and the premium notes constituting the company's assets; and hence, upon the insolvency of such company, a policy holder cannot recover premiums paid in or avoid premium notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 86-88; Dec. Dig. § 63.*]

5. INSURANCE (§ 70*)—FIRE INSURANCE—MUTUAL ASSESSMENT COMPANIES—INSOLVENCY—EFFECT.

The appointment of a receiver for an insolvent mutual assessment fire insurance company terminates all contracts, regardless of the payment of premium and the period to continue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 93; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

6. INSURANCE (§ 536*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PROOF OF LOSS—WAIVER.

Where the local agent, as well as the adjuster, of a fire insurance company, promised to furnish insured with blanks on which to make proof of his loss, their failure to furnish insured blanks within the time stipulated by the policy is a waiver of the condition requiring insured to make proofs within that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1323; Dec. Dig. § 536.*]

7. INSURANCE (§ 536*)—FIRE INSURANCE—PROOF OF LOSS.

Where an insurance company became insolvent and a receiver was appointed after insured suffered a loss, but before the time for filing proofs had expired, and the court fixed a time within which creditors were required to file petitions establishing their claims, that order superseded the requirement of filing proofs of loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 1323; Dec. Dig. § 536.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 143*)—ACTIONS ON POLICY—LOCATION OF RISK.

Where by mistake a fire policy misdescribed the location of the property insured, insured's remedy is to seek reformation; but no action can be maintained upon the policy where the property destroyed was not in the location described.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 265-272; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

9. INSURANCE (§ 115*)—INSURABLE INTEREST—INTEREST OF HUSBAND.

A husband, having a freehold estate in the property of his wife and the right to control it, has an insurable interest therein.

10. EVIDENCE (§ 594*)—WEIGHT—UNCONTRADICTED TESTIMONY.

In an action against an insurance company, where the testimony of insured was in no way impeached, nor was there any attack made on his character, his statement as to the facts must be accepted as true, when standing uncontradicted.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2431; Dec. Dig. § 594.*]

11. INSURANCE (§ 353*)—FIRE INSURANCE—WAIVER OF STIPULATIONS OF POLICY.

Where the agent, in inducing insured to accept a fire policy, agreed to give him seasonable notice of the maturity of a premium note, that agreement, being part of the consideration of the contract, will prevent the insurer from declaring a forfeiture for nonpayment of the note, when no notice was given.

Appeal from Chancery Court, Knox County; James Maynard, Jr., Special Chancellor.

Bill by M. D. Gleason and others against the Prudential Fire Insurance Company. From a decree for defendant, petitioners appeal. Reversed and remanded.

Saylor & Moore, of Knoxville, for appellant Martin. Wm. Davis, of Tazewell, for appellant Phelps. Jerome Templeton and C. W. Lester, both of Knoxville, for appellant Gleason. Jerome Templeton, of Knoxville, for appellant Sellers. Webb & Baker, of Knoxville, for appellants Leeson and Drummond. Walter H. Anderson, of Harriman, and Hughett & Hughett, of Knoxville, for appellants Adkisson. Wright & Jones, of Knoxville, for appellant Birdwell. W. A. Owens, of La Follette, for appellant Silcox. Green, Webb & Tate, of Knoxville, for receiver.

GREEN, J. This bill was filed by the complainant, claiming to be a creditor of defendant insurance company, and seeking to recover the amount alleged to be due him under a policy of insurance which had been issued to him. The bill was also filed as a general creditors' bill, alleging the insolvency of the company, and asking for the appointment of a receiver, and that its affairs be wound up under the supervision of the chancery court.

A receiver was appointed for the company, and publication was made for creditors, and numerous intervening petitions were filed in the cause.

A final decree was passed by the chancellor, and the case is for the second time before us, and several questions which will hereafter be disposed of relative to the rights of the complainant and of various petitioners are involved on this appeal.

The first matter arising is as to the right of the complainant himself to a recovery on his policy. This policy appears to have been issued June 5, 1909, for $2,000, on a stock of goods, storehouse, and fixtures. The premium on the policy was $72, for which complainant executed two notes, for $36 each, dated June 5, 1909, and payable, respectively, in 30 and 60 days.

No payment was made on either note until August 20th, when complainant paid $20 to the insurance company's collector.

The complainant contends that at this time an agreement was made between him and the collector whereby both of these notes should be extended until November 15th. The fire occurred on November 4th. The contention made for the receiver is that, upon the payment of the $20 aforesaid, the first note was extended until October 1st, and the second note was extended until November 1st.

Indorsements upon the notes bear out the receiver's contention, and it is in evidence that the company wrote to the complainant early in October, calling his attention to the fact that his note due October 1st was unpaid. The company's agent, who dealt with complainant in regard to this policy, and made the collection of the $20, also states that, upon receipt of that payment, extensions were made as claimed by the receiver.

On behalf of the complainant, he himself and two other witnesses testify that at the time of the $20 payment the company's agent agreed with the complainant to extend both notes until November 15th.

[1] Much is said by counsel for each side reflecting on the credibility of testimony offered in behalf of the other.

This controversy, along with the others arising in the case, was referred to the master for determination. The master reported against complainant's claim, and this report was confirmed by the chancellor.

We see no reason for departing from the rule that we will uphold a concurrent finding of the master and chancellor, where there is any evidence to sustain it. There is abundant evidence to sustain the finding here, and it must be regarded as conclusive.

[2] This being the case, and complainant being in default on these notes at the time of this loss, he is not entitled to any recovery against the company.

The policy provides on its face that, on the failure of the assured to pay any premium note when due, it "shall lapse and the liability of the company thereon be suspended, and no loss or damage shall be collectible from the company, if loss or damage shall occur to the insured during the period of such lapse caused by arrearage."

The notes also provide, if they are not paid at maturity, that "the policy shall be null and void," and so remain until same shall be fully paid.

"Failure to pay an installment or premium on a fire policy at maturity will defeat the assured's recovery for a loss that occurred during his default, where both the policy and the installment notes provide that the policy shall lapse upon default in payment of premium." Dale v. Continental Insurance Co., 95 Tenn. 88, 31 S. W. 268.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"A policy of insurance containing a stipulation to the effect that nonpayment at maturity of any premium note given by the assured and accepted by the insurer would forfeit the policy is rendered void and nonenforceable by the nonpayment of the note at maturity." Ressler v. Fidelity Mutual Insurance Co., 110 Tenn. 411, 75 S. W. 735.

"Where a life insurance policy provides that it shall lapse and be void if the premiums thereon are not paid when due, it is well settled that such policy will be forfeited if the premiums are not paid as stipulated." Life Insurance Co. v. Galbraith, 115 Tenn. 471, 91 S. W. 204.

Without further discussion, therefore, it is obvious that the complainant is not entitled to recovery upon his policy, when rules of law fully established in this state are applied to the facts herein concurrently found by the master and chancellor.

Accordingly, the decree of the chancellor must be affirmed, in so far as it denied relief to the complainant on his policy.

[3] Another question arises on this bill. It was drafted as a general creditors' bill, and a fiat for injunction obtained from the chancellor. Some days elapsed before it was filed. Immediately thereafter, Leeson and Drummond presented to the chancellor a bill in the nature of a general creditors' bill against the company, which was allowed to be filed pro tempore as a sort of petition in Gleason's suit. Leeson and Drummond had been officers of defendant corporation, as well as creditors, and they denied the validity of Gleason's claim, and said they filed their bill to insure the winding up of the company by the court, if Gleason failed to establish his claim.

Some preliminary proceedings were had before the chancellor, and he made an order sustaining Gleason's bill as a creditors' bill; but such order was conditioned on the validity of Gleason's claim, and provided, if such claim proved ill founded, then the bill of Leeson and Drummond should be treated as the general creditors' bill.

The final decree dismissed Gleason's bill outright, and it is here said that this action, as well as the former order conditionally sustaining the bill as a general creditors' bill, were both erroneous. These criticisms are well made.

Upon the insolvency of the company becoming apparent, as it did, from the answer to Gleason's bill, the chancellor should have unconditionally sustained said bill as a creditors' bill. It was the first one presented and filed, and there is no reason for saying it was not preferred in good faith. Its status as a creditors' bill could not be affected by the ultimate decision of the merits of complainant's demand, if other creditors intervened. The condition of the corporation, not the individual right of Gleason to recover, should have been chiefly considered by the chancellor in making the preliminary order. There was no justification for the bill of Leeson and Drummond as a creditors' bill. They could have come into Gleason's suit by petition, and thereby have secured and made certain the administration of the affairs of this corporation by the court, irrespective of the final disposition of Gleason's claim.

The order of the chancellor provisionally sustaining the Gleason bill as a creditors' bill was erroneous, and properly excepted to. The subsequent decree dismissing said bill outright was also erroneous. Petitions had been filed in the cause, and the administration of the corporation's affairs undertaken, and the bill of Gleason should have been retained as the general creditors' bill, even though he failed to establish his claim. He was properly taxed with part of the costs. He should pay such of those as accrued with respect to the trial of his claim.

The chancellor's decree will be modified, so as to sustain the Gleason bill as a general creditors' bill.

A number of controversies arising upon intervening petitions are before us on this appeal, which we proceed to consider separately.

G. W. Sellers.

This petitioner took out a policy for $2,500, on his residence in Newport. The policy was dated May 19, 1909, and was to run three years. The petitioner paid the premium exacted by the company. The property was destroyed by fire August 24, 1910. The creditors' bill was sustained, and a receiver appointed, it will be remembered, on November 15, 1909.

The petitioner claims that, having procured and paid for insurance for a term of three years from May 19, 1909, the insolvency of the company did not terminate this contract, but that the receiver is liable for this loss. Petitioner avers that no part of his premium was returned to him or offered to him by the receiver, but, on the contrary, a call or demand for contingent premium has been made upon him. An answer was filed by the receiver, in which he denied petitioner's right to recover, and the receiver also filed his answer as a cross-bill to recover from petitioner the contingent premium aforesaid.

This company was a mutual insurance company, authorized by chapter 461, of the Acts of 1907.

This case, on other features, was before this court at the last term, coming from the Court of Civil Appeals by certiorari. We had occasion at that time to consider the nature of such companies, and the nature of the contract between such companies and their members. These matters were fully discussed in an opinion of the Court of Civil Appeals, which we affirmed. Gleason v. Insurance Co., 2 Higgins, 376.

In that case it was held that a member of one of these mutual companies was liable for the amount of his premium note, even though the company had failed and was unable to continue the policy of insurance, and there had accordingly been a failure of the consideration for which the note was given. It was said that the members of such companies were both insurers and insured; they were not only policy holders in such cases, but quasi stockholders; and that their premium notes were assets in the hands of such companies for the payment of creditors.

[4] Companies organized upon the plan of this one have no capital stock. The cash paid in for premiums and the premium notes constitute their assets, and the policy holders or members sustain a relation to the company very similar to that of stockholders. They can no more recover premiums paid in, nor avoid premium notes, in case of insolvency, than could stockholders in an ordinary corporation recover money paid in subscription to stock, or avoid notes given for subscription to stock.

So the insolvency of a company like this gives no right to a policy holder to recover any premium paid, or to avoid the payment of any premium note, so long as the company has outstanding debts.

[5] Upon a loss by fire, the rights of the policy holders against the company are matured. Such policy holders then become creditors, and are entitled to have subjected to their claims all the assets of the company, and, if necessary, to call on other policy holders for contingent premiums provided by statute. The contract between its members and such companies as this is peculiar. However, such companies have existed for a long time, and the rights of the parties to such contracts have been frequently considered by the courts of this country, and the rules of law with reference thereto are now firmly established. The authorities are as follows:

"Upon the appointment of a receiver on the ground of insolvency, the outstanding policies of the company are canceled by operation of law, and subsequent losses under such policies are not liabilities which may be enforced against the receiver. This rule is not changed, even though by the terms of the policy the company is required to give notice to the insured in case it desires to cancel the policy. Holders of policies on which premiums have been paid for a term extending beyond the insolvency have valid claims against the company for unearned premiums. A statute making the officers personally liable on policies issued by them when they knew the company to be insolvent does not render a policy issued under such condition void. The policy is binding on the company, with the individual liability of the directors superadded. The right of holders of unmatured policies is to share in the assets after payment of debts, while the holders of matured policies are regarded as creditors." 22 Cyc. 1421.

"On the other hand, the insolvency of the company does not terminate the obligation of policy holders to contribute to the payment of losses which have occurred prior to insolvency, and those giving premium notes are also liable to assessment for the payment of unearned premiums on business done under the cash plan. Assessments cannot be collected from holders of policies which are issued in violation of law. And they can only be made on existing members; that is, members whose policies are still in force at the time of insolvency. Assessments cannot be made on persons who, having had policies in the company, have surrendered and canceled them; and the receiver is bound by the prior action of the officers of the company in settling with policy holders and canceling their policies so as to relieve them from assessment. A member may also be relieved from liability on showing that he became such through fraud or mistake." 22 Cyc. 1422, 1423.

The Supreme Court of Massachusetts has said:

"It is an incident of the peculiar contract and relation which each member of a mutual insurance company enters into with the other members that the injunction and judicial sequestration of all the property of the corporation terminates its liability for future losses." Commonwealth v. Mass. Mutual Fire Ins. Co., 119 Mass. 45.

Speaking of the results of insolvency, the Supreme Court of Minnesota observes:

"The effect was to terminate all contracts of insurance at the date of the appointment of the receiver. These contracts were not debts or fixed liabilities of the company. In respect to them, its liability depended upon the contingency of losses by the assured during the life of the policies, and when losses have not occurred before the adjudication of insolvency, the only liability to the policy holder is for the breach or cancellation of the contracts by the adjudication of the insolvency, and the consequent suspension of all business by the company, and its disability to fulfill its contracts of indemnity, and the measure of damages is the surrender value of the policies." Taylor v. North Star Ins. Co., 46 Minn. 198, 48 N. W. 772.

The same result was reached in Doane v. Millville Mutual M. & F. Ins. Co., 43 N. J. Eq. 522, 11 Atl. 789.

Other cases to this effect are collected in Cyc., under the sections above quoted, and all the cases to which we have had access announce the same rule.

That is to say, that upon insolvency of a mutual insurance company, such as the one being wound up, its outstanding policies are canceled by force of law, and no recovery can be had against it for subsequent losses. The only damage to which a policy holder is entitled, under these circumstances, is a pro rata of his unearned premiums, or any surrender value the policy may have, if anything be left after the payment of creditors.

We must therefore hold that petitioner Sellers is not entitled to recovery on his policy. As observed in Doane v. Insurance Co., supra, this result may seem hard; but it is the best that can be reached, by reason of the peculiar incidents of such contracts of insurance with companies so organized.

With reference to the cross-bill of the receiver against this petitioner, it is conceded upon the brief of counsel for the receiver that this petitioner is only liable for the contingent premium to the extent that an assessment may be necessary to pay losses accruing between the date of his policy and its termination. Such, in fact, is the provision of the statute. Therefore the chancellor's decree must be modified in this respect; otherwise, it will be affirmed.

Inasmuch as this case has to be remanded for various further proceedings, the contingent liability of Sellers may be established by appropriate action of the receiver later, if necessary.

We have examined the authorities cited by counsel for petitioner, but think that they are not applicable here. This company was organized under our statute, and the rights of its members or policy holders cannot be determined by rules of law applicable to policy holders in standard or old line insurance companies.

J. W. Birdwell.

This petitioner had a policy for $2,000 on a stock of goods located in Johnson City. The loss occurred August 10th, and amounted to $2,485.66.

This policy was issued by Dulaney, the local agent of the company at Johnson City. Notice was given the company respecting the fire, and three or four days thereafter Drummond, an adjuster for the company, came to Johnson City to investigate.

The petitioner was away from town on the day Drummond arrived, and did not see him, but did see him within 30 days after the fire. At that time Drummond agreed to come back to Johnson City shortly and adjust or settle the loss.

[8] The defense interposed by the receiver in this case is that formal proofs of loss were not filed within 60 days, as required by the policy. The petitioner testifies, as said above, that Mr. Drummond, within 30 days after the fire, when he saw him in Knoxville, promised to come up and adjust matters in a short while. He also testifies that, upon the occasion of Drummond's first trip to

Johnson City, when petitioner was absent, Drummond stated then that he would be back in a few days. It seems that Drummond never did come back to Johnson City, in accordance with these promises, and a short while after the 60 days had expired formal proofs of loss were filed with the company by this petitioner.

In addition to the foregoing, petitioner testifies that he applied to Dulaney, the local agent, immediately after the fire, for a proof of loss blank. Dulaney stated that he had never been supplied with such blanks, but later, on the occasion of Drummond's trip to Johnson City, three or four days after the fire, Drummond promised to have such blanks sent to Dulaney, and Dulaney in turn promised to deliver one of them to petitioner. Petitioner says further that, when he met Drummond in Knoxville, Drummond promised to send him a proof of loss blank. Neither Drummond nor Dulaney ever supplied this petitioner with these blanks, as they had promised. The foregoing is the testimony of petitioner, and no proof is introduced in behalf of the receiver to the contrary.

We are of opinion that the conduct of the agents of the company with respect to this petitioner amounted to a waiver of the company's right to insist on proofs being filed within the 60 days. The general rule of law is:

"When the company, with knowledge that notice and proofs have not been given and furnished, as required by the policy, so acts in relation to the matter as to lead the assured to reasonably believe that the policy is still in force and binding, there is a waiver of objection to the manner or time of notice and proofs, and accordingly the company cannot take advantage of the default." 19 Cyc. 857.

"Negotiations or proceedings by the company with reference to settlement of loss will be a waiver of failure to give notice or make proof of loss." Id. 865.

Without, however, considering the effect of these negotiations, indicating that it proposed a settlement, the company is precluded from making the defense here relied upon by the promises of both the local agent and the adjuster to supply the insured with the blank proofs of loss, which was never done.

Authorities are uniform, "if the agent offers to furnish blanks and fails to do so, the want of proofs is waived." 19 Cyc. 862.

This question is clearly discussed in Kenton Insurance Co. v. Wigginton, 89 Ky. 330, 12 S. W. 668, 7 L. R. A. 81, and other authorities are cited to the same effect in note 26, 19 Cyc. 862.

For the reasons stated, we think the chancellor was in error in dismissing Birdwell's petition, and his action in this respect will be reversed.

F. B. Martin.

F. B. Martin had a policy for $700, covering his barn and contents. The property insured was destroyed by fire on October 13, 1909.

The only defense interposed to his claim is that he failed to file proofs of loss with the company within 60 days after the fire. As has been stated, the policies of this company contained a provision in ordinary form requiring such proofs to be filed within that time.

[7] The defense was thought to be good by the chancellor, and the petition dismissed. We are of opinion that the chancellor was in error. The creditors' bill in this case was filed November 11th, and sustained November 15th, and the usual publication made with respect to creditors.

In the order appointing the receiver, etc., all creditors were required to come into the case "by petition," and file and prove their respective claims on or before June 13, 1910. It seems to us that this order of the court superseded the requirement of the policy as to the filing of proofs of loss. Creditors were required by said order to present their claims "by petition" in court. It would have availed Martin nothing to have presented his claim otherwise. At the time the creditors' bill was sustained only 33 days had elapsed of the 60 days allowed him in which to file proofs.

There was no necessity for petitioner to have filed proofs of loss with the receiver. The receiver could not have considered such proofs presented to him, according to the terms of the policy, as if the company was a going concern. It would have been a useless performance for Martin to have undertaken to present his claim to the receiver in this way. He was required by the chancellor's order to present his claim "by petition," and proofs of this claim had to be made upon such petition in court.

By its very language, the order of the court extended the time for filing all claims until June 13, 1910. As has been said before, this order superseded the limitations of the policy.

There can be no objection to the form in which Martin submitted his claim in his petition. He therein stated the character of the loss with detail and particularity, and the petition was, of course, sworn to. This petition set out the value of the barn, and hay, oats, corn, etc., therein contained, by items, the whole aggregating more than $700, and there is no question but that there was a total loss.

For the reasons stated, the decree of the chancellor on Martin's petition will be reversed, and this claim allowed.

Levi Silcox.

This Intervener had a policy for $1,200 on a large quantity of lumber, which was destroyed by fire September 25, 1909.

[8] The policy described the property insured as 90,000 feet of oak and poplar lumber on Central avenue, La Follette, Tenn. As a matter of fact, the lumber was actually stacked a mile west of the town of La Follette, and was not on Central avenue.

The chancellor dismissed this petition, and it is argued by counsel for Silcox upon appeal that the location of the property given in the policy was the mistake of the agent of the company. Proof is introduced tending to show that the agent, when writing this policy, was correctly informed as to its location, and that the erroneous location given in the policy was due to his mistake. However this may be, whoever made the mistake in the outset, we do not think there can be a recovery upon this petition and upon this policy for the property that was actually destroyed. The matter of the location of the risk is one of highest importance in all insurance contracts. Premiums vary according to the location of the risk, and the location otherwise enters into the contract between the parties.

If the agent did make a mistake in writing up this policy, as from the proof herein he appears to have done, the remedy of petitioner is to ask for a reformation of the policy, so as to make it evidence the contract actually made between him and the company.

There can be no recovery under a policy covering lumber on Central avenue, in La Follette, for the destruction of lumber a mile west of the town of La Follette, unless there be a reformation of the policy.

The decree of the chancellor denying relief on this petition will be affirmed; but the cause will be remanded in this respect to permit of amendments to the petition along the lines suggested.

W. Walker Adkisson and Wife.

[9] The only question raised upon this petition is whether the husband has an insurable interest in the wife's general estate. The title to the property insured and destroyed was in Mrs. Adkisson, but the policy was issued to Adkisson and wife, and it is insisted on behalf of the receiver that Adkisson did not have any interest in this property, and that there can be no recovery on this policy. This defense is not well made.

It appears in the proof that the property was Mrs. Adkisson's general estate. Her husband, therefore, had a freehold estate therein, with the right to control it, and various other rights respecting it, which are well recognized. Standing in this attitude to the property, he had an insurable interest in it. We have so held in former unreported cases. Many authorities to this effect are collected in a note to Tyree v. Virginia F. & M. Ins. Co., 66 L. R. A. 657. The husband has a beneficial interest in such property, and he is also treated in many of the cases as agent for the wife respecting such property.

The decree of the chancellor, dismissing this petition, will therefore be reversed.

G. L. Phelps.

[10, 11] Phelps took out a policy for $1,000 for 12 months, on September 6, 1909, on certain property of his. This property was destroyed by fire on October 5, 1909. The premium on this policy was $25, of which $12.50 was paid in cash at the time the policy was issued, and for the balance Phelps executed his note for $12.50, due October 1st.

The defense to this claim is that the loss occurred on October 5th, when the premium note, due October 1st, was still unpaid, and that, under the terms of the policy, failure to pay any premium note at maturity had the effect of suspending the policy and depriving the insured of the right to collect for a loss occurring while he was so in arrears.

Phelps testifies that when he took out this policy of insurance he told the agent that he could pay the entire premium in advance, if necessary; but the agent informed him that this was not required, that he might pay one-half then and give his note for the remainder. Phelps says he objected to this arrangement on the ground that he could not remember, or might forget, when his premium note matured. The agent then, according to Phelps, promised him, and made an agreement with him, that he (Phelps) should have timely notice of the maturity of this note from the company, and upon this assurance of the agent, Phelps says, he took the policy upon the terms above stated. He further says that he received no notice whatever from the company in respect to this note until October 9th, and that in response to this notice he immediately mailed a check to the company for the $12.50. This check was mailed to the company on October 11th, and, the loss having occurred on October 5th, it returned the check and denied liability under the policy; but the agent who issued this policy to Phelps is not introduced by the receiver, nor is any attack made on the character of Phelps, and he stands uncontradicted in this record. We must, therefore, accept his statement of the facts with reference to the issuance of this policy as true.

The agent having agreed that the company would give notice in advance of the maturity of this note, and the company having failed to do so, it cannot now be heard to insist upon a forfeiture of the policy by reason of nonpayment of the note on the day it fell due. This promise of the agent was an inducement offered Phelps for taking out the policy, and was offered prior to the issuance thereof. It was part of the consideration of the contract, and was within the apparent scope of the agent's authority.

"A forfeiture is to be regarded as waived when the agent or the insurer agrees that he will give the insured notice of the falling due of any premium note." 19 Cyc. 799.

The case of Alexander v. Continental Insurance Co., 67 Wis. 422, 30 N. W. 727, 53 Am. Rep. 869, was a case where the agent agreed to give notice of the maturity of the installments of the premium, and the court held the insured entitled to rely upon such promises, even though the installments were several years past due.

Other cases to the same effect are therein cited in support of the above quotation from Cyc.

So that, under the authorities, we think the chancellor was correct in holding that the company could not insist on a forfeiture of this policy, upon the facts heretofore stated.

A decree will be entered, disposing of these various matters as herein indicated, and the cause remanded for further proceedings.

SPIVY v. MARCH et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. ACKNOWLEDGMENT (§ 37*)—CONVEYANCES OF MARRIED WOMEN—VALIDITY—CERTIFICATE.

The statute (Paschal's Dig. art. 1003) providing that in case of the conveyance of the separate property of the wife she shall be privately examined by a judge of the Supreme or District Court, or notary public, and if, upon the conveyance being explained to her, she shall acknowledge it and state that she does not wish to retract, the officer shall file a certificate to that effect, but that any certificate showing that the requisites of the law have been complied with shall be sufficient, a certificate, reciting that the grantors, husband and wife, appeared before the notary and acknowledged that they signed and delivered the foregoing deed, and that, the wife, being examined apart from her husband, after having the deed explained to her, stated that she signed the same of her own will and accord, without fear or restraint, was sufficient, though not containing the clause that she did not wish to retract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Acknowledgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 183, 199-216; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

2. TRESPASS TO TRY TITLE (§ 6*)—TITLE OF PLAINTIFF.

Failure of the acknowledgment of a deed by a married woman to state that she did not wish to retract will not defeat a suit by her remote grantee against a mere intruder, where she lived near the land, and for over 50 years neither she nor her heirs ever questioned the deed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trespass to Try Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 5-9, 15, 16; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Sixth Supreme Judicial District.

Action by R. B. Spivy against D. W. March and others. The Court of Civil Appeals granted judgment (133 S. W. 529) reversing judgment for plaintiff, and he brings error. Judgment of Court of Civil Appeals reversed, and that of the district court affirmed.

J. H. Turner, of Henderson, and H. I. Myers and N. B. Morris, both of Palestine, for plaintiff in error. John R. Arnold, of Henderson, for defendants in error.

BROWN, C. J. The case was submitted to the judge of the district court, without a jury, who filed this statement of facts and entered judgment accordingly:

"This is a suit in trespass to try title by plaintiff against defendants for a tract of 209 acres of land, a part of the Jose Durst survey situated in Rusk county, Tex.

"I find the land was duly conveyed from the state to Jose Durst and from Durst to Alexander Jordan. Prior to 1857 the land was partitioned between the heirs of Alexander Jordan; S. $\frac{1}{2}$ being given to the children and heirs, and the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ to the widow, who had married Jack Anderson.

"In this partition the S. $\frac{1}{2}$ was blocked up and given to the children in severalty; the 209 acres in suit, together with 160 acres more adjoining the 209 acres on the east, making 369, at that time in one body, was allotted to Emma Jane Hensley, who was the child and heir of Alexander Jordan, and who had married Sam Hensley. Emma Jane Hensley and her husband lived on this land; the home place being on the 209 acres of land.

"In 1857 Emma Jane Hensley and her husband sold the 209 acres in suit to C. A. Few, and were paid for same in stock and property by Few. C. A. Few soon after took possession of the land by tenant. I find the land was the separate property of Emma J. Hensley, and that the certificate of acknowledgment to her deed is defective, but that she received the consideration for the land acquired in the sale, delivered possession of the land to Few, and the defendants show no right, legal or equitable, through her. In 1866 C. A. Few deeded the land to R. B. Tutt. W. W. Morris acquired the land at execution sale, in part, and by deed from Hollingsworth for balance, who also acquired part of same from Tutt's estate by execution sale.

"In 1885 W. W. Morris' estate was partitioned, and this 209 acres of land was set apart to Reed B. Spivy, a legatee under the will of W. W. Morris.

"I find that W. W. Morris paid taxes on this 209 acres of land from date of his deed until death, and Reed Spivy since, and claimed this 209 acres of land.

"I find that March paid no taxes on this 209 acres of land as such. I find this S. W. March, deceased, claimed and claims now 160 acres of the Hensley 369 acres, not claimed by the plaintiff and not in this suit, and that Hensley and March were talking about the sale of this 160 acres of land at the time testified by McCrary.

"I find that in 1877 or 1878 the courthouse in Rusk county was burned, and many of the records were destroyed by fire, and that the recitals in the sheriff's deed and the evidence is sufficient to establish their existence of execution and orders of sales returned.

"I find that defendants show no conveyance to the land, or any part of same, except a deed from Nancy Anderson, who was Nancy Jordan in 1868, including a strip about 40 feet wide on the north end of the 209-acre tract, and this deed could convey no title, because the land had been set apart to Jane Hensley, and Nancy Jordan, or Anderson, was a party to the divestor long before, and March had notice.

"Conclusion of Law.

"I therefore conclude that, while the plaintiff's title is irregular and in some respects defective, defendants have shown no title, legal or equitable, and as against defendants the plaintiff is entitled to recover; and it is so ordered.

"W. C. Buford, Judge,

"Fourth Judicial District of Texas."

The defendants took all necessary steps to perfect an appeal to the Court of Civil Appeals of the Sixth District, and assigned these errors:

"(1) The trial court erred in admitting, over the objections of the defendants, and considering as evidence, the record of a deed from Emily Jane Hensley and husband, Samuel Hensley, to C. A. Few, because said deed was void on account of the lack of a legal certificate of acknowledgment of the execution of said deed by said Emily Jane Hensley, wife of Samuel Hensley.

"(2) The trial court erred in holding that plaintiff acquired a recoverable title through the deed from Emily Jane Hensley and husband to C. A. Few.

"(3) The court erred in admitting, over the objection of defendants, and considering as evidence, the deed by James H. Everett, sheriff of Rusk county, to Hollingsworth and Morris.

"(4) The court erred in admitting and considering as evidence of a conveyance of the land in suit the deed from S. P. Hollingsworth to W. W. Morris."

"(6) The court erred in holding that plaintiff acquired the title of John O. Tutt.

"(7) The court erred in permitting plaintiff, over the objections of defendants, to introduce as evidence that portion of the deposition of Mrs. Few stating that her husband, C. A. Few, put a man on it [the land in suit] to take care of it, because the same was shown by the deposition of that witness to be hearsay; she having testified in her deposition: 'I was never on the place. I never saw the land.'

"(8) The court erred in finding, 'Few soon after took possession of the land by tenant,' because this finding is based on hearsay testimony.

"(9) The trial court erred in finding, 'the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ [of the Durst league was given] to the widow, who had married Jack Anderson,' because the judgment of the district court gives the whole of the N. $\frac{1}{2}$ of that league to the heirs of John Jordan.

"(10) The trial court erred in finding that defendants show no conveyance to the land, or any part of the same, except a deed from Nancy Anderson, who was Nancy Jordan in 1868.

"(11) The trial court erred in holding that defendants have shown no title, legal or equitable, for which reason, as against defendants, the plaintiff is entitled to recover."

The honorable Court of Civil Appeals reversed the judgment of the district court, and rendered judgment for the defendants below. The case is now before this court on writ of error.

The right of plaintiff in error depends upon the validity of the deed from Hensley and wife to C. A. Few, under whom the plaintiff claimed by regular chain of transfers. The land was the separate property of Emily J. Hensley. The deed to Few is in proper form; but it is objected that the certificate of acknowledgment to the deed was not and is not in legal form in omitting the words, "she wished not to retract it."

[1] The defendant in error showed no title to the land from any source. By the facts he is shown to be a naked trespasser who seeks to avail himself of a technical error in the certificate of the officer who took Mrs. Hensley's acknowledgment of her execution of the deed made by her and her husband to C. A. Few.

At the time the certificate was made by the officer, this statute was in force: "Art. 1003. That when a husband and his wife have signed and sealed any deed or other writing purporting to be a conveyance of any estate or interest in any land, slave or slaves, or other effects, the separate property of the wife, or of the homestead of the family, or other property exempted by law from execution, if the wife appear before any judge of the Supreme or District Court, or notary public, and being privily examined by such officer, apart from her husband, shall declare that she did freely and willingly sign and seal the said writing, to be then shown and explained to her, and wishes not to retract it, and shall acknowledge the said deed or writing so again shown to her to be her act, thereupon such judge or notary shall certify such privy examination, acknowledgment, and declaration, under his hand and seal, by a certificate annexed to said writing to the following effect or substance, viz.: State of Texas, County of _____: Before me, _____, judge of, or notary public of, _____ county, personally appeared _____, wife of _____, parties to a certain deed or writing bearing date on the _____ day of _____, and hereto annexed, and having been examined by me privily and apart from her husband, and having the same fully explained to her, she, the said _____, acknowledged the same to be her act and deed, and declared that she had willingly signed, sealed, and delivered the same, and that she wished not to retract it; to certify which I hereunto sign my name and affix my seal, this _____ day of _____, A. D. _____. But any certificate showing that the requisites of the law have been complied with shall be as valid as the form here prescribed; and such deed or conveyance, so certified, shall pass all the right, title, and interest which the husband and wife, or either of them, may have in or to the property therein conveyed." Paschal's Digest.

The last clause of the statute is sufficient authority for sustaining the certificate in this case, because it appears that Mrs. Hensley declared that with her husband she signed, sealed, and delivered the deed to C. A. Few, and upon her privy examination "she, after having the deed explained to her," declared that she signed it "of her own free will and accord, without fear or compulsion on the part of her husband." She had the opportunity to retract, but instead of doing so she affirmed that it was her free and uninfluenced action. In addition, it is beyond dispute that Mrs. Hensley and her children lived near the land for many years, and that neither she nor her heirs ever made claim to the land.

In Belcher v. Weaver, 46 Tex. 293, 28 Am. Rep. 267, Chief Justice Roberts 'made a thorough analysis of that statute, and said: "The general rule upon this subject is that there must be a substantial, though not a literal, compliance with the terms of the statute, and that, although words not in the statute are used in the place of others that are, or words in the statute are omitted, yet, if the meaning of the words used is the same, or they represent the same fact, or, if the omission of a word or words is immaterial, or can be supplied by a reasonable and fair construction of the whole instrument, the certificate will be held sufficient. * * * It follows, then, that any artificial distinctions being made for the purpose of showing that one of the nominal parts is not specifically embraced, or that one part is defectively stated, will not avail, if from the evident sense of the whole instrument a reasonable conclusion can be arrived at that the requisites of the law have been complied with."

The rule of construction to be applied to such instruments as above copied is that the courts will give a liberal construction to the language of such certificates, and will sustain them, if it reasonably appears from the language used that the married woman "did not wish to retract it."

In the case cited above the learned judge construed the word "contract" to mean "retract." "Contract" means to enter into, while "retract" means to withdraw from; and any but the most liberal interpretation of those words would have shown that the woman did not wish to make the conveyance. That the substance of the language of the statute will be sufficient when used in the privy acknowledgment of a married woman, is sustained by the following cases: Belcher v. Weaver, 46 Tex. 293, 28 Am. Rep. 267; Norton v. Davis, 83 Tex. 32, 18 S. W. 430; Masterson v. Harris, 37 Tex. Civ. App. 145, 83 S. W. 423; Adams v. Pardue (Civ. App.) 36 S. W. 1015. Many cases might be cited to the same effect; but we find no case in which it has been held that a certificate of this character, which omitted the words, "she wished not to retract it," was condemned, if from the language of the certificate it appears with reasonable certainty that the instrument was explained to the woman, and that she then expressed herself to be satisfied with the transaction. Each certificate must be judged by its own terms, and we believe it to be the well settled and sound rule that any language which shows that the statute has been substantially complied with must be sustained.

The words, "that she did not wish to retract it," are of no greater importance than others. Those words simply express her satisfaction with the transaction at that time; and if that state of mind should, by other words, be shown to have existed the certificate would be valid. We here copy the certificate:

"State of Texas, County of Rusk:

"Personally appeared before me, the undersigned notary public, Samuel Hensley and Emily J. Hensley, his wife, both to me well known, who acknowledged that they signed, sealed and delivered the above and foregoing deed to C. A. Few (by making their marks). And the said Emily J. Hensley, wife of Samuel Hensley, being by me examined privily and apart from her husband and after having the deed explained to her, says that she signed the same by making her mark of her own free will and accord, without fear or restraint on the part of her husband. Given under my hand and official seal this Sept. 8, 1887. [Signed] William M. Ross, Notary Public."

This certificate shows that the husband and wife together executed and acknowledged the deed, after which the wife was removed from the presence of the husband, so that she would be entirely free from his influence. The officer took the precaution to explain the deed to Mrs. Hensley, so that she could not be misled by anything said to her by her husband or other person as to the effect of the conveyance; and, thus informed and guarded by the officer, she declared "that she signed the same of her own free will and accord." Thus she declared that she was free from any compelling influence, and without any "fear or restraint on the part of her husband." The law offered to her the opportunity to retract, but in strong language she, in effect, affirms the transaction. We will suppose that Mrs. Hensley had appeared before this court, and, knowing that she could retract, had in the language of the certificate expressed herself, would not this or any other court say that she was satisfied with the transaction? It is safe to construe the language of the certificate as if the court were performing the duties of the officer; and if Mrs. Hensley, with the same warning, should use the words of this certificate, would it not reasonably appear to such court that she was satisfied? Adding to this the fact that for the remainder of her life she recognized the deed as valid, can there be a reasonable doubt on this question?

[2] It is not necessary for us to decide in this case whether a stranger to the title should ever be permitted to interpose this defense, but we are firmly convinced by authority and sound reasoning that under such conditions a court should construe the language as Mrs. Hensley and her heirs have construed it by their inaction for a half century. If a stranger to the title be permitted to make such objection, courts should cast upon him the burden of establishing the invalidity.

We have in this case, by the decision of the Court of Civil Appeals, a stranger setting up a defect which the vendor refused to assert. The injustice and unreasonable character of the proposition forbids that this court should approve it, unless required to do so by precedents that we dare not disregard. We do not find the decisions of our courts to be of that character.

It is ordered that the judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals should be reversed, and that the judgment of the district court be affirmed.

COLEMAN v. ZAPP et al.

(Supreme Court of Texas. Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. JUDGMENT (§ 1*)—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

The judgment of a court is that which it pronounces, that is, the judicial act by which it declares the decision of the law upon the matter at issue; its entry being a ministerial act affording permanent evidence of the judicial act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1, 3, 4; Dec. Dig. § 1.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 4, pp. 3827-3842; vol. 8, pp. 7695, 7696.]

2. JUDGMENT (§ 293*)—ENTRY—EFFECT OF FAILURE.

The failure to correctly or fully enter a judgment upon the minutes does not annul it, but merely makes its record imperfect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 578; Dec. Dig. § 293.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 326*)—NUNC PRO TUNC ENTRY.

A court has inherent power to correct a judgment by entry nunc pro tunc, so as to properly recite the effect of its judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 628; Dec. Dig. § 326.*]

4. JUDGMENT (§ 299*)—CORRECTION—TIME.

A court's jurisdiction over its judgment records does not end with the term; the case being regarded as pending until the judgment is correctly recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 583-586; Dec. Dig. § 299.*]

5. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 39*)—PROCEEDINGS TO CORRECT JUDGMENT—"ACTION."

A proceeding by scire facias to correct a judgment, the entry of which omitted to show that it was against a certain party for a certain sum, is not an "action" to correct a judgment within Rev. St. 1895, art. 3353, providing that every action other than for the recovery of realty for which no limitations are otherwise prescribed shall be brought within four years next after the right to bring same shall have accrued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 190-211; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, vol. 1, pp. 128-140; vol. 8, p. 7563.]

6. JUDGMENT (§ 294*)—ENTRY.

The right of parties to have a judgment entry correspond with the terms of the judgment is not affected by rule 48 for the government of the district courts (142 S. W. xxi), requiring counsel for the successful party to prepare the form of the judgment and submit it to the court.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 579, 614; Dec. Dig. § 294.*]

7. JUDGMENT (§ 321*)—CORRECTION—DEFENSES—LACHES.

A delay of six years, from the time of rendition of a judgment and its imperfect entry to the application for a nunc pro tunc entry, to supply an omitted part, would not bar such relief, where the position of the parties had not meanwhile changed and no intervening rights had accrued so as to make it inequitable to grant the relief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 619, 620; Dec. Dig. § 321.*]

8. JUDGMENT (§ 318*)—ENTRY—CORRECTION.

The right of a party to have a judgment entry corrected or amended to speak the truth cannot be exercised to the prejudice of innocent third persons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 633; Dec. Dig. § 318.*]

9. ATTACHMENT (§ 13*)—RIGHT—REVIVAL OF JUDGMENT.

An attachment was properly issued in scire facias to have a judgment entry corrected by adding an omitted part, and to revive the judgment; the proceeding to revive being merely a suit for the debt.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. § 23; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

Error to Court of Civil Appeals of Third Supreme Judicial District.

Petition for scire facias by Helen Zapp and another against Kate Coleman. From a judgment of the Court of Civil Appeals (135 S. W. 730), affirming a judgment awarding the relief sought, the defendant named, a judgment creditor, brings error. Affirmed.

W. L. Eason and Tom G. Dilworth, both of Waco, for plaintiff in error. E. W. Handler and Williams & Williams, both of Waco, for defendants in error.

PHILLIPS, J. In the trial court this was a proceeding by scire facias, instituted by the defendants in error in the year 1909, to have entered nunc pro tunc and to revive a judgment rendered in 1903 in their favor against the plaintiff in error, in connection with which proceedings an attachment was sued out and levied. The judgment involved was originally obtained in 1898, but no execution was issued within one year from its rendition. In 1902 levy of an execution sued out on the judgment was made upon property belonging to the plaintiff in error, who thereupon filed an injunction suit to restrain its sale upon the ground that the judgment was dormant and the property levied upon exempt. In that suit defendants in error, defendants therein, pleaded their judgment and prayed that it be revived. Another party intervened claiming a lien upon the property seized. Upon a hearing of the case the court rendered the following judgment, according to the docket entry in the judge's handwriting (the Kate McChesney mentioned being the plaintiff in error, such being her name at that time): "4/8/03. Judgment for plaintiff perpetuating the injunction heretofore issued, and for defendants for balance due on the judgment sued on by them, viz., $1,823, against Kate McChesney, alias Winnie Clark, and her husband so far as he may be liable and for intervenor against both plaintiffs for amount of its debt, etc., to which defendants except and give notice of appeal." In the entry of the judgment upon the minutes, however, that part of it which awarded a recovery in favor of these defendants in error against the plaintiff in error of $1,823 was omitted. This proceeding, instituted by defendants in error in 1909 as stated, by petition filed in the same cause, proposed no change in the judgment as entered in the minutes, other than to incorporate in it, in proper form, such omitted portion and as actually decreed by the court.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It is contended by plaintiff in error that the proceeding was an "action" to correct a judgment and therefore barred by the limitation provided in article 3358, R. S. 1895, which is as follows: "Every action other than for the recovery of real estate, for which no limitation is otherwise prescribed, shall be brought within four years next after the right to bring the same shall have accrued, and not afterwards."

The solution of this question lies primarily in the substantial distinction which exists between the rendition and the entry of a judgment, and between the exercise of powers inherent in a court and those which depend for their operation upon the petition of parties.

[1] The judgment of a court is what the court pronounces. Its rendition is the judicial act by which the court settles and declares the decision of the law upon the matters at issue. Its entry is the ministerial act by which an enduring evidence of the judicial act is afforded.

[2] The failure of the minute entry to correctly or fully recite what the court judicially determined does not annul the act of the court, which remains the judgment of the court notwithstanding its imperfect record. Freeman on Judgments, § 38.

[3] Hence it is that from the earliest times the power of correcting or amending their records, by nunc pro tunc entry, so as to faithfully recite their action, has been possessed and exercised by the courts as an inherent right, independent of any statute, and, in the absence of express provision, unaffected by limitation. Freeman on Judgments, § 56; Ency. Pl. & Prac. vol. 18, p. 459. Our statutes providing for the correction of mistakes in the record of judgments and decrees (articles 1356 and 1357, Sayles' Civil Stat.) govern the procedure of its exercise; but they are only cumulative of this inherent power of the courts to have their records at all times speak the truth. If a court is made aware that through mistake or omission its records do not recite its judgment as actually rendered, we do not doubt that it is not only the right but the duty of the court, of its own motion and after due notice to the parties, to order the proper entry. The nature of a judicial record, the accuracy of which is the peculiar concern of the court and which for that reason and to that extent remains within the court's control, forbids that its correctness as an expression or evidence of judicial action should depend upon the inauguration of a proceeding by the parties; and it is therefore plain that such a proceeding only invokes an authority which the court may exercise of its own accord. In Ximenes v. Ximenes, 43 Tex. 458, Judge Moore quoted the following language from the opinion of Judge Wheeler in Burnett v. State, 14 Tex. 456: "Every court has the right to judge of its own records and minutes, and, if it appear satisfactorily to them that an order was actually made at a former term and omitted to be entered by the clerk, they may at any time direct such order to be entered on the records as of the term when it was made." And then announced: "And there can be no doubt, we think, that this court may, at a subsequent term after a final judgment, if there is the proper predicate for it, correct clerical errors or mistakes, cure defects of form, or add such clause as may be necessary to carry out the judgment of the court, make the entry in the minutes correspond with and correctly express the judgment actually rendered, as shown by the entire record." In Whittaker v. Gee, 63 Tex. 435, it was held by Chief Justice Willie as follows: "Frequent decisions of this court have settled the right to have a judgment amended after the expiration of the term at which it was obtained, when, through mistake or clerical error, the record does not speak fully or truly the judgment actually rendered in a cause."

A proceeding of such character, whose only purpose is to have the judgment entry speak truly the judgment as rendered, neither asserts nor seeks the enforcement of any new right. It presents no issue between the parties except in respect to the accuracy of the record, and otherwise involves the adjudication of nothing between them. It is powerless to reopen the controversy as closed and sealed by the judgment, and makes no such attempt. The inquiry under it is not what judgment might or ought to have been rendered, but only what judgment was rendered; and such is the sole issue to be determined. If an amended or corrected entry be ordered, the status of the parties and their relative rights, as decreed and fixed by the judgment, remains untouched and unaltered, in no sense adjudicated anew, but only judicially evidenced as originally determined. The result is that only that is done by the court which it had the inherent power to originally do as a part of its decision of the case, and which it would have done in the interest of a truthful record.

[4] It is as much the concern and duty of the court to have its records faithfully recite its judgments as it is to render the judgments themselves, and for that reason it is held that its jurisdiction over its records does not end with the term. In this sense a case is regarded as pending until the judgment rendered is correctly recorded. It is the right of parties to have such a record; and it ought not to be the law, and in our opinion it is not the law, that they are under the necessity of instituting an independent suit to obtain it.

[5] A proceeding of this nature cannot, therefore, be regarded as an "action" within the meaning of the statute referred to, and is not affected by the limitation therein provided.

It is not questioned here that in the injunction case above mentioned a judgment for $1,823 in favor of the defendants in error against the plaintiff in error was actually rendered by the court, and it is therefore beyond dispute that, because of the omission of this much of what the court pronounced, the entry upon the minutes failed as a record to evidence the entire judgment rendered in the case.

It should also be noted that this proceeding did not have for its purpose the correction or amendment of the judgment rendered by the court as distinguished from the entry of the judgment upon the minutes. It sought only to amend the entry, nunc pro tunc, so as to include that which was omitted and thereby afford a faithful record of the whole judgment. In other words, it did not seek the amendment or correction of a judicial mistake as distinguished from a clerical mistake or omission. It is clearly distinguishable, therefore, from the cases of De Camp v. Bates (Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 644, in which a writ of error was refused by this court and which is now invoked by the plaintiff in error (Railway Co. v. Haynes, 82 Tex. 448, 18 S. W. 605), and others which involved the correction, not of the entry of a judgment, but what was charged to have been a mistake in its rendition. In De Camp v. Bates the judgment as rendered was against a partnership. It was so entered without running also against the individual members of the partnership. Suit was filed to so correct it as to include a judgment against them individually. The trial court refused the relief, because, among other reasons, the evidence was not sufficient to show that the judgment as entered was not the judgment actually rendered. The case in effect was that as the judgment, not only as entered but as rendered, was not against the individual members of the partnership as it was claimed it should have been, the court was asked to correct the judgment so as to so render it. An amended rendition of the judgment was really the relief sought, which is distinctly different in its nature from an effort only to have accurately entered what had been correctly rendered.

In Railway Co. v. Haynes, the trial judge, in his computation of the damages he intended to award the plaintiffs, omitted a certain amount through oversight, and accordingly rendered judgment for a mistaken amount. The mistake consisted in the rendition of the judgment. It was a judicial mistake, not a clerical one, and was properly held as not subject to correction by the trial court on mere motion after adjournment of the term.

These two cases well illustrate the distinction which lies clearly defined between a suit to correct a judgment because of a mistake of the court in its rendition, whereby an improper judgment is rendered but its entry is in accordance with the rendition, and a proceeding to correct or supply the minutes of the court so as to have them truly recite the judgment actually rendered. To correct in the trial court, after adjournment of the term, a judgment as rendered, an independent action is necessary, as its jurisdiction of the case is at an end. In the latter instance the court may, at a subsequent term, of its own motion or upon the application of parties, order the proper entry because the inherent power that it possesses as a court over its own records endures for the sake of their verity.

[6] The right of parties to have the entry correspond with the judgment rendered is not affected, as is contended by counsel for plaintiff in error, by rule 48 for the government of the district courts (142 S. W. xxi), which provides that counsel of the party for whom a judgment is to be rendered shall prepare the form of the judgment to be entered and submit it to the court. While that rule imposes a proper duty upon counsel for the successful party and should be enforced, its operation is not such as to make the records of the court depend upon the diligence or care of counsel in the case. The court has an independent concern in the correctness of its records, and its right in the premises cannot be disposed of by the negligence or omission of attorneys for the parties.

[7] We do not regard the question of laches as involved in the case. True, there was an interval of six years between the date of the rendition of the judgment and the application for the nunc pro tunc entry; but laches means more than mere delay. The position of the parties had undergone no change, no intervening rights had accrued, and nothing was shown that made inequitable the granting of the order for a proper entry of the judgment. In the injunction case the plaintiff in error admitted in her pleadings that she owed the defendants in error the amount awarded; the judgment was therefore fairly rendered; it remained unsatisfied; and it was, accordingly, but right and just that it should be entered so that it might possess the force and virtue to which as a judgment it was entitled.

[8] While it is our opinion that the right to have the entry of a judgment corrected or amended so as to truthfully speak the judgment as rendered is not affected by statutes of limitation, we do not wish to be understood as holding that it may not be defeated by the laches of the party invoking it, under a correct application of that doctrine. It should be also stated that it can never be availed of to the prejudice of the rights of innocent third parties.

[9] The defendants in error in this proceeding sought to revive the judgment by scire facias, in addition to having a proper entry of it carried to the minutes, and in connection with their suit to so revive the judgment, as has been said, an attachment was sued out and levied. It is contended that an attachment could not lawfully issue in such a scire facias proceeding.

The judgment was dormant under the statute because no execution had been issued within a year from its rendition. No execution could issue in the first place until it was entered in the minutes. Brown v. Reese, 67 Tex. 318, 3 S. W. 292; Hubbart v. Willis State Bank, 55 Tex. Civ. App. 504, 119 S. W. 711. It was entitled to be revived, but until revived it could not be enforced by execution. Though dormant and its revival was sought by scire facias, it was nevertheless a debt. Slaughter v. Owens, 60 Tex. 671. While the technical judgment upon a scire facias to revive a judgment is ordinarily only that execution issue, effect should be given to the substance of the proceeding rather than its form. As the judgment was a debt, the proceeding to revive it was nothing more nor less than a suit for debt, and the attachment was accordingly authorized. As early as Bullock v. Ballew, 9 Tex. 498, it was recognized that an action to revive a judgment is substantially an action of debt. With a judgment debtor about to make a fraudulent disposition of his property the law would impose upon an owner of a dormant judgment a hard condition if, with the right to an execution refused, it likewise denied him the right to an attachment upon the institution of a suit to revive his judgment.

The honorable Court of Civil Appeals has correctly disposed of the case. Its judgment and that of the district court should be affirmed, and it is so ordered.

GILES v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 949*) — NEW TRIAL — GROUNDS—VERIFICATION.

A judgment of conviction will not be set aside on the ground that accused, as shown by his verification alone in support of his motion for new trial, was taken by surprise, in that his attorneys, who had been employed by his relatives, refused to go into the case at the last moment, and before he had opportunity to employ other counsel, and that he was thereby deprived of witnesses who could establish a defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2337-2344; Dec. Dig. § 949.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1114*)—RECORD—ABSENCE OF TESTIMONY AND BILLS OF EXCEPTIONS—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE.

Where the record on appeal does not contain the testimony or bills of exceptions, the question whether an issue was material, and that accused was entitled to have the jury pass on certain testimony, will not be considered.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Barry Miller, Judge.

Merritt Giles was convicted of burglary of a railroad car, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary of a railroad car; his punishment being assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] The grounds of the motion for a new trial are not verified, other than by the fact that appellant swore to the motion. The first ground of the motion sets out the fact that he was taken by surprise, in that his attorneys, who had been employed by his relatives, refused to go into the case at the last moment and before he had opportunity to employ other counsel; that he was deprived of any witnesses by reason of that fact; that he could establish a defense by several witnesses whose names are mentioned, and by whom he could prove an alibi. This is in no way verified, except by his personal affidavit. The attorneys who were supposed to have been employed by his relatives were not brought before the court, nor was any evidence offered to show that his statement was true. A judgment of conviction usually will not be set aside simply upon the affidavit of counsel, without verification in some manner by bill of exceptions or facts introduced to show the truthfulness of the statement.

[2] By the second ground of the motion he says he could show he was arrested by a policeman named Briggs, and that on the trial Hardy swore that he was the man who arrested defendant. He says this was a material issue, and that he was entitled to have the jury pass on this testimony. These matters are all too late, when raised in the motion for new trial, and in the absence of the testimony and bills of exception, which are not sent up with the record, we cannot intelligently revise any of these questions.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. WITNESSES (§ 344*)—EVIDENCE—REPUTATION OF PROSECUTRIX.

Accused, on a trial for rape on a female under the age of 15 years, may, to affect her credibility, show that prior to the time of the alleged offense she had been an inmate of houses of ill fame, but he may not prove, as affecting her credibility, isolated or independent acts of immorality.

Though accused, on a trial for rape on a female under the age of 15 years, showed on the cross-examination of prosecutrix that her act with him was the first act committed, he could not impeach her by showing her prior individual and isolated acts of immorality.

Appeal from District Court, Nueces County; W. B. Hopkins, Judge.

John Bigliben was convicted of crime, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Pope & Taylor and H. R. Sutherland, all of Corpus Christi, for appellant. U. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of rape on Maud Elaine Sargent, a girl alleged to have been under 15 years of age, and his punishment assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] In this case it is shown by several bills of exception that the prosecuting witness, Miss Maud Sargent, testified to an act of intercourse with appellant on the 25th day of December, 1910, and that appellant while cross-examining her asked several questions, and she answered as stated; the questions and answers being: "Q. You told Mrs. Thomas how you happened to do wrong in the first instance? Did you tell her that? A. Yes, sir. Q. That you told Mrs. Thomas that the first time that you had carnal intercourse with a person was with this defendant? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that true? A. Yes, sir. Q. How came you to tell Mrs. Thomas? A. Because she asked me how I came—how it was that I came to have to go to such a place as the rescue home. Q. How came you to have to go to such a place as the rescue home, and you told her of this one particular act of intercourse, was that it? A. I told her how I came to make the mistake the first time; yes, sir. Q. Did you state to Mrs. Thomas that the first time that you had carnal intercourse with a person was with this defendant? A. Yes, sir. Q. Was that true? A. Yes, sir." Several questions along this line were asked the witness by appellant's counsel, and he then asked her, "Do you know if you swear a lie you can be sent to the penitentiary?" and she answered that she did, when the question was asked, "Now, do you mean to swear that on the 25th day of December, 1910, was the first time you ever had carnal intercourse with any man?" when the district attorney objected on the ground that same was immaterial and irrelevant, which objection was sustained by the court. Appellant's counsel stated to the court that the witness had testified to an act of intercourse with the defendant on December 25, 1910, and had said this was the first act of intercourse she ever had with any man, and he was asking these questions with the purpose and expectation of proving that prior to December 25, 1910, she had visited houses of prostitution belonging to Ida Mitchell, Hannah Brandt, and Ida Murray, and while in those houses she had had intercourse with a dozen different men, naming them, all prior to December 25, 1910, when the state's counsel moved the court to exclude that portion of the witness' testimony in which she stated this was the first act of intercourse, and that she had so told Mrs. Thomas, which motion was by the court sustained. Appellant, when offering his testimony, tendered testimony to show that the prosecuting witness had been an inmate of these three houses of prostitution, and while in those houses had submitted to acts of intercourse with Will Lingenfeldt and 24 others, naming each of them, all prior to the time she stated she had had this act of intercourse with appellant. The court refused to permit appellant to ask her if she had had intercourse with these men or either of them in these houses of prostitution prior to December 25th, and refused to permit the defendant to offer any proof that she had been an i-

mate of these houses prior to that time, or had had intercourse with these men, on the ground that he had stricken from the record all testimony that would show that the act of intercourse with appellant was the first act of intercourse.

Appellant in a number of bills excepted to the action of the court in striking this testimony from the record, and in excluding this testimony, specially excepting on the ground that, while the court had stricken from the record the testimony of the witness that this was the first act of intercourse, yet the court had permitted to remain in the record as evidence before the jury the testimony that at the time of this intercourse "she bled and it pained her, and that she almost fainted at the time." In this case the prosecuting witness testifies positively to the act of intercourse with appellant on December 25th, while appellant positively denies having had intercourse with her on that date, or at any other time. Of course, if the prosecuting witness was under 15 years of age, it would be immaterial whether or not she had had intercourse with any other man, for if appellant had intercourse with her he would be guilty under the statute; yet if a witness has become so morally depraved as to become an inmate of a public house of prostitution, and offers her body for sale publicly, we think testimony showing that fact ought to be admitted as affecting her credit as a witness in this character of case. And when the defendant offered testimony that, prior to the time she says she had this act of intercourse with appellant, she was an inmate of a house of prostitution in Corpus Christi, receiving men and selling her person to them, this conduct showed such a depraved state of morals as to render such testimony admissible. We have always held that, when a person has been charged with or convicted of any offense which would involve moral turpitude, it may be shown to affect their credit. In this case a girl claiming to be under 15 years of age says she had an act of intercourse with a certain man. He denies it, and offers to show, as affecting her credit as a witness, that she was an inmate of a house of prostitution immediately prior to that alleged act, and he ought to have been permitted to introduce evidence of that fact; the court, of course, instructing the jury the purpose for which said testimony was admitted. Of course, it is not intended to hold that other isolated acts of intercourse may be shown as affecting her credit, or for any other purpose; it is only where by her whole conduct and course in life she manifests that low state of morals which would place her in the category of what is known as a common prostitute, that it becomes admissible. McGrath v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 415, 34 S. W. 127, 941.

[2] The court did not err in refusing to permit appellant to prove individual acts of intercourse, and, if her testimony that the intercourse with appellant was the first act had not been stricken from the record, it would not have been permissible to impeach her on that point, as he had drawn it out on cross-examination, and it would be impeachment upon an issue that would furnish no defense, yet the fact that she was an inmate of a house of prostitution ought to have been admitted.

[3] Another sharply contested issue in the case was the age of the prosecuting witness. She testified she would become 15 years old on January 11th, 17 days after the date on which she says the offense was committed. The defendant offered proof that she had told a number of people that she was 16 years of age at that time, and her appearance, etc., appears proven in the record. In rebuttal the state introduced in evidence what the prosecuting witness says was the family Bible with the date of her birth entered therein, as she says, in her father's handwriting. The record discloses that her father was living, and in attendance on court, and the witness says she does not know when the entry was made by her father. When an entry of date of birth is made in a family Bible, at or about the time of birth, and this fact is proven, it is admissible to thus show the date of birth. But when the father is living and in attendance on court, and the entry is shown to be in his handwriting, and no testimony is offered as to when he made the entry in the Bible, it should not be admitted; but, if it is desired to prove that fact, let him be called, or some witness called who can testify that the entry was made contemporaneous with the event. An entry of this character shown to have been made at or about the date of birth is, if anything, stronger evidence than one's memory.

[4] There are a number of other questions presented, but we deem it unnecessary to discuss them. Those bills which attempt to complain of the failure to permit them to show that the prosecuting witness and her father attempted to blackmail several people by stating, if they would pay so much money, prosecutrix and her father would leave the country, otherwise prosecutions would be instituted, are not in condition we can review them, for, while the questions propounded are shown, the answers to the questions are not stated, nor is it stated what could have been proven.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

YOUNG et al. v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 310*)—ASSAULT TO KILL—INSTRUCTIONS—AGGRAVATED ASSAULT.

Where it might have been found from the testimony in a prosecution for assault to kill that there was no intent to kill, but simply a shooting to frighten, or merely to injure, an instruction that if the assault resulted in a killing, which would have been manslaughter, a verdict of aggravated assault would be proper in view of the fact that no killing occurred, was too restrictive; and the refusal of an instruction that, if serious bodily injury was inflicted with a deadly weapon under circumstances not amounting to an intent to kill or maim, the offense would be an aggravated assault, was error.

2. HOMICIDE (§ 86*)—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO KILL—"AGGRAVATED ASSAULT."

Where there is no intent to kill, but simply a shooting to frighten or even to inflict injury without killing, the offense is aggravated assault.

3. HOMICIDE (§ 84*)—"ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT MURDER"—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE.

To constitute the offense of assault with intent to murder, there must be an assault with a specific intent to kill actuated by malice; but many cases may arise where there is a specific intent to kill, and yet where the assault would not be an assault with intent to kill where no killing resulted.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 761*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY—ASSUMPTION OF FACTS.

In a prosecution for assault to kill, a charge assuming as a fact that defendants, or one of them, were in the wrong from the beginning, and had assaulted the prosecuting witness with unlawful intent, when such conduct on the part of defendants was a disputed issue, was erroneous as a charge on the weight of the evidence.

Appeal from District Court, Jasper County; W. B. Powell, Judge.

Will Young and Tom Longwood were convicted of assault to murder, and they appeal. Reversed and remanded.

J. J. Lee, of Jasper, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This conviction was for assault to murder. Young was given 15 years, and his codefendant, Tom Longwood, was given 2 years.

On the 16th day of March, this year, appellants, while en route from the town of Remlig to Browndell, carried with them in a hand grip some whisky, which Young had received at the express office. Between the two places they met prosecuting witness Oakes and his companion by the name of Alvis. Oakes asked for whisky and finally a sale was made to him of a pint of whisky. There is testimony tending to show that Oakes attempted to arrest appellants, and that he undertook to draw a pistol. Appellant Young drew a pistol, and fired at Oakes two or three times; one shot taking effect in his arm. The testimony is seriously in conflict as to whether Oakes was shot at after he was disarmed. He was disarmed during the trouble. The testimony is widely variant in regard to the circumstances attending the difficulty. The testimony of Alvis, who was with Oakes, is about as follows: "Mr. Oakes bought a pint from them [meaning whisky]. I did not know the fellow that came along. Mr. Oakes had a $5 bill, and got the change from that man. [This seems to have been a passing white man, who was not, however, used as a witness in the case.] Mr. Oakes said, 'You go on with us,' and Will Young got his pistol from under his overalls." Oakes denied this testimony of Alvis. He remarked that "we would all go together," and defendant's testimony is to the effect that Oakes reached for his pistol and said, "Hold up," and Alvis jerked his pistol and fired one shot, striking Longwood in the hip or leg. Longwood was shot by somebody. The state's contention was that the ball that struck the arm of Oakes also struck Longwood. Young's testimony is to the effect that he thought he was being held up by somebody, and he did not know but they were going to rob him at the time Oakes reached for his pistol, and Alvis pulled his and fired. Alvis denied having any pistol. The testimony further shows as soon as the firing began Alvis ran in one direction and Longwood in the opposite direction. The testimony is also directly in conflict as to how Longwood obtained the pistol that belonged to Oakes. The defendants' testimony is that Oakes when struck in the arm dropped his pistol, and, when Longwood came back, Young told him to pick it up, and they would not return it to Oakes for fear he might raise further trouble with them, or shoot them, and the pistol was given to somebody else, and finally returned to Oakes. Oakes' testimony is to the effect that he did not draw his pistol, and, after Longwood returned to the scene of the trouble after his flight, that appellant Young made him get the pistol from off Oakes' person. Appellant Young testified he did not intend to kill Oakes; that he could have done so with ease, especially after Oakes' pistol had dropped. The parties were only a few feet apart. Oakes' testimony indicates Young did intend to kill him. It is unnecessary to go into a detailed statement of the testimony. It may be generally stated that it is as seriously in conflict as testimony well could be. The defendants

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes say that they did not know that Oakes was an officer, and state, further, if they had known he was an officer, they never would have exhibited their whisky, and especially would not have sold any.

There are two propositions submitted for revision: First, the court failed to submit to the jury all the phases of aggravated assault made by the testimony, and practically directed the jury that, unless the minds of appellant at the time of the assault were incapable of cool reflection, they would be guilty of an assault with intent to murder, even though there was no specific intent to kill said Oakes by them; second, that the charge of the court was upon the weight of the evidence in many places, and assumed in several portions of the charge that defendants or one of them had an unlawful intent, and that an offense had been committed by them, and was, therefore, prejudicial to them.

[1] The court in his charge limited the jury in their consideration of aggravated assault to the theory that had the assault resulted in a killing, and it would have been manslaughter, then the jury would be justified in returning an aggravated assault verdict in view of the fact that no killing occurred. It is contended that this charge is entirely too restrictive, and that the jury should have been further instructed that it would have been an aggravated assault when serious bodily injury is inflicted upon the person assaulted, and when committed with a deadly weapon under circumstances not amounting to an intent to murder or maim. We are of opinion that the contention of appellant is correct.

[2] If there was no intent to kill, but simply by shooting at him to frighten him or even to inflict injury upon him without killing, then the assault would be of no higher grade than aggravated assault.

[3] In order to constitute the offense of assault with intent to murder, there must be an assault, and there must be a specific intent to kill, and this must be actuated by malice. There are many cases that arise and can arise where there was a specific intent to kill, and yet the assault would not be an assault with intent to murder where the killing did not occur. There must always be, however, the specific intent to kill in any event in order to constitute an assault with intent to murder. This question was fully discussed by Judge Ramsey in Henderson v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 15, 115 S. W. 45. That case is quite similar to this in the main contention. The judgment in that case was reversed upon the grounds urged here for reversal. The court should have given in charge to the jury the law of aggravated assault here contended for by appellants.

[4] The charge of the court, we think, is subject to the criticism that it is on the weight of the evidence. To make this clear the following portion of the charge is quoted: "When one offense is actually committed by one or more persons, and others are present, and, knowing the unlawful intent, aid by acts or encourage by words or gestures those actually engaged in the commission of the unlawful act, all are principal offenders, and may be prosecuted and convicted as such. The mere presence of Tom Longwood at the place where the shooting took place does not make him a principal. He must not only have been there, but must have known of the intent of his codefendant to assault J. M. Oakes, and, so knowing such unlawful intent, aided by acts or encouraged by words or gestures the said Will Young in the commission of the offense. No act done by Tom Longwood after all the shooting was over, however reprehensible it may have been, can make him a principal offender. His action or words in reference to the offense must have all been committed and said before the assault was made. If after the first shots were made by Will Young the said Tom Longwood came back and held a pistol on said Oakes, while his codefendant, Will Young, shot or shot at him again, if he did do so, such would make him, the said Longwood, a principal offender from such time. But if the shooting occurred between his codefendant Will Young and said Oakes, and he, said Longwood, knew nothing of the unlawful intent, and did not participate in the difficulty until after the shooting was over, he would not be a principal and you cannot convict him in this case." It will be noticed that the charge assumed a state of facts as if these parties were in the wrong, and especially the defendant Young. It may be stated as a fact that there was no question that Young fired two or three times. The state contends he fired four or five times. This is denied by defendants' witnesses, they stating that he only fired twice, and that, after Oakes was disarmed, he fired no more. The charge here assumes, or at least apparently assumes, the fact that defendants were in the wrong, and especially Young, from the beginning, and were the assaulting parties. The charge does not put it in the alternative, but assumes that Young was doing these things, and in such manner as to indicate that he was in the wrong. It is the rule in Texas under our statute that the charge must be so framed as not to assume facts against the defendant where the issues are in dispute. The jury is to decide those matters, and the charge must be so framed as not to invade the province of the jury. See Ponton v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 597, 34 S. W. 950; Bradford v. State, 25 Tex. App. 723, 9 S. W. 46; Searcy v. State, 1 Tex. App. 440; article 715, White's Ann. Code of Crim. Procedure. To illustrate, the court charged the jury that the mere presence of Longwood would not make him a principal. He must have known of the intent of Young to assault Oakes, and, so knowing such unlawful intent, encouraged said Young in the commission of the offense. This charge assumes a material fact in the case, or one of the material facts, and that was that Young had an intent and an unlawful one, and further that such unlawful intent was to assault Oakes, and the further material fact that Young had committed an offense. Upon another trial the charge in these respects will be given so as to avoid being upon the weight of the evidence.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

MORGAN v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1097*)—RECORD—QUESTIONS REVIEWABLE—REFUSAL OF INSTRUCTIONS.

Where the record on appeal from a conviction of murder in the first degree contains no statement of facts, the refusal to submit a lesser degree in the charge cannot be reviewed on appeal.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Barry Miller, Judge.

Frank Morgan was convicted of murder in the first degree, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of murder in the first degree, and his punishment assessed at life imprisonment in the penitentiary.

The record is before us without a statement of facts. The appellant in his motion for new trial complains that the court should have submitted the lesser degree of murder than murder in the first degree in his charge. Without a statement of facts we cannot determine whether this should have been done or not; but from the nature of the offense, murder in an attempt to rob, we are inclined to think, if the facts were before us, we would hold that the court properly only submitted murder in the first degree.

There are many other grounds in the motion for new trial; but, in the condition the record is in, nothing is presented for us to review.

The judgment is affirmed.

GERRON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—RECORD—SUFFICIENCY.

The sufficiency of the evidence to support a verdict and judgment cannot be reviewed, where the record contains no statement of facts or bills of exception.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1090*)—APPEAL—RECORD—SUFFICIENCY.

Rulings on the admission of evidence cannot be reviewed, where the bills of exception thereto are not contained in the record.

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Barry Miller, Judge.

Henry Geron was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of burglary; his punishment being assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1, 2] The record is before us without statement of facts or bills of exception. The grounds of the motion for new trial are based on the insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict and judgment, and two additional grounds allege that the court erred in excluding evidence and in admitting evidence as set out in bills of exception. The bills of exception are not in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

GERRON v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Barry Miller, Judge.

Henry Gerron was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. The appellant was indicted by proper indictment for burglary, and under a correct charge was convicted.

There is neither bills of exceptions nor statement of facts. The questions attempted to be raised by the motion for new trial cannot be considered without a statement of facts.

The judgment is therefore affirmed.

McDOWELL v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. HOMICIDE (§ 308*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that if the jury believed from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant on the specified day, with a knife which was then and there from the manner of its use a deadly weapon, did cut and kill deceased as charged in the indictment, they should find defendant guilty of murder in the second degree, was erroneous as authorizing a conviction, though defendant may have killed deceased in self-defense, or been guilty of no higher offense than manslaughter, or unintentional killing.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 642-648; Dec. Dig. § 308.*]

2. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—SUDDEN PASSION—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where defendant and deceased had been intimate friends before the killing, and had had no previous difficulty, and there was no ill will or grudge between them prior to the fight which culminated in the homicide, it was error not to charge in accordance with White's Ann. Pen. Code 1911, art. 1149, that if defendant killed deceased under the influence of sudden passion, but by the use of means not calculated to produce death, he would not be guilty of homicide, unless it appeared there was a specific intent on his part to kill deceased.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

3. HOMICIDE (§ 309*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, there was no evidence of provocation other than the blows inflicted on deceased by accused at the time of the difficulty, it was error to charge on manslaughter that the provocation must arise at the time, and must not be caused or brought about by any former provocation, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 649-656; Dec. Dig. § 309.*]

4. HOMICIDE (§ 300*)—INSTRUCTIONS—SELF-DEFENSE.

In a prosecution for homicide, an instruction that if the jury believed that deceased was advancing on defendant and striking at him, and defendant had a knife in his hand, with which he had been whittling before the trouble commenced, and while defendant was backing and attempting to ward off the blows of defendant he struck him with the knife unintentionally and accidentally, and with no intent to injure or hurt him, then defendant should be acquitted, was objectionable as infringing the right of self-defense, since if defendant was warding off the blows of deceased, who was striking at defendant while he was retreating, and by such means deceased was cut with defendant's knife, and with no intent on defendant's part to injure him, then defendant was entitled to an acquittal, and if defendant under such circumstances struck deceased with a knife, with or without an intent, he might not be guilty, being entitled to stand on his right of self-defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 614-632; Dec. Dig. § 300.*]

Appeal from District Court, Collin County; J. M. Pearson, Judge.

Clint McDowell was convicted of murder in the second degree, and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Clarence Merritt, of McKinney, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of murder in the second degree; his punishment being assessed at five years confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] Submitting the issue of murder in the second degree, the court thus charged the jury: "If you believe from the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that the defendant, in the county of Collin and state of Texas, on the 21st day of May, 1911, as alleged, with a knife which was then and there from the manner of its use, a deadly weapon, did cut T. W. Allred and thereby kill T. W. Allred as charged in the indictment, you will find him guilty of murder in the second degree, and assess his punishment at confinement in the state penitentiary for any period that the jury may determine and state in their verdict, provided it be not less than five years." There were quite a number of exceptions to this charge urged below and insisted upon as grounds for reversal here. This charge has been condemned in many cases as being incorrect. It would authorize the conviction of appellant for murder in the second degree, although he may have killed in self-defense, or have been guilty of no higher offense than manslaughter, or even if it was an unintentional killing. For this error the judgment must be reversed. Clark v. State, 51 Tex. Cr. R. 519, 102 S. W. 1186; Best v. State, 58 Tex. Cr. R. 327, 125 S. W. 909; Smith v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 585, 124 S. W. 679; Patton v. State, 62 Tex. Cr. R. 71, 136 S. W. 459; Anderson v. State, 144 S. W. 282.

[2] It is contended the court erred in not charging the provisions of article 1149 of the Revised Penal Code, to the effect that if they believed defendant killed the deceased under the influence of sudden passion, but by the use of means not calculated to produce death, defendant would not be guilty of homicide, unless it appeared that there was a specific intent on the part of the defendant to kill the deceased. It seems that the evidence in this connection raised several issues: First, that appellant intentionally stabbed the deceased; second, that it was an accident; third, that appellant did not intend to kill deceased; fourth, that he was acting in self-defense; and, fifth, that the facts presented manslaughter. The weapon used was a pocketknife. This weapon, of course, might or might not be a deadly weapon, owing to the manner of its use and the attendant circumstances. Some of the evidence for the state indicates that appellant intentionally stabbed the deceased, and under circumstances that did not suggest self-defense or manslaughter. Several witnesses testified that the trouble came up between two other parties than the defendant and deceased, and appellant said "let them have a fair fist fight." The deceased interfered and used violent epithets towards appellant, and struck him one or more licks, causing pain and bloodshed; that appellant was backing away, and did back 15 or 18 feet from the deceased who was following him up, inflicting the blows mentioned. Appellant's testimony would suggest that he was acting in self-defense, that he had his knife in his hand whittling at the time of the difficulty, and was squatting down or was kneeling down on the ground at the time deceased first struck him. The testimony all shows without contradiction that defendant and deceased were young men barely grown, had been intimate friends and "chums," and, so far as the record is concerned, they seemed not to have had any previous difficulty. Some of the testimony shows just immediately prior to the trouble they had their arms around each other, both somewhat under the influence of intoxicants. This was in a friendly, manner. It may be stated as an undisputed fact from the evidence that the difficulty came up all in a moment, and that there was no ill will or grudge between them prior to the incidents of the fight itself. Appellant testified he did not intend to kill his heretofore friend. We are of opinion under these circumstances upon another trial the court should submit to the jury the provisions of the article referred to.

[3] Another error is assigned on the charge of the court with reference to manslaughter. The court instructed the jury in this connection that the provocation must arise at the time, and must not be caused or brought about by any former provocation, etc. Upon another trial the charge should be limited to the facts. There was no provocation testified to by any witness other than the licks inflicted by deceased upon appellant at the time of the difficulty.

[4] The court charged the law of self-defense from real and apparent danger, then followed it immediately with this charge: "If you find and believe from the evidence that Wood Allred was advancing on the defendant and striking at him, and you further believe from the evidence that the defendant had a knife in his hand, which he had had in his hand and was whittling with before the trouble commenced, and that while defendant was backing and attempting to ward off the blows of Wood Allred, and you further believe from the evidence while warding off the blows of his assailant that he struck Wood Allred with the knife unintentionally and accidentally, and with no intent to injure or hurt him, then you will acquit the defendant, and say by your verdict not guilty." The criticism of this charge as it is given seems to be correct. This would indicate an infringement on the right of self-defense. If appellant was warding off the blows of the deceased, who was striking at him while appellant was retreating, and by this means he cut the deceased with his knife and with no intent to injure, they should acquit. If under those circumstances he struck the deceased with the knife with or without intent, he might be not guilty, and stand upon his right of self-defense. Upon another trial the question of accidental cutting of the deceased should be given disconnected with the theory of self-defense, or at least given in such way as not to infringe the right of self-defense.

For the errors indicated, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of burglary, and his punishment assessed at 10 years' confinement in the state penitentiary.

Accompanying the record is a letter from appellant's attorney, stating that it is appellant's desire to withdraw his appeal. The rules of this court provide that such request must be signed in person and sworn to by the person convicted of crime. However, there is no statement of facts accompanying the record, and there is no question raised in the motion for new trial that we can review under such circumstances.

FIELDS v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 87*)—FINDING OF INDICTMENT—DATE OF OFFENSE.

Where the record shows that the term of court at which an indictment was found and trial had thereunder began on April 1st and adjourned on June 29th, and that the trial and conviction were had on June 20th, and that on May 22d the grand jury in open court presented the indictment charging the offense on May 4th, the recital that the indictment was filed April 22d was a typographical or other error, and the indictment as a matter of fact was found and presented to the court subsequent to the date of the offense alleged therein, as required by White's Ann. Code Cr. Proc. arts. 433, 434.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 244-255; Dec. Dig. § 87.*]

Appeal from Criminal District Court, Dallas County; Robt. B. Seay, Judge.

Henry Fields was convicted of theft, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Ellis P. House, of Dallas, for appellant.
J. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. By proper indictment and under a correct charge appellant was convicted of the theft of a mule.

There is no bill of exceptions in the record. Neither is there any statement of facts. Nor is there any motion for a new trial. After this case was submitted, the appellant, through his attorney, filed a suggestion to the court that the indictment charges that the offense was committed on May 4, 1912, and claims that the indictment was filed in said court on April 22, 1912. Therefore the indictment charging the offense was committed after the indictment was filed, and it must necessarily result in the reversal of this case.

The record conclusively shows that the term of court at which this indictment was found and trial had convened on April 1, 1912, and adjourned on June 29, 1912. The trial and conviction were had on June 20, 1912. The record further conclusively shows that this order was entered at the very time the indictment was returned into court: "Wednesday, May 22, 1912. On this the 22d day of May, A. D. 1912, came the grand jury for the body of the county of Dallas, a quorum being present, and in open court presented, and delivered to the judge of the criminal district court of Dallas county, Texas, the following bills of indictments, indorsed 'A True Bill' and signed by their foreman, J. C. Rugel, to wit: The State of Texas, No. 11,487, v. Henry Fields, Theft of a Mule." Then follows a copy of this indictment in this case charging that the offense was committed on the 4th day of May, 1912. At the foot of the indictment it is shown in an attempted copy of the indorsement on the indictment, "Filed April 22, 1912." Taking the record as a whole, there can be no doubt but that this statement purporting to be a copy of what is indorsed on the indictment, showing it was filed April 22, 1912, is clearly a mistake and should have been, "Filed May 22, 1912." Therefore we conclude that as a matter of fact this indictment was found, presented to the court in open session on May 22, 1912, and was then filed, and not before then, and that the recitation that it was filed April 22d, instead of May 22d, is clearly a typographical or other error. C. C. P. arts. 433, 434, and cases noted thereunder in White's annotation.

Therefore, there being no error assigned and none appearing, the judgment will be affirmed.

ELDER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 155*)—EVIDENCE—PREPARATION TO COMMIT CRIME.

On prosecution for slandering defendant's wife by charging misconduct with S., circumstances tending to show preparation on the part of S. for the commission of the offense are admissible as tending to show the commission of such offense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 430-436; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

2. LIBEL AND SLANDER (§ 155*)—CRIMINAL PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE.

Where accused was charged with slandering his wife in charging her with misconduct with S., and accused sought to use the flight of S. as an incriminating circumstance, the court properly permitted him to testify to a statement made to him by the wife as furnishing a reason for his flight consistent with their innocence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Libel and Slander, Cent. Dig. §§ 430-436; Dec. Dig. § 155.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 277*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.

Where the state claimed that defendant had slandered his wife to manufacture evidence to obtain a divorce, that he might marry M., the court properly permitted the state to cross-examine defendant with reference to his attentions to M.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 925, 979-984; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420*)—HEARSAY.

Where accused was charged with slandering his wife, and several young men testified to facts damaging to the wife's reputation for chastity, though denying any ill will toward her, evidence that a boy whose name was unknown to the witness had told witness that the boys around T. where the parties resided had it in for the wife, because she would not permit them to hang around the telephone office, was hearsay, and inadmissible.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 789*)—INSTRUCTION—REASONABLE DOUBT.

Where, in a prosecution for slandering defendant's wife by charging her with improper intimacy with S., defendant did not deny speaking the language charged, but claimed it was true, and there was evidence justifying a reasonable man in believing that his wife had been unduly intimate with S., it was error to refuse to charge that, before accused could be convicted, the jury must find beyond a reasonable doubt that the statements were false, and that they were maliciously and wantonly made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1846-1849, 1904-1922, 1960, 1967; Dec. Dig. § 789.*]

Appeal from Taylor County Court; Thomas A. Bledsoe, Judge.

J. F. Elder was convicted of slander and he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Ben L. Cox, of Abilene, for appellant. C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. In this case appellant was prosecuted and convicted of slandering his wife, in that he charged her with a lack of chastity, and his punishment assessed at a fine of $300 and 30 days' imprisonment in the county jail.

The facts are of that nature that we do not think any good purpose could be accomplished by stating them; they in some respects being rather obscene. If appellant wrongfully made the charges alleged, he would richly deserve the punishment fixed by the jury. Appellant did not deny using the language alleged, but hinged his defense on the proposition that what he stated to Mr. Browning was true.

[1] The record discloses that Charley Skillern, whom appellant charged with having sexual intercourse with his wife, was attending the telephone at night; the wife of appellant sleeping in an adjoining room. On the night in question appellant pretended to leave the town on a night train, and shortly thereafter he says he placed a ladder against the walls of the building in which the telephone office was situated, and, climbing up the ladder, he claims he saw Skillern and his wife in a very compromising position. Skillern fled, leaving his hat, tie, and some other wearing apparel. This Skillern explains in a way entirely consistent with his and Mrs. Elder's innocence, but while Skillern was testifying, and while appellant was cross-examining him in regard thereto, appellant propounded to Skillern the question: "If he (Skillern) had not that night purchased from Lee Rutherford some condoms?" The state objected to the witness being permitted or required to answer this question, which objection was sustained, and appellant by proper bill shows he reserved an exception to the ruling of the court. Appellant offered to testify and introduce other testimony that on the night in question Skillern did purchase condoms from Rutherford, but, on objection being made by the state, the court refused to permit him to introduce such testimony. As we have stated, this case was tried wholly on the issue of whether or not the statement was true, and as the allegation was that appellant had stated "he had caught Skillern in bed with his (appellant's) wife," and, exhibiting Skillern's hat and collar, said, "This is what I got out of that f—k—g scrape last night," we are of the opinion that this testimony about the purchase of condoms that night should have been admitted. It would be a circumstance tending to show preparation on Skillern's part to have intercourse with some person, and was a legitimate circumstance to have been proven under the facts in this case.

[2] The court did not err in permitting Skillern to testify to a statement made to him by appellant's wife, as this furnished a reason for his flight, consistent with his and her innocence, and, as appellant was seeking to use this flight as an incriminating circumstance, it was proper to permit it to be explained.

[3] The state's theory was that the allegations were wholly untrue and slanderous, and that it was an effort to manufacture testimony upon which appellant could obtain a divorce from his wife, that he might marry a Mrs. Moore. Under such circumstances, we do not think the court erred in permitting witness to state, and defendant to be cross-examined, as to his attentions to Mrs. Moore just prior to this occasion, for, if true, it might furnish such incentive as contended for by the state.

[4] The court over the objection of defendant permitted the state to prove by the witness Browning "that a boy, whose name he had forgotten, told him (Browning) that the boys around Trent had it in for Mrs. Elder because she would not permit them to hang around the telephone office." This was hearsay and inadmissible, and under the circumstances of the case peculiarly harmful. Several young men had testified to facts damaging to Mrs. Elder's reputation for chastity, and whose testimony would tend strongly to support the contention of appellant. These young men denied entertaining any ill will toward Mrs. Elder, and no testimony was introduced showing that they did entertain such feelings, unless it be the hearsay statement testified to by Mr. Browning. Mr. Browning was unable to give the name of his informant, and he did not claim that the person making the statement individuated or had any reference to the young men who testified for appellant in this case, and yet this hearsay statement was introduced to affect their testimony and render it less credible.

[5] The appellant requested the court to charge the jury: "You are instructed that, if you should find from the evidence that the defendant made the statements that he is alleged to have made to the witness Browning, you are instructed that, before you could convict the defendant, it would be necessary for you to further find beyond a reasonable doubt that said statements were false, and that same were wantonly or maliciously made by the defendant." As before stated, that appellant used the language alleged was not a contested issue, and under the peculiar facts of this case we think this charge should have been given. It correctly called the attention of the jury to the material issues in the case—whether or not the allegation was true, and whether or not it was wantonly or maliciously made. Whether the statement was false or true, appellant, according to the state's testimony, saw his wife and Skillern in a position that would arouse suspicion in almost any man. Skillern testified: "I saw Mr. Elder at the depot, and I also saw Tom McLeod and Charlie Bishop. I went back up to the telephone office from the station and pulled off my hat, collar, and tie and shoes, and was preparing to go to bed. Mrs. Elder had been in the telephone office prior to this time, and she had been sitting on the opposite side of the bed to me. That is, she was sitting on the side next to the door that opens into the other room, and I was sitting on the side of the bed toward the switchboard. Mr. Elder came up a ladder to the north window of the telephone office and stuck his head in at the window, and says, 'God damn you, I have caught you.' I says to him: 'That is not the way to come in. Get down, and come around to the door if you want to come in.' He then went down the ladder, and I started to the door to let him in, and Mrs. Elder said to me, 'You had better get out of the telephone office because Frank is drinking, and he might hurt you.' Mr. Elder had gone down the ladder, at this time, and hadn't yet come up the steps to the door. I did get out of the telephone office by jumping down on the awning from the back window of the room where Mrs. Elder's things were, and I ran away." If while laboring under a false impression, if such be the fact, appellant made the remarks alleged, they were highly improper, yet in such state of case the issue should be clearly presented as to whether it was maliciously and wantonly done. Stayton v. State, 46 Tex. Cr. R. 207, 78 S. W. 1071, 108 Am. St. Rep. 988; Tippens v. State, 43 S. W. 1001.

We do not deem it necessary to discuss the other questions presented in the motion for new trial, but, on account of the above errors, the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Appeal from District Court, Panola County; W. C. Buford, Judge.

Jasper Black was convicted of pursuing the business of selling intoxicants in prohibition territory, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Brooke & Woolworth, of Carthage, for appellant. O. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

HARPER, J. Appellant was prosecuted and convicted of the offense of pursuing the occupation of selling intoxicating liquors in prohibition territory, and his punishment assessed at two years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1] The appellant after conviction attempted to appeal his case by filing an appeal bond. The bond copied in the record is not drawn in accordance with the law. It does not recite that appellant has been convicted of any offense, does not disclose the punishment assessed, and does not bind the appellant "to abide the judgment of this court" in this case. Neither has it been approved by the judge trying the case, and in no sense is it in compliance with articles 903 and 904 of the Code of Criminal Procedure.

For these reasons, the cause must be dismissed.

On Motion for Rehearing.

At a former day of this term this case was dismissed on account of defective appeal bond. Appellant has filed his affidavit and a certificate of the clerk showing that the bond copied in the record is not the bond on file in the district court, but the bond, as filed by appellant, is in full compliance with the law governing appeals, and, of course, is entitled to have this cause reinstated. The clerk states: "On the last day of the term the motion for a new trial was by the court in all things overruled as shown by records in the said cause, and that on the said 25th day of April the said district court of Panola county, Tex., adjourned for the term, and that on the said day there was filed in my office by the attorneys for Jasper Black an appeal bond, of which said bond the following is an exact and literal and verbatim copy, and which said bond was approved by the Hon. W. C. Buford, judge of the said district court, and W. D. Anderson, sheriff of Panola county, Tex.; that the same was not made a part of the record of the said cause, and was not copied in the transcript of the case of Jasper Black, which was appealed to the honorable Court of Criminal Appeals of the state of Texas, and was by oversight left out of said transcript containing the record of said appeal, and that the copy of the said appeal bond was left out entirely by the carelessness of myself, and was not in any way the fault of either of the attorneys who were and are representing the defendant."

[2] There are a number of bills of exception in the record; No. 1 reading as follows: "Be it remembered that upon the trial of the above numbered and styled cause, and while Lenwood Neal, a witness, was on the stand for the state, that the state asked said witness the following question: 'Q. Did you ever give Jasper Black groceries when you didn't get some whisky before you let him have the groceries?' To which the defendant then and there objected for the reason that the same was leading and was too general, and was calculated to prejudice the minds of the jury against the defendant, which said objection the court then and there overruled and permitted the witness to answer as follows: 'A. No, sir; I don't think I did.' To which said action of the court the defendant then and there in open court excepted, and here tenders his bill of exceptions, and asks that the same be filed and approved and made a part of the record in this cause."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

It will be seen by reading this bill it is too vague and indefinite to present any question for review. The appellant was charged with pursuing the occupation of selling intoxicating liquors in prohibition territory, and was alleged to have made sales to this witness, and, when we turn to the testimony of this witness, we learn that he says he sold the appellant groceries and received whisky in payment therefor. It is thus seen that the connection in which the testimony was offered is not stated, and the objection that it was "leading, too general, and prejudicial" does not present the matter in such way that we could act thereon without reference to the statement of facts, and, when we turn to the statement of facts, we find the question and answer are germane and admissible.

[3] Bill of exceptions No. 2 does not present the question sought to be raised in a way we can review it, but, if we again turn to the statement of facts, it shows that appellant let the witness Raspberry have two quarts of whisky to be repaid in whisky. This, under our law, was a sale, and the testimony admissible.

[4] In bills Nos. 3 and 4 it is shown that appellant objected to certain questions propounded the witness Aber Collins on cross-examination. The answers to the questions, if the witness answered them, are not stated in the bills, consequently they present no question for review. In regard to those matters the court instructed the jury: "The testimony which has been admitted before you with reference to the other transactions than the Neal transaction—that is, the transaction with Raspberry and the transaction with Collins—you cannot consider or estimate them as sales within the meaning of the two sales above defined, but said testimony was admitted before you to enable you the better to pass upon the questions as to whether or not the defendant did or did not engage in the occupation of selling intoxicating liquor."

[5] In bills Nos. 5 and 7 it is shown, the defendant having testified, the state was permitted to prove that he had been arrested charged with burglary. This is an offense of the grade of felony, and there was no error in admitting the testimony.

[6] The question attempted to be raised in bill No. 6 is likewise in such condition that we cannot review it. The attendant circumstances are not stated, and the answer of the question propounded is not given. However, if we turn to the statement of facts, the purpose of the testimony was to show that appellant had access to a quantity of whisky at the time he is alleged to have made the sales and pursued the occupation, and it was admissible for that purpose.

[7] The only other ground in the motion complains of the insufficiency of the testimony. We frankly admit that the testimony of Neal is not of a very satisfactory character, yet the jury believed his testimony, and, if true, it and the other facts and circumstances in evidence support the verdict, and under such circumstances we do not feel inclined to disturb it.

The judgment is affirmed.

DAVIDSON, P. J. Appellant was convicted of assault with intent to murder; his punishment being assessed at five years' confinement in the penitentiary.

[1-3] The record is before us without the evidence or bills of exception. The grounds of the motion for new trial are based on the alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the conviction, and failure of the court to charge on the plea of temporary insanity, and in excluding certain evidence as shown by bills of exception, and in not permitting defendant to introduce certain evidence. None of these objections are in any manner verified. The evidence not being before us, the insufficiency of the evidence cannot be reviewed.

ORTIZ v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Dec. 11, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 594*)—CONTINUANCE—ABSENT WITNESS—SEVERANCE.

Under the statute providing that a case shall not be continued to obtain a severance, defendant's motion for a continuance until his fugitive partner in the homicide, who had been jointly indicted with him, should be apprehended and placed on trial or until they could have an opportunity to agree upon a severance of the case was properly refused.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 518*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION.

The fact that the defendant in a homicide case by request takes persons to the place where they find the dead body is admissible in evidence, although he was under arrest and unwarned; the statute requiring that a confession shall be in writing and made after due warning, where the defendant is under arrest, not applying where the statements of the accused lead to discovering the fruits of the crime.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1157-1162; Dec. Dig. § 518.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 518*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSION—FRUITS OF CRIME.

Evidence that the defendant, while under arrest and unwarned, gave information from which the officers found decedent's watch, a fruit of the crime and an indication of defendant's guilt, was properly admitted in a murder case.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL AND ERROR—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

The bill of exceptions should be sufficiently full and certain as to disclose the error and prejudice to defendant and to overcome the legal presumption of the correctness of the trial court's rulings.

Appeal from District Court, Hidalgo County; W. B. Hopkins, Judge.

Abraham Ortiz was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

DAVIDSON, P. J. This is a murder conviction with the death penalty assessed. In brief, the evidence discloses that the deceased with his wife, who was the main state's witness in the case, had returned from Reynosa, a little village on the Mexican side of the Rio Grande, into Texas, and that appellant and Domingo Gonzales, while they were traveling along the road, made an attack on her husband with a club and killed him, crushing his skull. They then took her a short distance from the road and each in turn forced her to have carnal intercourse with them. This they repeated more than once. It is also shown that they took money from the pockets of her husband. While one of them would have intercourse with her, the other would stand by the dead body and watch it. Then the other would have intercourse with her, while the other party would return to the body. After they had finished these matters, which occupied two or more hours, they started to leave her. After going a short distance, they held a conversation not heard by the witness, when Domingo Gonzales returned to where she was and forced her to go with him to the residence of another Mexican whom the witness called Ysidro. Ysidro was brother-in-law to appellant. Witness spent the night and the next day at the residence of Ysidro with Domingo Gonzales, as she testifies, under compulsion and for fear of her life. Late the next evening Domingo Gonzales went away to get some groceries. When this occurred she made her escape and informed the justice of the peace of these matters, whereupon followed an investigation of the whole transaction, the subsequent arrest of appellant and his trial and conviction. Domingo Gonzales fled the country. The indication from this record is that he is still a fugitive from justice, never having been arrested. There is quite a lot of other testimony, but we are of opinion that this is a sufficient statement of the matters to bring in review the questions raised, except as they may be referred to in discussing the bills of exception.

[1] The first bill of exceptions relates to the motion made by appellant to have his case continued until Domingo Gonzales is apprehended and placed on trial. He was charged also with this offense, and is now at large, not in custody of the authorities, and was so absent without any fault or collusion on the part of the defendant. Wherefore he moves this case be postponed and continued, as a matter of law, until such time as Gonzales can be apprehended and placed on trial, or until such time as they may have an opportunity to agree upon the severance of the case. Domingo Gonzales was under indictment for this murder also, as appellant charges in this motion. There is no merit in this motion, and the court correctly overruled it. The statute provides that the case shall not be continued in order to obtain the severance, and, where a severance involves a continuance, as a rule the severance will not be granted. Whatever exception in matters of continuance might grow out of this statute in favor of accus-parties in order to have a fair trial is not necessary here to discuss. The statute clearly did not intend to operate in a case like this.

[2] The second bill of exceptions is very lengthy and sets out at length in questions and answers much of the testimony of the widow of the deceased. A great deal of this testimony was clearly legitimate, and some of it may or may not be objectionable owing to the purpose for which it was introduced, or for what it was to be used, or the connection in which it came. The objections are general and stated as follows: "Because the said questions and each of them sought to elicit testimony which is incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and calculated to inflame the minds of the jurors, and prejudice them against the defendant, and to each and all of which answers to said questions the defendant objected because all of the said answers and each of them to said questions are incompetent, immaterial, and irrelevant, and calculated to inflame the minds of the jurors and prejudice them against this defendant." A bill of exceptions is too general for consideration if it includes a number of statements, some of which are clearly admissible, and there is nothing in the objection directly pointing out the supposed objectionable portions of the evidence. Branch's Crim. Law, § 47; Payton v. State, 35 Tex. Cr. R. 510, 84 S. W. 615; Tubb v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 623, 117 S. W. 858; Cabral v. State, 57 Tex. Cr. R. 304, 122 S. W. 872. Where evidence is introduced over objection, some of which is admissible and some of which is on doubtful grounds or which might be objectionable, it is the duty of the objector to specify in the bill the particular portion to which objection is urged. General objections of the character set out here are not usually sufficient. They are in the nature of a general demurrer. It has heretofore been stated in the decisions, and may be restated, that general objections to the admission of evidence are in the nature of general demurrers and will not be sufficient if the testimony admitted was admissible for any purpose in the case. If the testimony in this bill could be admissible for any purpose, then the objections are too general to be entertained. This rule is well recognized by the authorities, and it has been frequently so held. An inspection of the bill in connection with all the testimony contained therein does not manifest by any means that any of the testimony was inadmissible. Some of it was clearly admissible. As to whether or not some of the other would be admissible would depend upon circumstances, and an inspection of the entire statement of facts, were we permitted to go to that instrument, would indicate that all of it was admissible, but in the way the bill is presented we deem it unnecessary to discuss the question.

[3] There is another bill of exceptions which recites that, while the witness Dionicio Lerma was on the stand testifying in behalf of the state, he was asked the following questions and made the replies thereto as follows: "Q. The defendant took you out there? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he take you there for—why was he taking you there? A. Yes, we told him (asked him) where he took the body and he said he would take us. Mr. Dougherty: We object to this testimony as the defendant was then under arrest, and it is inadmissible on the ground that an admission made by the defendant while under arrest, without having been warned as to the consequences, is not admissible. The Court: This is an exception to the rule, Doctor, it is admissible. Mr. Dougherty: We take an exception. And the court overruled said objections and admitted said testimony." This bill does not state, as a matter of fact, that appellant was under arrest at the time, but we may infer from the statement in the bill that he was, and that this statement was made while he was under arrest. There is nothing to indicate that he was not warned; but we suppose he was not warned, and it may be granted that the statements were not in writing as required by the statute. The court says this is an exception to the rule, and it is admissible. Conceding all these things, we are unable to see where error is shown. If it was intended to urge that the defendant was under arrest and took the parties to the body, or defendant said he would take them to the body, it might be clearly admissible if by these means they discovered where the dead body was. This bill does not exclude that idea by any means. The expression or answer of the witness, "Yes, we told him (asked him) where he took the body and he said he would take us." This bill does not show the body had been previously found or that by reason of what the defendant did they had discovered things that they had not otherwise, which indicated defendant's guilty participancy in the killing. It is an exception in the statute which authorizes the confession to be taken in writing after due warning, etc., if confession led to discovery of fruits of the crime. That phase of the statute does not apply, if by reason of the confession, warned or unwarned, or statements of the accused, although under arrest, lead to discovering the fruits of the crime, etc. This bill does not exclude that idea, and rather tends to show that the purpose was to take them to the body. It does not even show that he went to the body with them and pointed it out. It only conveys the idea that he would do so. But we take it that in view of the entire bill as it is presented, which seems to be rather confused, the defendant, however, did take the parties to the body of the deceased. This is shown by the following questions and answers: "The defendant took out there? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he take you there for—why was he taking you there? A. Yes, we told him (asked him) where he took the body and he said he would take us." So it seems he did take them to the dead body, and if by reason of that fact they discovered the body, and that it was in fact killed, or came to its death by violence, or at the hands of some person other than himself, this would be admissible testimony, although he was under arrest and unwarned.

[4] Another bill recites that, while Mr. William Brewster was testifying for the state, he was permitted to testify that appellant made a statement to him in regard to a watch that he had taken off the dead man. Objection was urged to this because appellant was under arrest. He was further asked if he (witness) knew at any time where the watch was. This was answered in the negative, and the following question was asked: "And were you by reason of the statement made to you enabled to discover that watch, and did you discover it in pursuance of his admission to you?" This was answered in the affirmative. "Mr. Dougherty: We take an exception. The Court: Let him answer the question. Q. Well, what did he say to you in regard to the watch?" Then follows quite a lengthy answer, the substance of which is: About eight days before this witness was testifying, defendant told the witness that the watch was at his house and to go to his sister-in-law's or brother-in-law's or his little boy and tell them to give him (Brewster) the watch; that they knew where it was, and Brewster went and they informed him the watch was not there; that it had been taken to Reynosa, Mexico, by appellant's boy, and he said that the watch was at his grandmother's, who was defendant's mother-in-law. Witness then went there and talked to the old lady, and finally she dug up the watch; she had it buried in a corner of the house. The court overruled appellant's objection above stated and admitted this testimony. The objection urged was that the admission was made while defendant was under arrest. The statute expressly provides, as we understand it, that, where defendant is under arrest and makes statements which lead to the discovery of the fruits of the crime, etc., they can be used, although the party was under arrest and unwarned and the admission or confession not reduced to writing. The evidence discloses, as we understand it, that deceased had a watch at the time of the homicide. By this bill appellant admitted having this watch and told the officers where they could find it. After going to the place designated, the parties whom he pointed out as having charge of the watch, or who would deliver the watch to the officer, informed him the son of appellant had carried it to his grandmother's, mother-in-law of appellant, across the river, to a little village known as Reynosa. There they found the watch. Under this state of case, and under these facts, we are of opinion that the court correctly admitted this evidence. The bill shows on its face that the officers knew nothing of the whereabouts of the watch until appellant disclosed its whereabouts. There was no error in the ruling of the court.

[5] There is one other proposition we wish to state generally in regard to these bills of exception; that is this: That the bill of exceptions should be made so full and certain in its statements as that in and of itself it will disclose all that is necessary to manifest the supposed error. McGlasson v. State, 38 Tex. Cr. R. 362, 43 S. W. 93; Walker v. State, 9 Tex. App. 200; Eldridge v. State, 12 Tex. App. 208; Davis v. State, 14 Tex. App. 645; Wilkerson v. State, 31 Tex. Cr. R. 90, 19 S. W. 903; Carter v. State, 40 Tex. Cr. R. 229, 47 S. W. 979, 49 S. W. 74, 619; Hooper v. State, 29 Tex. App. 616, 16 S. W. 655; Flanigan v. State, 51 S. W. 1116; Coffey v. State, 60 Tex. Cr. R. 73, 131 S. W. 219; Green v. State, 60 Tex. Cr. R. 530, 132 S. W. 807; Spencer v. State, 61 Tex. Cr. R. 60, 133 S. W. 1049; Branch's Crim. Law, § 45.

There is another proposition which is germane to the above; it is this: Legal presumption is that the ruling of the trial court is correct unless the bill shows otherwise. Edgar v. State, 59 Tex. Cr. R. 252, 127 S. W. 1053; Moore v. State, 7 Tex. App. 20. In stating these rules it would be advisable also to say that, in order to have the matters contained in the bill of exception reviewed, the statements must be sufficiently clear to manifest to this court the question at issue, and it is alleged prejudicial effect. The writer is of the opinion that, if the bill is sufficiently clear and explicit to manifest to this court the error complained of, then this court should entertain and rule upon the supposed error. Of course the bill must be clear and sufficiently so to manifest this error, and the grounds urged against the rulings of the court in the admission or rejection of testimony must be stated. It is a rule that the appellate courts will not consider grounds of objection not stated. It is not my purpose here to enter into any discussion with reference to the sufficiency of the bills of exception or the statements of the grounds of objection, but the above rules are stated in a general way. The whole end and object and purpose of the trial of an accused person is to see that he gets a full, fair, and legal trial, and, if he is dissatisfied with the rulings of the court, he must show in some legitimate way that the rulings of the court are erroneous, sufficiently so to overcome the legal presumption of the correctness of the decision or rulings of the trial court. The law lays down no particular form of bills or manner of presenting these questions except that they must be sufficient to overcome the legal presumption of the correctness of the rulings of the trial court and sufficiently clear for this court to understand the error of which complaint is made.

We are of opinion, after a careful review of this record and the bills as presented, that it has not been made to appear that the rulings of the trial court were erroneous.

Finding no such error in the record as in our judgment requires a reversal, it is affirmed.

Appeal from District Court, Hidalgo County; W. B. Hopkins, Judge.

Abraham Ortiz was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Lane, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the State.

PRENDERGAST, J. Appellant was convicted of rape, and the death penalty assessed. We do not propose to give in detail the evidence—simply an outline of it. On Sunday, February 18, 1912, Florencia Luis, with her husband, Martin Martinez, went over from Hidalgo county, Tex., across the river into Mexico to the little town of Reynosa where they made some purchases of little things, such as hosiery, peppers, tomatoes, etc., which she brought back with them in a paper bag. Her husband, when in Reynosa, had about $20 in money. He spent some $2 or $3 of this and carried the remainder wrapped with a cloth in his pocket when they left there. He also had a certain open-faced watch which he also carried in his pocket. After completing their purchases they came back from Mexico, passing through the town of Hidalgo on their way to the camp of a man who lived near there where they were at work. In going from Hidalgo they passed a cemetery perhaps two-thirds of a mile from the town and reached some 600 or 700 yards beyond this cemetery. Shortly before they passed along there, a workman in the cemetery saw the appellant and his companion, Domingo Gonzales, together near this cemetery. Soon after this said Florencia and her husband met these same persons, but had no conversation with them at the time, merely the ordinary greetings. They were strangers to one another. Florencia and her husband, after meeting them, proceeded on their way, but went only a short distance when appellant and Gonzales slipped up behind them and, without any warning or knowledge by either, appellant struck her husband in the back of the head with a large stick two licks, one following the other. From the first he began staggering, but with the second lick appellant crushed his skull and killed him. Gonzales at the time was armed with a knife and at once after the murder of her husband, by actual force and threats to kill her, forced Florencia to go into the brush some 75 or 100 feet from where her husband lay and immediately ravished her. Appellant remained at the body of her husband while Gonzales ravished her; she begging, protesting, and pleading. Immediately after Gonzales ravished her he called appellant, furnishing him his knife and Gonzales taking from appellant the club with which the killing had been done. Appellant then by actual force and threats of killing her immediately proceeded also to ravish her; Gonzales going back to the husband's body while this was being done. Within the space of about two hours they alternately ravished her in the same way, each three times. It seems at first they were not sure they had killed her husband dead, which accounted for the fact that each watched the body while the other, the first time, ravished the woman. After each of these first acts they then took the body of the husband into the brush some 100 feet from the road and left it there. This killing and first ravishment occurred about 5 o'clock in the evening. They both remained there with the woman from that time until about dark, 7 o'clock in the evening. It is not specifically stated by any witness, yet from what is stated and the surroundings described we conclude that the place where this murder and rape occurred was an unfrequented and secluded place and that it was in the timber or brush. After keeping the woman there approximately two hours and each, after murdering her husband, ravished her three times, the two by agreement separated. Appellant indicated to Gonzales where he was going, stating first to one place in Texas and the other over in Mexico. Gonzales was to take and did, by force and threats of murdering her if she refused to go, force her to go with him after night to some place where he was staying, the distance not given, but from the evidence we conclude not a great way from where this murder and rape occurred. He took her to his room, forced her to stay in the room with him that night, worked right around the house all the next day and prevented her from escaping or communicating with any one until about night. He then left the place to go some distance to buy supplies. Florencia, seeing this, immediately communicated to the other man and woman at this house what had been done to her, induced them to accompany her to the road a short distance from the house, when she left them and ran as rapidly as she could all the way from there to the camp where she and her husband had been working. She immediately communicated to persons there what had occurred to her and her husband, sought their protection, and induced some of her friends to go with her nearly a mile to the justice of the peace. They did so, and she at once informed the justice of the peace of the murder of her husband and the rapes that had been committed upon her.

It seems that her story of the horrible and unprecedented crimes was such as to stagger the credulity of the justice of the peace, so much so that he did not then, it being night, himself or have any of the other officers investigate the matter, but deferred it till morning. In the meantime she told her story to her husband's employer and other friends, and they themselves personally and in addition induced the officers the next morning to make an investigation. They obtained from her a description of the locality where the murder and rapes had been committed, and upon making an investigation found, and identified later, the body of her husband with the back of his skull crushed, a pool of blood where the body had first fallen at the road and where it had been removed some 100 feet from the road in the brush where it was found. They also on the ground in this same immediate locality, some 75 or 100 feet from the road in the brush, found some of the articles of merchandise she says she and her husband had purchased at Reynosa, and where persons had been lying on the ground and prints of the feet and body were such as to confirm the woman's detail of the rapes that had been committed upon her. Four such places, if not six, the evidence shows, were thus found. She did not know the names of either of her husband's and her assailants, but gave such a description and information of the name of one of them and some data about the other that her friends and the officers at once sought Gonzales, but failed to find and arrest him. He escaped. They did find appellant, and the woman fully and completely identified him as the man who had struck the licks that killed her husband and who had immediately and repeatedly ravished her shortly thereafter. Appellant was taken to the vicinity where the crime had been committed, and, when asked if he could point out where the killing occurred, the instrument with which the licks were struck, and where the body was, stated that he could and he himself took the parties to the place showing the pool of blood where her husband had first been felled which had been covered with sand, and to the body secreted in the brush. He also then identified the stick with which the killing was done. We doubt if the criminal annals of this state will show such atrocious crimes as this record discloses. The court gave a full and correct charge in the case. There is no complaint whatever thereof, either of commission or omission.

[1, 2] Appellant urges in his motion for new trial that the court erred in overruling his motion for a continuance on account of the absence of said Domingo Gonzales, his companion and partner in these crimes. The motion does not appear in the record, no bill of exceptions was taken thereto, and none appears in the record. The record discloses that the officers hunted for Gonzales to arrest him for these crimes, but that he made his escape. We cannot consider this point without it being shown by a bill of exceptions; but, even if there had been a bill, the court correctly overruled the application.

[3] In some grounds of the motion for new trial it is urged that the court erred in permitting the testimony of certain witnesses on certain points, but this is not shown by bills of exceptions in the record and cannot be considered. However, there are four bills of exceptions in the record; three of them complaining of certain testimony of said woman Florencia Luis, the other of the testimony of a doctor.

This is a companion case to another against the same appellant for the murder of said Florencia's husband (151 S. W. 1056, this day decided. All the bills of exceptions in this case are fully as defective and insufficient, if not more so, than those in said other case, and the decision and discussion of them in that case pretermits any further in this. The only difference between the two cases and the character of objections is that the charge in this case is for the rape of said Florencia and in the other case it s for the murder of her husband. The three crimes of murder, rape, and robbery by appellant and his said companion and partner in crime are so interwoven and connected that the testimony properly admissible to tell of one almost necessarily, if not quite so, includes each of the others.

[4] However in this, the rape case, there is another reason and ground why the testimony of said Florencia of the fact of her being prevented by force from complaining of the rape that had been committed upon her and complaining thereabout Monday night following the act the day before, being as soon as she could do so, is admissible in that it is always permissible in trials for the crime of rape for the state, as a part of its case, to prove that the ravished woman made complaint at the first opportunity she had. Her testimony in this case showing that she was prevented by appellant's partner and companion in the crimes from making complaint earlier than she did and doing so as soon as she could is especially and peculiarly applicable in this case. *Pefferling v. It is needless to cite the many other cases.

We have carefully gone over and studied the evidence and record in this case, as well as that in said companion case, and it is our opinion that the guilt of the appellant is shown beyond dispute, and that no error has been committed in the trial of the case which would authorize or justify this court to reverse the judgment of the lower.

The judgment will therefore in all things be affirmed.

SHAFFER v. STATE.

(Court of Criminal Appeals of Texas. Nov. 18, 1912. Rehearing Denied Dec. 18, 1912.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1120*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—LEADING QUESTIONS.

A bill complaining of questions asked by the state's attorney of a witness as to a conversation at 7:30 and then at 9 did not show the questions to be leading and suggestive where the witness' answer was not given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2931-2937; Dec. Dig. § 1120.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL—QUALIFIED BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

Where the court qualified defendant's bill complaining that some of the state's witnesses were in sight and hearing of the witness' testifying, although the rule had been invoked by stating that the witnesses were out of sight and hearing of the witness on the stand, error was not presented.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

In a trial for burglary accompanied by an assault upon a young woman, evidence that defendant told his foster mother of his engagement to the young woman soon after it occurred and some months before the offense, was properly excluded, being hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—EVIDENCE.

It was not error to sustain an objection to a question asking defendant's foster mother as to defendant's general character and acts during his lifetime, where it had already been proven by the same witness that defendant's reputation as a peaceable, law-abiding citizen was good.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145-3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 657*)—PUNISHMENT OF COUNSEL FOR CONTEMPT—ABSENCE OF JURY.

It was not error to punish defendant's counsel, in the jury's absence, on account of his repeatedly refusing to abide by the court's ruling excluding certain questions.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1534; Dec. Dig. § 657.*]

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY.

A bill showing the exclusion of questions whether defendant had fights when he was a boy did not show error where it did not state what the witness would have testified.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 413, 419, 420*)—EVIDENCE—SELF-SERVING DECLARATION.

In a trial for burglary accompanied by assault and followed by an attempt on the part of defendant to commit suicide, evidence that defendant told his foster mother the day after the crime was committed that he did not know how the wound on his throat was inflicted and that it was not self-inflicted, being hearsay and self-serving, was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 928-935, 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 413, 419, 420.*]

8. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

In a trial for burglary accompanied by an assault and followed by an attempt on the part of defendant to kill himself with a razor, evidence as to conversations between defendant's foster mother and the officers relative to their finding blood and a blood-stained handkerchief was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 730*)—REMARKS OF COUNSEL—INSTRUCTIONS.

Side remarks of the state's attorney in a burglary case did not constitute error where the court instructed the jury to disregard them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1693; Dec. Dig. § 730.*]

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

Defendant's testimony that he had been in jail several months before trial and had but a few days to engage counsel was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 752-757, 788, 801, 855; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 419, 420*)—EVIDENCE—HEARSAY.

Defendant's testimony as to what the newspapers had published regarding the crime was properly excluded where he stated that all his information was hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973-983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170*)—APPEAL—HARMLESS ERROR—OPINION EVIDENCE—INSANITY.

Where the defense was insanity, it was not reversible error to refuse to permit a witness who had testified to defendant's appearance after the offense to state whether he looked like an insane man.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145-3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1091*)—APPEAL—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS.

A bill complaining of the exclusion of evidence presented no error where it failed to give such a statement of the case or questions as to show that defendant was injured by the exclusion.

14. WITNESSES (§ 277*)—DEFENDANT AS WITNESS—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

Where defendant testified that he could not remember after 10 o'clock on the night of the offense, the court properly permitted him to be cross-examined as to whether his lack of remembrance was due to a blow received prior to that hour.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 925, 979-984; Dec. Dig. § 277.*]

15. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 338*)—EVIDENCE—FEE PAID TO ATTORNEYS ASSISTING PROSECUTION.

Evidence as to the fee paid attorneys who assisted in the prosecution was properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 752-757, 788, 801, 855; Dec. Dig. § 338.*]

16. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 364*)—EVIDENCE.

In a trial for burglary, followed by defendant's attempt to cut his throat, the court properly permitted the chief of police to testify about defendant's condition and about his writing of statements concerning the offense upon scrap paper soon after his arrest.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 805, 808-810, 813, 816-818; Dec. Dig. § 364.*]

17. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 485*)—EXPERT TESTIMONY—HYPOTHETICAL QUESTION.

The substance of such testimony by the chief of police was properly included in a hypothetical question asked by the state on rebuttal of defendant's defense of insanity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1073, 1074; Dec. Dig. § 485.*]

18. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 474*)—EVIDENCE—INSANITY.

Where, in a trial for burglary which followed by defendant's attempt to commit suicide, the defense was insanity resulting from a blow, the court properly permitted the doctor who treated defendant to testify that there was no evidence of concussion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. § 1061; Dec. Dig. § 474.*]

19. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 773*)—INSANITY—INSTRUCTION.

In a trial for burglary, where the defense was insanity from a blow received before the commission of the offense, it was not error to instruct that insanity justifying defendant's acquittal was "a defect of reason and diseased of the mind," and to refuse defendant's requested instruction that insanity such as would excuse the crime was "that state of mind in which the person is mentally irresponsible through loss of consciousness such as is normally produced from any cause which is shown to be capable of producing it."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1821-1828; Dec. Dig. § 773.*]

20. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 814*)—INSTRUCTIONS—EVIDENCE TO SUSTAIN.

Where in a trial on an indictment alleging burglary in the daytime in the first count and burglary in the nighttime in the second, the evidence clearly established nighttime burglary, and the court charged that defendant should be acquitted if it was not nighttime burglary, it was not error to submit the second count only.
